Adjourned at a quarter after twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS, VENERIS, 28° DIE FEBRUARII, 1840.

The EARL of SHAFTESBURY sat Speaker.

APPEAL.

Kay v. Marshall. — Appeal presented, and respondent ordered to answer in a fortnight.

CHARD CANAL BILL.

Read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

House adjourned during pleasure; and resumed by the LORD CHANCELLOR.

EARL OF DYSART'S CLAIM TO VOTE FOR REPRESENTATIVE PEERS FOR IRELAND.

Committee for Privileges (which stands appointed for Tuesday next) put off to Tuesday, the 10th of March next.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON THE PETITION OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY FOR RELIEF.

The masters reported, that the Commons had given leave to William Crawford, Esq. (a Member) to attend the Committee, pursuant to message of yesterday.

A witness ordered to attend on Monday next.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON THE SUPPLY OF WATER TO THE METROPOLIS.

LORD PORTMAN released from his attendance.

SUPPLY OF WATER TO THE METROPOLIS.

LORD ASHBURTON and VISCOUNT DUNCANNON presented a petition of the Grand Junction Water Works Company, praying to be heard by counsel before the Select Committee, in support of their rights and interests; and a petition of inhabitants of the parish of Saint Mary-le-bone, praying to be heard by counsel, in favour of the plan recommended for procuring water from Artesian wells near Watford. — Read, and referred to the Select Committee on the Supply of Water to the Metropolis.

CHURCH EXTENSION.

LORD REDESDALE presented a petition in favour of, — of inhabitants of Frampton upon Severn. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The DUKE of SUTHERLAND presented petitions in favour of the principle of non-intrusion, — of the presbytery of Tongue; of the minister, elders, and others of the parish of St. Paul, Glasgow; and of inhabitants of Durness, Eddrachillis, and Assynt. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CHURCH RATES.

Petition for the release of John Thorogood (a prisoner in Chelmsford gaol), and for the abolition of church rates, and of the criminal jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, — of the minister and deacons of the congregation of Protestant Dissenters of the Independent denomination in the borough of Morpeth. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CHINA.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—I understood that certain papers, for which I have moved, relative to China, would have been laid on the table early in the present week; but they have not yet been produced. I therefore beg to know when they will be ready?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — The papers are in the course of preparation, and will be produced as soon as possible.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I wish to call the attention of the Noble Viscount to the difficulty which exists in rendering effectual the orders made by this House for the production of papers. On the 20th of this month I moved for certain Returns, which I wished to be laid before the Committee on East India Duties. Some of those documents, it appears, have reference to the business of the Board of Revenue, others to the Colonial Office, and others to the Board of Customs. Now, I do not know to which office I should send for them. A similar complaint was made, some years ago, in the House of Commons; when Lord Londonderry directed that the orders should be sent to the Treasury, by whom they would be forwarded to the proper offices. Perhaps the Noble Viscount would consent to adopt a similar course.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I have no objection to fall back upon the practice to which the Noble Lord alludes.

COMPTROLLERSHIP OF THE EXCHEQUER.

The EARL of RIPON. — I feel it to be my duty to take an early opportunity of contradicting a statement which has been made elsewhere, respecting the non-appointment of a gentleman, who is nearly connected with me, to the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, that office having been promised to him. I understand it has been said, that a Noble Friend of mine, who formerly filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and is now a Member of this House (Earl Spencer), stated, that, although he would be glad to give Mr. Ellis the appointment, in consequence of his connection with me — (I being then in the Government), — yet that he had been, however painful it was to him to entertain such a feeling, obliged to come to the conclusion, that, for particular reasons, such an appointment ought not to take place. It has been said, or is reported to have been said, that Lord Althorp was of this opinion. Now, I can give that statement the most positive contradiction. I will assert, as a matter of fact, that Lord Althorp did not express such an opinion. That Noble Lord stated to me, in 1833, that he concurred in opinion with another Noble Lord (Earl Grey), then at the head of the Government, that Mr. Henry Ellis's services, at the Exchequer, gave him a just claim to that office. It did so happen that, the moment I left Lord Althorp, I informed Mr. Ellis, by letter, of the conversation which passed, between us and I stated to him that those Noble Lords had admitted the grounds on which I thought Mr. Ellis was entitled to the appointment; and I even went so far as to congratulate Mr. Ellis on that appointment. I do not mean to say one word about that gentleman's not obtaining the appointment; that is a question which I have no right to discuss; but I could not permit Mr. Ellis's character to be exposed to such an imputation as I have described without repelling it.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — It is very natural that the Noble Earl should wish for some explanation; but, considering the situation which I filled at the time alluded to, it cannot be supposed that I am acquainted with the circumstances of the case.

The EARL of RIPON. — Certainly not. I merely wished to make this statement.

THE ADMINISTRATION.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — I rise to give notice that it is my intention, on Tuesday next, or, if that day be inconvenient, on Thursday next, to present an important petition from the town and county of the city of Londonderry, relative to the Irish Municipal Corporations Bill; and that I shall, at the same time, in consequence of what has taken place elsewhere, ask the Noble Viscount to give some explanation respecting the principles on which he intends to carry on the Administration in future. Perhaps, in giving that explanation, the Noble Viscount will not be so jocular as he usually is. Although Government has been again beaten, still I hope the Noble Viscount will show some degree of Ministerial magnanimity; and, looking to the constitution of his new Cabinet, will think that it becomes him to give your Lordships a clear explanation (if Ministers still hold the same feelings and views as they have hitherto done with respect to the question on which they have been defeated) as to the principles on which they mean to conduct the Government hereafter.

The EARL of SHAFTESBURY. — I would suggest to my Noble Friend that he cannot regularly present a petition against a Bill not yet before the House.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — The petition says not a word about the Bill, but applies itself to the general principle.

FRENCH AGGRESSIONS (THE CARAMANZAS).

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — My Lords, I rise to have the honour of laying before your Lordships a petition from all the merchants of the city of London engaged in the African gum trade, complaining of certain injuries to which they have been subjected on the coast of Africa by the French authorities there. As I mean to refer largely to the petition in the course of the observations which I shall address to your Lordships, I shall now merely move "That the petition do lie on the table."

Petition ordered to lie on the table.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — When, in the course of last Session, I brought under your Lordships' consideration the various aggressions upon our trade on the western coast of Africa, that had been committed by certain French authorities there, and the amount of loss and dishonour which, in my opinion, we had incurred in consequence, I did hope, as well from the highly proper and spirited tone and language assumed, on that occasion, by the Noble Viscount opposite, as from his assurance that the matter should be taken up as it behoved this country to take it up, — I did, I say, hope that his remonstrances and representations would have had the effect, if not of obtaining full redress for past injuries and insults, at least of preventing them from being renewed and repeated in a yet more extensive and objectionable form. My Lords, I confess that I entertained too high an estimate of the importance and respect due to the remonstrances and representations of a British Minister to believe, at that time, for one moment, that it would be my lot, in the very next Session, to have to present a petition affording proof positive, not only that those representations and remonstrances had been ineffectual, as respected the past, but were so entirely disregarded and contemned, with respect to the future, as to fail in restraining France from making new attempts to damage our commerce and to humble our flag. The petition which has been laid on your Lordships' table embodies the results of these new acts of aggression; and I will now merely ask your Lordships what state of things that must be, in which Her Majesty's subjects, smarting under insults and injuries, and hopeless of protection, approach your Lordships' House with such a prayer as this: —

> That, however deeply your petitioners may feel the importance of duly protecting and upholding these settlements, as well with a view to commerce as to the extinction of the slave trade; and however anxious they may be to preserve them, as openings to British enterprise, at a period when new markets for our manufactures are so essential to the mother country; yet the neglect of their own Government, and the losses and insults which they have so long suffered from the French, without any prospect of redress, constrain your petitioners humbly to recommend that a negotiation be opened with the French Government for selling and transferring those possessions to that power, which seems so anxious to possess them, under which negotiation your petitioners may either withdraw their property, upon receiving an indemnity, or remain under a Government disposed to protect them.

What, I ask, can be the state of things in which the subjects of Her Majesty find no mode of escaping from insult and injury open to them, except by transferring the possessions in which those transactions have occurred to other and more powerful hands than those which at present hold them? That state of things will be explained in a manner more clear to your Lordships, and with less expense of your Lordships' time, in the words of the petitioners themselves, than it could be by any description of mine. The petitioners, after stating a variety of precedent aggressions, proceed thus: —

> That, without adverting to other well-known acts of French aggression in the same quarter, which remain equally without redress, although attended with consequences the most ruinous to individuals, your petitioners have on this occasion humbly to draw your Lordships' attention to a further and more recent outrage committed by the French authorities so late as September last; and which, although the last aggression your petitioners have heard of, will not, they fear, be the last they are destined to endure, unless measures be taken to assert the honour and uphold the rights of Great Britain in that part of the world. That the French, in pursuance of their policy to increase the number of their establishments on the coast, and at the same time destroy the prosperity of those of Great Britain, have recently formed new settlements at the River Caramanza, a river adjoining the Gambia, the chief British possession; and obviously with a view of intercepting our trade: that having built forts, and completed their arrange> ments, they have commenced a system of annoyance and aggressions against British traders, for the purpose of excluding them from the Caramanza trade, intriguing with the natives to drive the English away; which the natives have refused to do, telling them that the trade is open to all: that, having failed in these and other attempts to effect their object, they sent an armed force on board two British vessels — the Charles Grant and the Highlander — belonging to the Gambia, and forcibly removed them from the native town of Sedjou, where they were pursuing their lawful trade: that one of these vessels, the Highlander, from the want of skill on the part of the French force engaged in the outrage, was run on shore, and finally left, and yet remains with her cargo in possession of the aggressors: that, by such proceedings, the English are dishonoured in the eyes of the natives, and confidence entirely destroyed: that these and similar proceedings on the part of the French have, from time to time, been strongly represented to Her Majesty's Government, not only by the petitioners at home, but by the sufferers in Africa, through the Lieutenant Governor of the Gambia praying earnestly for protection; and, although your petitioners cannot think that Her Majesty's Government have been entirely inattentive to their prayers, they regret to say that, up to the present moment, they are ignorant what measures, if any, have been taken for their relief; meanwhile, the French are left to pursue their insulting and aggressive policy without hindrance or interruption: that, in the opinion of your petitioners, the want of naval protection has been the main cause of these evils, the French having never less than two or three ships of war constantly stationed in the neighbourhood; while the English settlements are frequently left for six or eight months together without a single British ship of war coming within sight of them: that, at the time these proceedings took place at the Caramanza, there was no British ship of war within 500 miles of those settlements, although nearly twenty English ships of war are employed on that coast: that, through the influence of the British possessions at the Gambia, the slave trade has been entirely destroyed in the neighbourhood of that river, formerly one of its greatest marts; which proves the great value of those possessions for the attainment of that important object; but that your petitioners regret to state, that, according to the last advices received from the Gambia, the French authorities were purchasing slaves for Government service at Cayenne; which it was feared would have the effect of reviving the love of that traffic in the breasts of the native chiefs.

The injuries here described are in addition to those committed at Portendic six years ago, and which I took the liberty of noticing on a former occasion. But I must own that, however bad the Portendic case might be,—and that it was very bad cannot be denied,—there are circumstances attending the present aggression which do, I think, invest it with much more interest and importance. The territory where these injuries were inflicted on British traders by the French no more belongs to France than it belongs to us. It belonged, in fact, to Portugal, from the first. The first discovery was indisputably made by Portugal, our once-prized, once-loved ancient ally. There was a day, when an insult offered to her—there was a day, when a violation of her territory, or an attack on her independence, — would have called forth, first, the indignant remonstrance, and next, if that were ineffectual, the prompt and immediate vengeance, of this country. But a different system, it appears, now prevails, and Government has permitted that act of spoliation without resistance, nay, without observation. The French Government did not enter into any negotiation; but, vi et armis, seized upon a possession belonging to Portugal, because Portugal is a weak power; and, I suppose, according to the moral and righteous principle of the present day, — and I speak not of France alone, — it is allowable that the stronger may prey upon the weaker. I remember, when the Noble Viscount last returned to office, he said he did so on a principle of chivalry. But, I would ask, what the chivalry of England was about when this spoliation took place? Why, the only answer that can be given to that question — the only answer that can reconcile us to the idea that the interests of that ancient ally are treated with indifference — is, that Her Majesty's Government know nothing at all about the matter. If that be not so, then it must be supposed that the seizure of a portion of the possessions of a weak state by one that is more powerful, is no longer to become a matter of energetic remonstrance and representation. I well remember, in the case of the usurpation of a portion of the Brazilian territory, that I took occasion to call the attention of the Noble Viscount to the fact; and I ventured to state to the Noble Viscount what the necessary and inevitable consequence of that proceeding would be, if it were suffered to pass unnoticed. The Noble Viscount laughed at the outlandish names of the places, which I mentioned, and said that he thought I had taken a very exaggerated view of the subject; asserting that, though something had been taken, it was something of no value, in either a financial, a commercial, or a military sense. I could not help thinking, when I heard the Noble Viscount make that statement, of the story of a young lady, who justified the indiscretion of her sister by stating, that, "true it was that she had had the misfortune of having a baby, but then it was a very little, pitiable baby." Now, the French are getting little babies in every part of the world. They have got one small child at Minorca, to which the Noble Earl who holds the Privy Seal seems anxious to stand godfather; and they have got twins on the coast of Africa, one at Portendic, and the other at the Caramanzas! They have also a flourishing child at Monte Video, and another, eleven years old, who began his education at Algiers. The Noble Viscount does not say "Oh, fie!" to these irregular proceedings; and, by abstaining from doing so, exposes himself to the charge of very lax morality. To return, however, to the subject. The merchants trading to Portendic applied for redress to our Governor at the Gambia. The Governor told them that he would make their complaints known at home, and would support them to the best of his ability. Whether those complaints ever reached Her Majesty's Government in this country, or whether Her Majesty's Government ever condescended to give an answer to those complaints, I do not know. I have my own suspicions, but I will not mention them. This, however, I do know, — because I have evidence of the fact, — that no British ship of war — that no Government vessel of any size or description bearing Her Majesty's pennant—was, during those complaints, sent to that place for the purpose of watching over British interests, and of protecting British subjects engaged in their lawful callings. The consequence was, that for two years the French had everything their own way, recognising no law but the law of the strongest; which law, alone, enabled them to trample on the rights of Portugal, on the rights of England, and on those of every other nation admitted to the privilege of free trading with those settlements. Now, if these things are passed over in silence, will France know where she ought to stop? These things have been done in a time of profound peace, and are therefore more injurious to us than if they had been done in a time of war; for in a state of war, thank God, we know how to take care of our colonies and of our foreign trade; or rather, we did know how, in those old-fashioned days when good hard fighting, and not political subserviency, constituted the merits of a sailor's character, and formed his claim to distinction and reward. The fleets of France are more formidable to us in time of peace than they are in time of war; but it is not of national disgrace only that I now come forward to complain. Individuals are stripped of their property; whole families are plunged in all but absolute ruin, through these outrageous proceedings; and then we are coolly told, that they must look for redress through the tedious and dilatory forms of official correspondence, and of lazy and loitering diplomacy, at a cost of time and anxiety which aggravates incalculably the original wrong.

Full little knowest thou, thou who has not tried,
What hell there is in suing long to bide,
To speed to-day, to be thrust back to-morrow,
To feed on hope, yet pine in fear and sorrow;
To fret thy soul with crosses and with cares,
And eat thy heart in comfortless despairs.

It is for the interest of England, and also for the interest of France herself, that she should be warned not to persevere in her present course; because, if persevered in, it must lead, of necessity, to a collision between the two countries, and thus to the interruption of the peace and happiness of the whole civilised world. I say this without apprehending that the Noble Viscount will be guilty of the bad taste of asserting in this House that which has been boldly, and indecently, and unfoundedly insinuated elsewhere,—namely, that in bringing these matters forward, the Tory party — as it is called — has no other object in view but that of embroiling the two countries, and of placing them in a state of war. I assure the House that the Tory party is not so entirely demented — that it is not so hopelessly moonstricken—as to wish for war under present circumstances. I wish not for war, least of all for war in which we can expect no triumph — "bella nullos habitura triumphos." I wish for peace, not only with the frank and gallant Frenchman, — "our ancient foeman, worthy of our steel!" — but also with the poorest and most contemptible community on the face of the globe. I have, at least, fourteen reasons for wishing for peace; six or seven of which I have now the honour of seeing before me. I am sure that the Noble Viscount opposite is aware that one of the most exquisite and graceful relics of antique art which has descended to us from classical antiquity, is that celebrated gem which bears for its impress, Cupid wielding a thunderbolt. I am likewise sure that the Noble Viscount has not forgotten a short Greek epigram in the Anthologia, which explains that allegory, and tells us that the sculptor meant to designate the union of persuasion and power. Of the persuasive faculties of Her Majesty's present Administration, let Mexico, and Buenos Ayres, and Portendic, and our merchants trading with Africa and with America speak; for they best know the value. As to their power, I trust in God, that, so far as England is concerned, I never shall live to see the day when the dignity, the interest, and the safety of this empire shall be confided to their direction of its resources against the attacks of any foreign power. But, short of war,—short of anything resembling war,—I am convinced that means may yet be found to put an end to the outrages of which we so long have had reason to complain. Our remonstrances have failed. Let the Noble Lord try—let him not be startled at the word—retaliation; but retaliation in no hostile sense of the word, but in a mode to which France cannot with reason object. Let him merely put the French, trading with our settlements on the Gambia, on the same footing as the French place the English, trading with their settlements on the Senegal;—let him give the French nothing at the Gambia which we do not get at the Senegal. How do matters stand in that part of the world at present? Every advantage which the most liberal commercial policy can afford, is afforded by us on the Gambia to the French trader who comes there. Our port of St. Mary is open to the French; but their port of St. Louis on the Senegal, they will not allow a British vessel to approach; and at Goree, which is to enjoy all the privileges of a free port, the severity of the French system is such, that they will not allow even a single package to be transhipped from one vessel to another, if it be destined for any of the British possessions on the Gambia. That is, indeed, a one-sided reciprocity; and if the Noble Viscount will but hint at this mode of retaliation which I have suggested, all the difficulties of this complicated question will be settled at once.

There is another point connected with this subject, to which, however, I will advert but slightly, as I reserve it for much better and much abler hands than my own,—I mean the encouragement which these transactions have given to the revival, on the western territory of Africa, of that sinful traffic, to the abolition of which this country, under Divine Providence, has so mainly contributed. I am assured that the French authorities, in these newly acquired places, are absolutely engaged in purchasing slaves, to be deported to their settlement in Cayenne. I shall reserve that topic, however, for a Noble and Learned Friend of mine now absent from the country, who assured me that he would not be twenty-four hours in England without bringing her Majesty's Ministers to book upon it. A Noble Lord on the opposite benches surprised me not a little by saying that my Noble and Learned Friend had vanished into thin air, and had not left a wreck behind. Now, I have it under the hand and seal of my Noble and Learned Friend that he is still a living substance; and that your Lordships will soon have the pleasure of seeing and hearing him once more amongst you. In going over my papers, I find that I have overlooked one—a Return, which shows the value of this (the Senegal) trade to us before it was interrupted; what it was at the period of the interruption, and what it has been since. The Return is dated the 11th of April, and gives an account of the Senegal gum imported into this country. In 1833, there were (brought by British vessels) 15,125 cwts. of Senegal gum imported into this country; in 1834, there were 19,502 cwts.; in 1835, when the trade was interrupted, there were 220 tons; in 1836, when the French took possession of Senegal, and the importations of gum into this country came in foreign bottoms, the quantity was 16,742 cwts., and, in 1838, it was 29,274 cwts. This statement alludes to the quantity of gum alone, and not to the entire imports of all products from Africa. I have now done with the Caramanzas case. I hand it over to the Noble Viscount for him to consider of it,—that, I believe, is the technical term;—in other words, I hand it over to the Noble Viscount to form a new item in the outstanding account which has so long existed between him and the merchants of England; and I hope that the Noble Viscount will be enabled to place it to the credit side of his ledger. However wearied your Lordships may be with the repetition of these matters, I cannot conclude without making a few remarks on the original aggression at Portendic, to which I adverted last year. That transaction has since been laid in all its bearings before Parliament. It is no party question,—it is no question of ins or outs, of Whigs or Tories,—it is an Englishman's question, and as such only do I intend to treat it. It has been twice brought before the House of Commons by one of the most zealous and able supporters of her Majesty's Government, the Honourable and Learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Dr. Lushington),—no mean authority, by the bye, upon any matter of international law. Twice was that Honourable and Learned person told by the Noble Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that the matter was under discussion between the two Governments of England and France. I wish to know whether those discussions are yet terminated? It appears that no less than six years have elapsed since the date of the transactions which have given rise to those discussions. If the reasonings of the Noble Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs have failed, during all that time, to convince the French Government of the justice of our claims, I cannot help thinking that it was the duty of the Noble Secretary to have, himself, come down to Parliament for advice and assistance. I am perfectly confident that such would have been the course of Mr. Pitt, — that such would have been the course of Mr. Canning, — that such would have been the course of his lamented successor (Lord Dudley and Ward),— that such would have been the course of my Noble Friend near me (the Earl of Aberdeen),— and of the Noble and Illustrious Duke, whose absence, in common with the whole House, I deeply regret. Such, too, I am confident, would have been the course of the Noble Viscount himself, had it been a question with a feebler state than France. Had it been a question with Portugal, long ago would your Lordships have had, on the table of this House, a Bill of coercion, and of Portuguese pains and penalties. At all times, the claims of our injured fellow subjects are fairly entitled to the prompt consideration and full support of the servants of the Crown. That is a general principle; but in this case, I contend, that these parties have a peculiar right to be so considered, and so supported. And why? Because it is mainly owing to the Government itself, — because it is owing to the reliance of our merchants on that Government, — that they have been drawn into the difficulties, and have incurred the losses, of which they now complain. I was but imperfectly aware of this fact, last Session. Now, I can produce the most satisfactory proof of it. After the first aggression made upon our trade by the French, our merchants were naturally anxious to know from the Government, whether they could continue their trade in safety, or whether they would be risking their capital by making further ventures to the coast of Africa. They therefore made application on the subject to the Colonial Department, in the bad, that is to say, in the latter, half of the year 1835. They were desired to reduce that application into writing. They accordingly made it in writing. At that time a Noble Lord, who has recently become one of the ornaments of this House, was at the head of the Colonial Department. Upon the 12th of November, 1834 — (I should have said 1834, not 1835), — a letter was written from the Treasury on this subject, in which it was stated that British commercial interests, on the west coast of Africa, should have every protection of the rights guaranteed to them by treaty between the Governments of Great Britain and France. I ask your Lordships whether this was not a sufficient guarantee to the mercantile interests in that quarter against all risks from a possible state of war? Thirty-five years ago, a very ingenious pamphlet was published by the father of the present Member for Sheffield (Mr. Ward), entitled War in Disguise, or the Frauds of Neutral Flags. But the transactions which have taken place since that period prove, that other descriptions of war may arise than those which were contemplated by the author of that pamphlet. I wish, then, to know the precise state of the negotiations between England and France, upon the subject of our Portendic trade; whether any scheme of convention has been proposed; and, if so, upon what principle it is founded. To do complete and ample justice to these claimants, the only principle upon which such a convention ought to be founded, is that which is called "consequential damages." If the French had no legal right to establish these blockades, — and I have the authority of Dr. Lushington, and of all the Queen's law officers, as well as of the Noble Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs himself, that they had not,—I contend, France is responsible for every species of damage and injury accruing from those blockades. The Noble Viscount will tell me, that these claims have been unreasonably exaggerated,—that the Commission Constructative, attached to the Foreign Department in Paris, has assessed these damages; and that the amount has been fixed for the claimants at the very insignificant sum of 60,000 francs.

Now, in this transaction, it is to be remembered that there are two distinct epochs — up to 1834, and subsequently. The first epoch was marked by the seizure of the two ships, for which, and not for the losses accruing subsequently, the 60,000 francs were awarded. If British subjects have any rights whatever remaining to them, under treaty, convention, or other arrangement, in connection with the western coast of Africa, I cannot but believe that the time is come, when it is proper to vindicate them by something more than mere remonstrance. If the honour of the French nation, when wounded by an affront offered to their consul by the Dey of Algiers, can only be appeased by the expulsion of that chief from his dominions, by the extermination of his subjects, and the appropriation by the French Crown, not only of the whole of his territory, but the whole of the regency of Algiers; — if the French Government think fit to blockade Mexico, to bombard Vera Cruz, to put a stop to the whole commerce of the Plata river, to take possession of Monte Video; — if the French Government think it right to do all this, upon the ground of injuries, real or fantastic, to its subjects;—I cannot perceive upon what principle it is that that self-same France, whilst vindicating her own rights in every quarter of the globe, should delay, and should thus deny, justice to the subjects of the Queen of England, and should, as it were, set at nought the majesty of the British Crown. I shall now move, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, for copies of all despatches received from and addressed to the Governor or Lieutenant Governor of the Gambia, relating to the gum trade, and to the aggressions of the French on the western coast of Africa, since 1832; also, for copies of all despatches to the British admiral on the African station, or to the commanders of British ships of war cruising on the west coast of Africa, on the same subject, and from the same period; and, also, for copies of all communications or applications for redress, made by British subjects to the Foreign or Colonial Office, relating to transactions on the west coast of Africa, together with the answers thereto, from the year 1832 to the present period."

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I certainly cannot complain of the Noble Viscount for bringing these matters under the consideration of your Lordships. I admit that they are matters of great importance, and well worthy of your Lordships' attention; but I have a right to complain — or at least I should have a right to complain—of the angry and irritable tone and manner with which the subject has been introduced by the Noble Lord; and I should also have a right to complain of the pointed sarcasms of the Noble Lord, in reference to a foreign power, if it were not that the latter part of the Noble Lord's speech was wrapped up in so much of allegory, with such a mixture of Greek epigrams, and other matters that belong rather to the region of poetry or of fiction than of debate, as to have rendered the tone in which he commenced his speech innocuous, and unattended with those exacerbating effects which it might otherwise have produced. As it is likely that your Lordships will hear, in the course of the Session, many arguments, many motions, many statements, and many matters of this nature, and of this character, I would implore your Lordships to consider them calmly and patiently, but at the same time with firmness and with resolution. The Noble Viscount has said, that when, on a former occasion, I addressed the House upon this subject, I did so in a firm and resolute tone. I trust that whilst I hold my present situation, or whilst I shall occupy any other station, I shall never be wanting in firmness, or in resolution of tone, on this or on any other subject. But I trust, also, that all Noble Lords will address themselves to subjects of this kind with the greatest calmness, and the greatest temper, recollecting their vast importance, and the serious consequences which speeches delivered in this House may possibly lead to. It is now about one hundred years since this country, in consequence of complaints of injustice which even in modern times have been said to have been entirely without foundation, and which I myself believe to have been greatly exaggerated, and to have been mainly preferred for the party purpose of attacking the Ministers of that day, was hurried into a war which was not productive of any great honour or any great advantages, which added seriously to the burdens of the country, and which laid the origin of many of those taxes that are most objectionable in our financial system; and with reference to which, Burke afterwards reprobated and condemned those who were most active in authorising or in instituting it. Whilst, then, I advise the strictest attention to the rights, and the closest observation to the interests, of British subjects, I cannot, at the same time, too strongly recommend the most complete exemption from every thing calculated unnecessarily to provoke vindictive feelings. I will not make any particular observation on the petition which the Noble Viscount has presented; but that it prays for something equally absurd and extravagant, — namely, that we should get rid of the settlement altogether. Now, such a prayer may possibly proceed from the influence of the irritation under which the petitioners are smarting; or, probably, if the matter were investigated, it would be found that those who wish for a ground of attack against the present Government like to convey their bitterness in that form. If I were to judge from the emotion with which the Noble Viscount read the last sentence of that petition, I should be inclined to believe that the Noble Viscount wrote it himself: it is very much in the Noble Lord's style; except that it is calmer and simpler, and more to the purpose. At any rate, I cannot help thinking that the petition has been suggested by a gentleman who has some personal purposes to serve, or some party enmities to gratify. I will begin with that with which the Noble Lord concluded his speech — with those questions which he brought under the consideration of the House, in a former Session of Parliament, respecting the outrage committed on certain vessels belonging to her Majesty's subjects at Portendic, and to the interruption of our trade on the coast of Africa. I have to say, on this subject, that the French Government — the late French Government I mean, — though, of course, I have every reason to believe the engagement I am about to mention will be acted upon by their successors, — but the late French Government acceded to the establishment of a mixed commission for the consideration of all these matters, the sitting of which has only been delayed by the non-appointment of persons to represent the British Government upon that commission. These gentlemen are now determined on; and I see no reason whatever to prevent the commission from forthwith commencing its operations. But at the commencement of a negotiation of this description, nothing could be more inconvenient than the production of the previous correspondence, — correspondence, much of which, in its nature, must necessarily be adverse. In fact, its production would be more likely to impede the progress of the negotiation than to lead to any satisfactory termination.

I will now proceed to relate all that the Government knows with respect to the proceedings at the Caramanza river, the immediate cause of this motion. That river is one which, rising in the interior of Africa, runs into the sea parallel to, but south of, the Gambia. The Noble Lord has said, that the nominal property of the river is vested in Portugal. It is a property which they have not been able to make good, but which they merely possess nominally, in consequence of their having a small settlement at the mouth of the river. Up this river, at a certain distance from the source, the French have purchased from the natives a piece of land. The facts I am now stating are taken from the Report of an officer, who was sent up that river by the Governor of Gambia; which Report has been received at the Colonial Office. The French purchased a factory near an African village of the name of Sedjou. In August, the Grant schooner, an English vessel, entered the river with a view of trading with the inhabitants of Sedjou. They were warned by the French that they had no right to do so; and it is stated, in the affidavits of the parties, that the people at the French factory endeavoured to persuade the natives of Sedjou not to permit the English to trade. They were, however, unsuccessful; and the trade was opened. That vessel completed her cargo, and was going down the river, when they met another vessel, the Highlander, belonging, I believe, to the same firm. For the purpose of transhipping the cargo, the two vessels returned, in company, to Sedjou. The moment a native canoe came off to trade, the two vessels were boarded by the French, who worked one down the river for some distance, and run the other aground. The crew and supercargo left this vessel, saying to the French, "We shall come upon you for the loss we sustain in abandoning it;" and, some time after, made their complaint to the Governor of the Gambia, who very properly sent affidavits detailing the matter to the Governor of Senegal, demanding reparation for the injury sustained. He replied, that the French claimed no exclusive right to the Caramanza river; that the flag of every nation might enter that river; but that they did claim a right to the village of Sedjou, because they had purchased this factory; and that none had a right to trade there but themselves. The Governor of Senegal stated that, as these claims were advanced by the French, he trusted that the Governor of Gambia would prevent British subjects from trading with Sedjou until the matter should be settled between the two Governments, to whom he proposed to refer the whole matter. The Governor of Gambia said that he could not enter into any such arrangement, and that he must give every protection to British subjects that might repair to Sedjou. He then sent an officer to Sedjou, to learn the nature of the transaction between the natives and the French. This gentleman states, in his Report, that the natives admitted that the factory had been sold to the French, but denied that they had sold the village of Sedjou, and declared that they did not intend to sell it. It appears, from this statement, therefore, to be an unwarrantable pretension, on the part of the French, to say that no foreign nation shall have a right to trade with Sedjou. To the factory, and that alone, can they establish the right. Any claim beyond that, I apprehend, is perfectly extraordinary and untenable. Their exclusive right to trade with the factory must be admitted. This is the real state of the question. I must now observe, that the last despatch from the Governor of the Gambia, giving the account of the officer sent to Sedjou, was only received at the Colonial Office on the 10th of February, and at the Foreign Office on the 20th. The natural and proper course to pursue is, to refer the whole matter to the Queen's Advocate and other law officers of the Crown; and, upon their Report, if unfavourable to the French claims, to make that demand for explanation and reparation from the French Government which the circumstances of the case may not only justify but demand. Considering that the matter is so recent, and still pending, and that there has not been time even to take the preliminary steps which are, in such a case, to be adopted, I think that your Lordships will scarcely interfere with the progress of these negotiations, by calling for the information which is now sought. I trust, therefore, both with respect to the general question of Portendic, and this particular question, that the Noble Lord will not think it necessary to press his motion. With respect to what has been said of persuading the French to do justice, by depriving them of those commercial privileges which they now enjoy in different parts of the world, but which they do not appear willing to reciprocate, that is not the question now under consideration. The Noble Viscount has mixed up a great number of extraneous subjects with his motion; but, as to the matter of the motion itself, I trust that the Government will soon be enabled to furnish him with some satisfactory information. The Noble Lord has attributed these proceedings to the want of sufficient naval protection for British commerce trading on the western coast of Africa, and, in particular, at the Caramanza river. There are, however, twenty vessels of war, belonging to England, upon the western coast of Africa. It is true that those vessels are engaged in watching slavers, and that they have fully enough to do in that service; but the same vessel which brought the despatch to which I have alluded, also brought an account that a vessel of war, sent by the officer commanding at Sierra Leone, had arrived in that river; which the parties interested acknowledged to be perfectly adequate to give protection to our trade. I hope the explanation I have given will be satisfactory to your Lordships; and I trust, after that explanation, that the Noble Lord will not think it necessary to press for the production of the papers he has moved for.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — I am aware that it is extremely irregular and unusual to make the request which I am about to make to the Noble Viscount. I was forced to leave the House by indisposition when the Noble Viscount commenced his address, and since I have come in again, I have heard that the Noble Viscount has been pleased to state something about my having suggested this petition. I call upon the Noble Viscount, in that spirit of courtesy which is due from one gentleman to another, to tell me what he did say, in order that I may answer him.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — Nothing is so fallacious as judgments founded on a similarity of styles. I said that the last part of the petition resembled, very much, the style of the Noble Lord, and that, perhaps, he might have suggested it.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — It is, perhaps, my misfortune; but I have been so very little in correspondence with the Noble Viscount, that I am at a loss to understand what he founds his judgment, as to the similarity of style, upon. For the present, I merely declare, upon my honour, that not one line of that petition was written by me, or ever seen by me, till it was put into my hands.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — I am sure the Noble Viscount would not have made such a charge against my Noble Friend if he had seen attached to the petition such names as these: — "Charles Grant and Co., Forster and Smith, Geo. C. Redman, Thomas Goddard, W. B. Hutton and Sons, Henry Weston, Robert Harrison and Co., Robert and Benj. Brown and Co., Simon Samuel. — For themselves and others interested in the trade."

The EARL of MINTO. — I would not have risen to say one word, if it had not been for the declaration of the Noble Viscount, that all this inconvenience to our trade has arisen from an insufficiency of naval protection on the African coast. The Noble Lord alluded to representations which were made to the Government in the year 1835, and particularly remarked that it was at the latter end of that year.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — But I corrected myself, and afterwards said 1834.

The EARL of MINTO. — But the Noble Lord was not incorrect at all as to the date; for representations were made in the latter end of 1835; and, in consequence of these representations, the Admiralty despatched a powerful force to the coast of Africa, in order to protect our trade, and to assert the right of our merchants in that part of the globe; and that force was perfectly successful in the object for which it was sent out. Since that time, occasional applications have been made for a naval force; and in every such case a force has been sent out, which has been duly acknowledged to be sufficient for the purpose for which it was demanded. Under these circumstances, it was impossible that I could have allowed the observations of the Noble Viscount on this subject to pass unnoticed, the fact being that the Admiralty never fails to answer every call which is made upon that department for protection.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — There can be no doubt that my Noble Friend has brought this subject under your Lordships' notice with extreme reluctance; and I am sure that he has not taken such a step without mature consideration. My Noble Friend must have been aware of the great inconvenience of discussing questions of this nature in this House; and he must have known, also, that complaints of this kind, directed against a foreign state, and more particularly such a state as France, could not be unattended with the most grave and weighty considerations, from the serious consequences which might result from their discussion. Such are my opinions, and I therefore agree with the Noble Viscount at the head of the Government, that questions of this nature ought to be treated with all calmness and deliberation. But while I make this admission, I must at the same time ask the Noble Viscount what it is that he expects us to do? We see the flag of England despised and outraged in every quarter of the globe. We are every day made aware of the complaints of the mercantile community of want of protection to their trade and commerce; and after vain and fruitless attempts to obtain redress from the Government, we find the merchants of this country addressing this House, and praying for the interference of your Lordships. Under such circumstances, what are we to do? Are we to give to the Government that unmeasured confidence to which they can only be entitled from those who approve of their policy, and who sanction the measures which they adopt? It is impossible for Noble Lords on this side of the House, holding the opinions which they have ever entertained of the Noble Viscount and of his colleagues in the Government, and of their conduct as a Government, to have that confidence in the energy of the Noble Viscount and in the success of his representations and remonstrances with foreign powers which would justify them in remaining silent when questions of this kind are brought under their notice. What encouragement, I ask, have we to place that confidence in the Government of the Noble Viscount? Here is a case of the most flagrant outrage that has ever been committed on our flag and on the commerce of the country, and which, notwithstanding, is, after six years of remonstrance and representations, still unredressed; no result having followed the exercise of the authority possessed by the Government, all their representations and remonstrances having been without effect. At the end of those six years, however, it appears that a commission is appointed. Such a step might be proper in cases of a doubtful character, where there are conflicting claims to be considered and decided; but here there is not a shadow or pretext of excuse for the outrage: such, I believe, is the opinion of those whom the Noble Viscount must know to be the best qualified to decide on subjects of this kind. But we have now a more recent case of outrage; and the Noble Viscount urges, as a reason for not producing the papers relating to this question, that it would be premature to enter into any inquiry at present, as the Government have only recently received an account of the affair. That is, no doubt, a sufficient reason for resisting the motion of my Noble Friend; but if, in reference to this new case, the result is to be six years of fruitless remonstrances, and then the appointment of a commission, the parties aggrieved may feel themselves in the situation which that Noble Viscount has described from Spenser, and will be exposed to all the miseries of hope deferred, and all the evil consequences of delay. We should be cautious, my Lords, no doubt, as to the manner of urging complaints of this kind upon the House; but the case of the present petitioners is not in any way similar to that of Captain Jenkins and others, in the last century, which have been alluded to by the Noble Viscount; for in this case the grievances are real and substantial. Nor are these outrages confined to one particular portion of the globe; for, go where you will, similar grievances meet you in every region. If this is the result of our much-boasted French alliance, then I must say that it bears the most bitter fruit, so far, at least, as the commerce and the prosperity of the country are concerned. No one can be more anxious than I am to preserve peace; and I should be most unwilling to do or say anything which could endanger it. But, then, let us have not only the shadow but the substance. Let us have peace itself,— "non solùm nomen, sed re verâ, salutem." If we are actually at peace, why have we so large a naval force in the Mediterranean? Why have we had, of late years, a revenue unequal to the expenditure— not from any falling off in the revenue itself, but solely on account of the increased expense caused by the military preparations which the Government have thought it necessary to make? I do not complain of those preparations; on the contrary, I approve of them; but still I must say that these things cannot be considered as amongst the sweets of peace. As I do not think that any practical good would result from my Noble Friend's pressing his motion, I trust that he will, notwithstanding the prospect of a commission being appointed,—which may have a result about six years hence,— not press it to a division. At the same time, I hope that the Noble Viscount will assume a tone, both in this House and elsewhere, which shall show that this country is not so totally changed from what she was as to be incapable of exacting reparation for injurious done to its subjects. Let France be as sincere a friend as she is represented to be; still I believe that she would be not less friendly if this country were to show a determination not to pass by such outrages as those to which your Lordships' attention has been directed without obtaining redress. In my opinion, the firm resistance to outrages in the first instance, is the surest way to prevent their recurrence; and, the more firmness that is shown, the more attention will be paid to our remonstrances. I believe that the delay, in this instance, is very much the consequence of remissness in seeking for reparation. I hope, however, that the efforts of the Noble Viscount will hereafter have better success in obtaining redress than that which has hitherto attended his exertions.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD.—After the assurance which I have given the Noble Viscount, that I have had no share in the preparation of the petition I have presented to your Lordships, I trust the Noble Viscount will see the propriety of withdrawing the charge which he has made against me. I certainly did not imagine that the Noble Viscount would object to the production of the papers for which I have moved; but after what has fallen from my Noble Friend (the Earl of Aberdeen), I shall not persist in the motion.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—I am sure, that if the Noble Lord had heard what I actually stated with reference to the petition, he would have admitted that there was no charge whatever made against him. However, I now beg to say, that I did not intend to make any charge against the Noble Lord; and if the Noble Lord feels offended at the observations I have made, I at once withdraw them.

LORD HOLLAND.—I do not think that there would have been anything improper in the statement, even if my Noble Friend had said that the Noble Lord had assisted in the preparation of the petition. There would have been nothing of which the Noble Lord could have had cause to be ashamed, in offering his advice to the petitioners. I cannot see that there would have been any harm in the Noble Lord, who agrees in opinion with the petitioners, suggesting the terms in which the document should be drawn up.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD.—Ay, my Lords, that may be true; but it is a different matter to present a petition to your Lordships under a disguise, and under false pretences.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY.—The Noble Viscount often makes strong charges against Noble Lords on this side of the House; but when similar charges are directed against Noble Lords opposite, the Noble Viscount treats them with a sort of contempt. I can assure the Noble Viscount that there is no disposition on the Opposition side of the House to show temper; and I trust that our debates will always be conducted with calmness. With regard to the charge which has been made against my Noble Friend, I must say, that if my Noble Friend did write the petition, and then go and obtain the signatures of the merchants which are appended to it, such a charge would be one of a grave and serious kind; and I am therefore very glad that the Noble Viscount has apologised to my Noble Friend.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD.—I can assure the Noble Viscount that I never asked, and never expected, him to make an apology. I was perfectly satisfied with the explanation given by the Noble Viscount.

The motion was then, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD ASHBURTON.—I wish to ask the Noble Viscount whether the commission to which he has alluded, sits in London, or in Paris?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—In Paris.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

West Stirlingshire Roads. — Report referred to the Select Committee on Standing Orders.

Exeter Markets. — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Divett and Sir William Follett.

Exeter Port Dues. — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Divett and Sir William Follett.

Glasgow, Paisley, and Greenock Railway. — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Wallace and Lord James Stuart.

Tadcaster and Halton Dial Road. — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Lascelles and Lord Viscount Morpeth.

Newcastle upon Tyne Waterworks. — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hodgson Hinde and Mr. Ord.

Billinghay Fen Drainage. — Petition of owners of land in Billinghay and Kyme, against the application for a Bill. — To lie on the table.

ARDWICK IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. MARK PHILIPS. — Sir, I wish, now, to call the attention of the House to this Bill. It is a Bill for lighting, cleansing, and otherwise improving the town of Ardwick. The commissioners for improving the town of Ardwick, in Lancashire, having obtained leave to bring in a Bill for that purpose, wished to insert a clause, enabling them to purchase land from those who might be willing to sell. That prayer, however, not having been in their original petition, their proceedings, as to it, have been declared to be informal. The notices required by the Standing Orders for the more important parts of the Bill have been given; and it was thought that these would have been sufficient for all the powers required by it; but when before the sub-committee, it was found that the powers to purchase land (which the Bill gives) required some other notices; and these have been omitted. The matter was then referred to the Committee on Standing Orders; who have reported that the Standing Orders have not been complied with, and therefore the Bill cannot proceed, unless the House exercise its dispensing power, and authorise the parties to proceed. I must admit that the whole of the Standing Orders have not been complied with; but the present is a case which would justify the House in interfering. There is a unanimous desire, in the town, that the contemplated improvements should be made; and it is generally admitted that the health of the inhabitants is seriously affected by the want of those improvements. The commissioners have adopted their only course, — namely, to petition the House. That petition I have had the honour to present, and on it my present motion is founded. Under all the circumstances, I think this a case in which the Standing Orders may be dispensed with; and I therefore move "That leave be given to bring in a Bill for better paving, cleansing, lighting, and otherwise improving the township of Ardwick, in the county of Lancaster."

On the question being put, —

SIR E. KNATCHBULL said: — I shall feel it my duty to oppose the motion. There is only one ground on which I could consent to any violation of the authority of the Standing Orders Committee, — namely, the ground of public necessity. No such ground has been urged, and therefore I do not think that a sufficient case has been made out to warrant the House in dispensing with the Standing Orders.

Mr. R. H. GREG.—I can bear testimony that the town is in a dreadful condition, and that fever is raging in many parts of it. I have the certificate of a medical man, which states that all the fevers and other infectious diseases prevalent in the town, are, in a great degree, owing to the want of those improvements which it is the object of the Bill to carry into effect.

Mr. GREENE. — After what I have heard from the Honourable Member for Manchester, I must express my hope that the House will not adopt his proposition, without the most careful consideration. It would, I contend, be productive of general inconvenience to have the Standing Orders dispensed with, except on extraordinary occasions, where a particularly strong case shall have been made out. It was to avoid useless discussion in the House, that the Standing Orders Committee was first appointed. If it shall once become known that the House can be induced to dispense with the Standing Orders, it will be made a constant matter for canvass; and every agent, who for his own reasons may be anxious to dispense with the Standing Orders, will collect a number of Members, come down to the House, and set those Orders at nought. In my opinion, if we do not preserve the authority of the Standing Orders Committee in all cases, we had better abolish the Committee altogether. If parties will not attend to the Standing Orders, it is their own neglect, and should be their own loss; nor should the time of the House be taken up in repairing their errors. I think, that after a question has been discussed in the Standing Orders Committee, and there decided upon, it is a gross breach of the Orders of this House for any Member to attempt, in the House, to set that decision aside. I know it will be urged that we consented to dispense with the Standing Orders in the case of the Greenwich Railway; but that was a very different case. The matter was, in that instance, investigated by the Standing Orders Committee, who thought it of such vital importance, that they made a special Report to the House, and felt that it was a case in which the Standing Orders might be dispensed with. This case stands on different grounds, and therefore I cannot consent that the House should dispense with the Standing Orders.

MR. AGLIONBY. — Sir, having had occasion to consider the question this morning, and having since had the advantage of hearing the opinion of the Honourable Member for Lancaster, I am sorry to say I cannot agee with him in the conclusion to which he has come. I agree, that it is a good general principle to maintain the Standing Orders, but that is not a rule to which there is to be no exception. If by any chance the Standing Orders Committee should mistake their duty, I think it would be a monstrous hardship if this House were not allowed to be a court of appeal, or that we should not be allowed to attend to any special circumstances. I must say that, in this case, the decision of the Standing Orders Committee has not been what I should have expected. The House will, I trust, forgive me for entering, at any length, into the merits of a private Bill; but this is not the case of an individual — it is one affecting the health of a populous town; and, as all the most important notices of the Bill have been complied with, it is a case in which the accidental omission of the less important notices ought to be overlooked. In the sub-committee, of which I have the honour to be chairman, we very often exercise an equitable jurisdiction in the case of petitions; and, I think, so should the House also. If the parties to a Bill shall not have complied with all the Standing Orders, I think that still they might be permitted to go on with that part of their Bill as to which the orders have been complied with. I may be wrong, but I think an equitable jurisdiction might be exercised to this extent. Having this opinion, I shall certainly vote for the motion of the Honourable Member for Manchester.

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — I believe that the Honourable Member for Manchester has rested his defence of this motion on two grounds; first, that the case had been referred to the Standing Orders Committee; and, secondly, that that Committee had been misled by the sub-committee. Now, I can assure the Honourable Member that the Standing Orders Committee were not in the least degree misled in the matter. They were aware that the Standing Orders had not been complied with; and, secondly, they were aware that those orders were so clear that there ought to have been no mistake. For my own part, I have no feeling of jealousy against hearing any decision, in which I may have participated, reviewed by the House; but I think that it would be a very extreme case indeed which would justify such an act. Here is an application in which no such case is made out, and which is at the same time perfectly novel in its character. The parties attempt to split straws, and say, that, although all the Standing Orders have not been complied with, yet that they should be allowed to proceed with such portions of their Bill as are regular and formal. If we allow these attempts to succeed, the appointment of a Standing Orders Committee will be rendered altogether nugatory. The Honourable Member for Manchester has stated, as a reason for consenting to his application, that fever is now raging in the town of Ardwick. I can only say, that no statement of that kind was made before the Standing Orders

Committee; and in the petition in which the parties now ask for the indulgence of the House, the parties are equally silent on the subject. Besides, under their present Bill, the commissioners have ample powers for cleansing the streets. Under these circumstances, I do hope that the House will support the decision of the Committee.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — Sir, I can state, from personal experience, that there is a unanimous feeling in the town of Ardwick in favour of this Bill. I believe that, until the parties actually came before the Standing Orders Committee, they believed that they had complied with all the orders. The House should recollect, also, that the petitioners do not ask for any compulsory powers to purchase; they merely ask for leave to buy where parties are willing to sell. The streets are in a state loudly calling for improvement. And although I am as anxious as any man to see the Standing Orders complied with, I think this is a case which we might fairly make an exception.

SIR G. STRICKLAND.— In my opinion, a case has here been made out which would justify the House in dispensing with the Standing Orders. The Standing Orders Committee, in order to be consistent, are sometimes obliged to draw the line too strictly; and I think that they have done so in this instance; and that, seeing the state of the town, it would only be an act of humanity to allow the parties to proceed with their Bill.

Mr. ESTCOURT. — I shall feel it to be necessary to oppose the motion. The most important of the notices required by the Standing Orders have been omitted; and I see no ground why they should be dispensed with. If the House interfere in such a case as the present, the Standing Orders will be worse than useless; as every party in whose case the Committee shall come to an adverse decision, will appeal to the House. It would be better that the House should at once take the decision in all cases of Standing Orders into its own hands.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — If I thought that the Standing Orders Committee had come to their decision on a full knowledge of the case, I should be as averse as any man to appeal to this House from its decision. It does, however, appear to me, that the Committee have not had under their consideration the whole question, as it is now before the House; but that, on the contrary, they have only ascertained that a particular order had not been complied with. It appears to me, that the question is at best but one of construction, and that the construction of the Committee has been too strict. I cannot forget what passed in this House on a former day. On that occasion, I took the liberty of saying that a new petition ought to be presented, supposing that the Standing Orders Committee had not had the subject fully under their consideration. You, Sir, suggested — and the suggestion was important — that such a course would lead to second proceedings in every case; and that it would be better at once to raise the question which is now before the House. In my opinion, that was the fairest course; and that having been adopted in this case the only question left for us to consider is, whether we shall, — having ascertained that, in substantial matters, the proceedings have been regular, — refuse these people the means of making their town clean and healthy.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON.—I was on the Standing Orders Committee when permission to proceed with this Bill was refused; and, although always anxious to support the authority of the Committee, I confess that I joined in the refusal in this case with reluctance. The case is admitted to be a hard one; and, though I admit that the Standing Orders Committee have acted in conformity with their general rule, yet there are circumstances in this case which would justify the House in exercising its power, and in dispensing with the Standing Orders.

Mr. SANFORD. — The Honourable Members who support this motion seem to have totally misunderstood what is really the duty of the Standing Orders Committee. The duty of that Committee is not to see that the Standing Orders have been complied with, but to decide when they may fairly be dispensed with. I do not see that they can be dispensed with in this case; and I am afraid that if we now relax the rule, we shall be opening a door for every kind of abuse. Under these circumstances, I must give a decided negative to the motion.

CAPTAIN EGERTON. — Sir, the Honourable Member for Oxford University founds his opposition on the grounds that special and urgent circumstances should be alleged as reasons for any deviation from the Standing Orders. I think that there are special and urgent circumstances in this case. We have the Report of the town commissioners as to the deplorable state of the town. They state that the sewers are all stopped up, and they recommend that a Bill like the present should be brought in. In such a case, I trust the Bill will be allowed to proceed. I would be the last to damage the authority of the Standing Orders; but there are special circumstances in this case which, in my opinion, recommend it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Mr. M. PHILIPS. — I quite agree with Honourable Members, that the Standing Orders are entitled to great weight; but if ever there was a case in which they might be dispensed with, the present is such a case.

Question put, and the House divided: — Ayes 56, Noes 99; Majority 43.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS,

That they do request, that this House will be pleased to give leave to William Crawford, Esquire, a Member of this House, to attend their Lordships, to be sworn, in order to his being examined as a witness before the Select Committee appointed by their Lordships on the petition of the East India Company, complaining of grievances, and for relief.

Mr. Crawford, in his place, having consented; leave given him to attend, if he think fit. Messengers called in, and acquainted therewith.

NEWPORT CONVICTS.

Mr. LEADER. — Sir, I wish to put a question to the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies. The notice which I have given respecting Frost, Jones, and Williams has appeared upon the Votes several times. I have attended the House every day on which that notice has appeared upon the Votes, and I have done all I could to bring the question before the House; but I have been unsuccessful in that endeavour. I do not, however, charge the Government with having been the cause of this; because I was really induced once or twice to put off the motion, in consequence of representations made to me by the counsel for the prisoners, that there were negotiations pending between them and the Government, which might be damaged by my then bringing the question before the House. Being influenced by that opinion, of course I would not have proceeded with my motion, even if I had had the opportunity of bringing the question before the House. I understand that the prisoners have already left the country. I do not mean to say that the Government had not a right to send them out of the country, if they pleased; but I think they might have waited a few days longer, in order to give the House of Commons an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the subject; and they ought not to have taken it for granted that the House of Commons would agree with them. However, as the prisoners have sailed, and as the question at issue, which is a constitutional question, and one affecting the administration of the law, will not, now, be at all prejudiced by my putting off my motion, I wish to give notice that I shall bring the question before the House on the first notice night in the week after next. I therefore merely wish to ask the Noble Lord whether it is true that the prisoners have sailed; and if the Noble Lord tells me they have sailed for their destination, then I wish to give notice that I shall endeavour to have the question at issue discussed in the House on Tuesday week. If the prisoners have not sailed, then I shall feel justified in asking the House to have the question discussed immediately.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I beg to inform the Honourable Member that the prisoners have sailed from Portsmouth for New South Wales.

THE CHURCH IN NEW SOUTH WALES.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord a question respecting New South Wales. I have learned from the newspapers of that colony that there has been in the Legislative Council a measure propounded by the Governor for the general education of the youth of that colony. It appears that, by that measure, the Roman Catholic youth of the colony are to be educated in one school, in the principles of their own religion; but that all the other youth of the colony are to be educated in one common school, in which, in order to avoid religious dissensions, no religious instruction is to be given; — a plan, therefore, extending to the Roman Catholics the benefits of religious instruction, but withholding it from the children of parents professing other religions. This proposition has, however, not met with the approbation of the Legislative Council. Now, what I wish to ask is, whether this proposition has been made by the Governor in consequence of any directions from the Government at home?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — In answer to the Right Honourable Member, I would, in the first place, observe, that I have received no despatches on this subject from the Governor of that colony; therefore all the information which I have upon it is, probably, derived from the same source as that from which the Right Honourable Gentleman has derived his information, — namely, from private letters and the colonial newspapers. I, however, form from their contents a somewhat different conclusion to that which the Right Honourable Gentleman has arrived at. I understand that the Governor did make a proposition to the Legislative Council of the colony on the subject of the education of the youth of the colony. He proposed that there should be one system of general instruction to all classes of Protestants, and that the plan to be pursued should be in conformity with that acted upon by the British and Foreign School Society. The Right Honourable Gentleman has stated that this is a system of which religious instruction does not form a part. Now, the fact is, that a part of the instruction imparted in the British and Foreign Schools is reading in the Bible. If the Right Honourable Gentleman adopts the language of another person, who has stated that there is no religious instruction in connection with this society; and that instruction in the Bible does not in itself constitute religious instruction, I must say that I differ from him in his construction. However, the proposition of the Governor was, that all the Protestant children should be taught reading in the Holy Scriptures, according to the system pursued in the schools belonging to the British and Foreign School Society. With respect to the Roman Catholic children, I understand that it was proposed that there should be separate schools for them, and that the religious instruction to be imparted to them should be by their own teachers. Great objections were made to this proposition in the colony, and the Governor did not persist in it. I do not find that any instructions have been sent out to the Governor of that colony authorising him to make this proposition. I can only repeat, that in the schools in which the Protestant children were to be taught, it was proposed to instruct on the plan of the British and Foreign School Society.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I beg to remind the Noble Lord, that my question was not, as to whether or not any Scripture instruction was to be given in the schools proposed to be established for the Protestant children; but it was, whether the children of Roman Catholics were to have provision made for their education, in their exclusive schools, in the Roman Catholic religion, while the children of the members of the Church of England were to be educated in schools from which religious instruction, in connection with the Church of England, was to be excluded.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I have only to say, in reply, that I have received no official information on the subject; but I imagine that it was proposed that the religious instruction for the children of Protestants was to be given in their schools, and that they were to be taught to read the Holy Scriptures, — of course, not excluding them from religious instruction by their respective clergymen. The instruction in the Roman Catholic schools was to be in conformity with the faith the children professed. I, however, can only repeat, that I have received no official information on the subject; I, therefore, cannot give any further explanation.

PRISONS ACT.

Mr. BARNEBY. — I wish to know from the Honourable Under Secretary whether the Home Office has made any inquiries as to the extent to which the Prisons Act of last Session has been carried into operation, and as to whether its provisions have been adhered to?

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I can inform the Honourable Member that no inquiries have been instituted by the Home Office, as to whether or not the provisions of the Act have been adhered to; but in all cases in which the Act has been adopted, information has been forwarded to the Home Office. I did not receive due notice of the Honourable Member's intention to ask the question. I therefore can give him no further answer, now, but shall be happy to do so on a future occasion.

METROPOLITAN POLICE ACT.

COLONEL T. WOOD. — I wish to ask whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill or Bills to alter or amend these Acts of last Session, — namely, the Metropolitan Police Act, and the Metropolitan Police Courts Act; and, if so, whether they will be brought in on an early day?

Mr. F. MAULE. — In reply to the Honourable Member, I beg to say, that it is not the intention of the Government to introduce any Bill to alter or amend the Metropolitan Police Act; but they do intend to make some amendments in the latter measure.

PERTHSHIRE WRIT.

SIR G. CLERK. — I move that the Order of the Day for the examination of the Deputy Clerk of the Crown be now read.

The Order of the Day having been read, the Clerk of the Crown was called in, and examined respecting the issue of two writs for the shire of Perth, and the order sent from his office to the sheriff to return the writ first issued.

SIR G. CLERK. — Are you the Deputy Clerk of the Crown? — I am.

Is it your duty to make out the new writs for Members of this House? — It is.

When did you receive the Speaker's warrant for the Perthshire election? — The chief clerk, in my office, received a warrant from the Speaker on Friday last. I understand that the warrant for the new writ was received at about ten minutes to seven o'clock. The new writ for the county of Perth was made out immediately on the receipt of the warrant. It was then sent to the Lord Chancellor's office, for the purpose of being sealed; it was then finally despatched to the Post Office.

At what hour? — At about a quarter past seven.

Was the writ made out in conformity with the Speaker's warrant? — The writ was not made out in exact conformity with the warrant of the Speaker; as the chief clerk made it out in the usual form, that Viscount Stormont was called up to the House of Peers. Shortly afterwards, he found that he had not issued it in exact conformity with the Speaker's warrant; and this erroneous writ had been despatched by Friday's evening mail. He immediately prepared another, which he got sealed, and took care to have it sent away by the mail on Saturday morning.

At what time was the mistake discovered? — I believe that the chief clerk discovered it shortly afterwards, — perhaps within an hour or less of its being sent away. He discovered it before he left the office. He prepared the writ in the usual way in which it would have been in similar proceedings. The first writ has been returned to me by the sheriff.

What was first done on discovering the mistake? — I understand that, immediately on the discovery of the case, the chief clerk came to the House, and had an audience of the Speaker, and asked his advice as to the course he should pursue. The Speaker, however, declined to give any advice. The chief clerk, therefore, took upon himself to make out and issue a fresh writ; and if I had been in the way, I should have given instructions for this purpose, and have taken care that a new writ should be immediately issued. The first writ was returned to my office by the sheriff of Perthshire, in conformity with the instructions of the chief clerk.

Is there any precedent for those instructions of the chief clerk? — I am not aware of any precedent for ordering a writ to be returned to the office. I believe the chief clerk desired to have the writ returned; and I know the sheriff did return it.

Are any copies of the letters which passed preserved at your office? — They are not.

Have you any further explanation to give of the circumstances of this case? — I have only further to say, that it has been the long-established custom of the Crown Office to send off writs, if possible, by the mail, on the night on which the Speaker's warrant is issued. In this case, we had to prepare two writs; and that was the reason why the mistake occurred.

The Clerk of the Crown was then ordered to withdraw.

SIR GEORGE CLERK. — Sir, I think that, after the facts which have been stated by the Clerk of the Crown, it will be generally felt that I was fully justified in calling the attention of the House to this subject. It appears, from the evidence given by the Clerk of the Crown, that whatever has been done with regard to issuing the writ, has not been done by the Clerk of the Crown in person, but by his chief clerk. As far as I can gather from his evidence, it appears to be the practice of the office, that, on receiving information that a new writ would probably be moved for at the meeting of the House, the Clerk of the Crown at once prepares the writ. Perhaps that plan is attended with general convenience. It appears that, on the present occasion, the Clerk of the Crown exercised his discretion on the subject, and naturally conceived that the writ to be moved for on Friday would be made out in exact accordance with new writs in similar cases. In consequence of the discussion which had taken place in the House, the regular form was departed from in the warrant; and so the mistake has arisen. It appears, from the evidence of the Clerk of the Crown, that though the writ was not sent to the Lord Chancellor to be sealed until the warrant was received, yet it was despatched without the warrant having been read. There is another point of some importance, as being without precedent. It is without precedent that the Clerk of the Crown, and still more his subordinate officer, should take upon himself to write to a sheriff to order him to return a writ which had been issued from the office. This House has always exercised the greatest jealousy in reserving to itself the discretion of issuing, suspending, or superseding new writs; and therefore I think it is a question deserving of the consideration of the House, whether, in cases of this kind, a special Report should not have been made to the House, in order that the error might be corrected, the first writ superseded, and the new writ issued by the authority of the House. No practical inconvenience has arisen in the present case; but there does not appear any sufficient justification for the clerk's negligence in despatching the writ the moment he received the warrant, without taking the ordinary precaution of reading the warrant, in order to make out the writ in conformity. I think that the Clerk of the Crown should not be allowed to exercise any discretion, but should implicitly obey the orders of the House. I trust that Honourable Gentlemen will agree that this case, at all events, ought not to be drawn into a precedent. Under these circumstances, I do not wish to pursue the question further, but I hope that greater care will be taken in the issuing of writs in future.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I think the Honourable Baronet was quite right in calling the attention of the House to this subject. It does not appear that there was any error in the warrant of the Speaker, but that it has occurred entirely in the office of the Clerk of the Crown. It is quite right that this case, and every other case of a similar nature, should be brought under the notice of the House; and I agree with the Honourable Baronet, that, attention having been called to it, it is to be hoped that no similar error may arise.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS — LUDLOW ELECTION PETITION.

Mr. ORD. — Sir, having the honour to be chairman of the General Committee of Elections, it is my duty, in consequence of the circumstances detailed in the special Report which I presented on a late evening, in the case of the Ludlow election petition, to move, "That the order of the 19th of February, for the attendance of panels No. 1. and 2. on the 12th and 16th of March, be discharged, and that the petition of George Hooper and others be referred to the General Committee of Elections."

The SOLICITOR GENERAL.—Sir, the Honourable Member who has just sat down has called my attention to the difficulty in which the General Committee of Elections find themselves in reference to this subject; and has consulted me as to the course which ought to be taken. With the permission of the House I will state what the difficulty is, and what appears to me to be the remedy. The difficulty has arisen from this circumstance,—that the Ludlow election petition is an election petition of last Session. By the 93d section of the Bill brought in by the Right Honourable Baronet opposite, it is enacted, that all petitions of a former Session should be brought forward before any petitions of the present Session. I believe that any petition, when so brought forward in the present Session, will be subject to all the provisions which would apply, supposing the petition had been, in fact, presented in the present Session;—being treated as the first petition of the Session. It appears that, in the Ludlow election petition, the sitting Member has declined the defence of his seat; and that certain electors have petitioned to be let in, to defend in his stead. The clauses which relate to such a state of things I have read to the House. The first section which applies to it is the 19th, which provides, that when the sitting Member shall decline defending his seat, notice thereof shall be given in the London Gazette. By section 20. it is provided, that the electors may be let in to defend, in his place; and, upon their admission, that the petition should be treated in all respects as an election petition. Section 30. provides, that all election petitions, and petitions treated as election petitions, shall be referred to the General Committee; that proceedings, in cases where the sitting Member shall decline defending his seat, shall be suspended for thirty days after the appearance of the required notice in the London Gazette. It provides, further, that the General Committee shall make out a list of petitions, putting them in the order in which they have been reported on by the examiner of recognisances; and not including in the list any petition in which the proceedings shall have been suspended; that is, petitions in which the sitting Member shall have declined to defend his seat. In every case in which proceedings shall be afterwards suspended, it is provided, that the petition shall be struck out of the list of the General Committee, and placed at the bottom of the list. This section, therefore, directs that the list to be prepared shall not contain any election petitions in which proceedings have been suspended; and also contemplates cases in which proceedings may be suspended afterwards. It is material to observe this, because it is on this section, I believe, that the present difficulty turns. The 47th section directs the General Committee to give three weeks' notice of the day appointed for choosing a Special Committee, and requires those Special Committees to be chosen in the order in which they stand on the list. The 48th section provides, that notice of the day shall be given to all parties, including the parties let in to defend instead of the sitting Member. These are the questions affecting this case. The House will bear in mind that the Honourable Member has told us that the Ludlow election petition was referred to the General Committee, who, believing it regular, proceeded to appoint the day for nominating the Special Committee, and to give the proper notices. It was afterwards discovered that, by reason of the omission to refer to the Committee the petition of the electors praying to be let in to defend, there was no provision for giving notice to the parties connected with that petition, and, therefore, that the petition had never been properly before them. The day is now approaching on which the Special Committees should be nominated in the order in which the petitions stand on the list. The Ludlow petition stands early on the list, and the Committee, for the reasons I have mentioned, are not in a situation to nominate the Special Committee upon it. The question, then, is, what are they to do with the remainder of the petitions; whether to postpone all, or to postpone the Ludlow Committee only, and proceed to nominate the others? It has been proposed to postpone all; but I submit, that that will not be necessary. It would induce an inconvenience by no means necessarily resulting from the Act of Parliament. By section 30., the Legislature has provided for cases in which, after petitions have been put upon the list, proceedings are suspended, by directing such petitions to be struck out of the list, and placed at the bottom. I think, therefore, from the short consideration which I have been able to give to the question, that there will be no difficulty in the General Committee striking the Ludlow petition out of the list, and placing it at the bottom. They will then be a situation to proceed with the nomination of the other Committees. I may further observe, that if this particular case is not exactly provided for by the Act, it should be borne in mind that those sections in the Act which have reference to the point are what, in legal construction, are held to be directory clauses. It is well known that in every Act of Parliament there are clauses which, though positive in their directions, and obligatory on the parties, yet do not, in their breach, involve the validity of the entire proceedings; and therefore, though the House is bound to adhere to them, and, in certain cases, parties may be punished for not doing so, yet, if the necessity of the case should compel steps to be taken which the Act does not provide for, such circumstances do not affect the validity of the proceedings under that Act.

Mr. ORD.—Perhaps it would be better to withdraw my motion, if the course pointed out by the Solicitor General be the proper one to be adopted.

SIR G. CLERK.—I should wish to know whether the question is settled?

SIR GEORGE GREY.—If the construction of my Learned Friend the Solicitor General be now adopted by the House, the General Committee may at once place the Ludlow Committee at the bottom of the list, and proceed to nominate the other Committees.

SIR GEORGE CLERK.—I did not gather from the observations of the Learned Solicitor General, that, in his opinion, the General Committee has authority to suspend the proceedings in the Ludlow petition only. No doubt it would be productive of advantage if they had; but it appears to me that an order should be made, for the purpose, by the House itself. The provisions of the Act show the greatest jealousy of allowing the General Committee to alter any of the arrangements by which the Committees are chosen.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I think, looking to the provisions of the 30th section, that the General Committee might exercise the power of striking out the Ludlow petition from the list, and placing it at the bottom. The words of that section, which occur to me as giving the power, are,—"In every case in which proceedings shall be afterwards suspended, those proceedings shall be again struck out, and placed at the bottom of the list.

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — We must all agree that there is great doubt whether the Committee could exercise such a power, or that that difficulty should be got over. I do not think that the case now before us is provided for by the 30th section.

SIR E. SUGDEN.—I think it would be desirable that this question should be adjourned till Monday, to give time for consideration. I am disposed to think that the Committee have not the power, of themselves, to place the Ludlow petition at the bottom of the list. If the House will look to the 48th section of the Act, they will find these words: — "The last-mentioned notices shall be given to all the parties petitioning, and the petitions shall then be referred to the General Committee." Here the petition has not been so referred. I think it is of the greatest importance that we should not let in cases not provided for by the Act. The cases in which election petitions can be struck out are specially provided for; and this does not appear to one of them.

SIR R. INGLIS.—My Honourable Friend the Member for Buckingham seems to think that the course recommended by the Solicitor General would be safe, provided the Committee have a discretionary power; but I think that, even if the Committee had a discretion in the matter, they would not be willing to act on it. I do not think it would be safe for them to look to any lower authority than that of a resolution of the House.

SIR R. PEEL. — The difficulty, in this case, arises from the petition having been presented last Session. The petitioners were allowed to come in, to defend; but, by some chance, the petition was not referred to the General Committee. The question now is, what course we should adopt? It appears to me of the greatest importance that the course which we take shall be consistent with justice to the individuals concerned, and shall not be such as to establish an inconvenient or dangerous precedent. I think it desirable that we should have the opportunity of a few hours' consideration. I think the Honourable and Learned Solicitor General observed that he had not had time fully to consider the Act. If the Honourable and Learned Gentleman had had time to express a positive opinion, that opinion would be decisive with me. It is, therefore, with perfect respect for his legal opinion, that I suggest that it might be advisable to take some time for consideration. There are two questions,—one is, whether the General Committee has the power of suspension in this case, which I confess I have some doubt of. It should be recollected, that our inherent and constitutional power is fettered by positive enactment; and if the power of the Committee should be doubted, another question may arise,—whether the House has power to make an order on the subject? I trust it will be found that the House has that power, because no authority but the House can exercise it satisfactorily. I submit that there will be no inconvenience in the delay; and if the debate be adjourned till Monday, perhaps, in the mean time, the Learned Solicitor General will have the goodness maturely to consider the question.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I have no objection to the postponement of the debate: on the contrary, I think that, under the circumstances, postponement is desirable. I wish to give no opinion upon the point at issue. I am inclined, so far as a bias goes, to think that, if the General Committee can decide the question, it ought to be decided by them. One of the inconveniences of the former practice would be, that so many questions must be brought up, for the decision of the House. Questions of this nature can be decided with much more deliberation in the Committee than by the House at large.

Question put,—" That the order for the attendance of Panels Nos. 1. and 2. on the 12th and 16th of March, be discharged."—Debate thereupon adjourned till Monday next.

Petition of George Hooper and others, to be admitted parties to defend the return of Thomas Alcock, Esquire,—referred to the General Committee of Elections.

SERVICE OF NOTICES.

SIR GEORGE CLERK.—Having already called the attention of the House to the fact of the improper service of the notices for the Ludlow election petition, I shall not detain the House further than by moving that Mr. Rose, clerk to the General Committee on Elections, be called in and examined.

Mr. John Benson Rose called in, and examined.

SIR G. CLERK.—You are the clerk appointed to attend the General Committee of Selection for Election Petitions?—I am.

What notices to the parties affected by the Ludlow election petition did you make out by the order of the Committee to be signed by the chairman?—There was a notice made out to Thomas Alcock, Esq., and another to the petitioners against the return, John Thomas and Richard Marston.

Upon what day were those notices made out by you, and signed by the chairman?—The 18th of this month.

To whom did you deliver those notices for the purpose of being served on the parties?—I delivered them to a messenger of the House, Mr. Stein.

What directions did you give him with regard to those notices?—I instructed him that they were to be delivered to the parties in the same manner as they were delivered in the last Session of Parliament, and in previous Sessions.

Did you state in what manner,—whether by personal service on the parties, or on their agents?—I did not state in what manner.

Did the messenger afterwards inform you that he had served those notices on the several parties?—He did not.

Was it his duty to have reported to you whether he had obeyed the directions which he had received from you in that respect?—I hardly know; I should conceive it was his duty, if he had not been able to serve them, to have informed me of the circumstance.

Have you received any information since, that the notices so delivered by you to the messenger were not served upon the petitioners Thomas and Marsden, or upon their agent?—I have received that information.

From whom did you receive that information?—From Mr. Ellis, one of the partners in the house of Lyon, Barnes, and Ellis.

The agents of the petitioners?—The agents of the petitioners.

On what day did you receive that notice?—On Monday last.

Did you then make any inquiry as to what had become of the notices which you had delivered to the messenger?—I did.

What information did he give you with respect to them?—I found that, by some accident, the notice intended for the petitioners against the return had been taken by an agent as a notice intended for the petitioners praying to defend the return.

Were the names of the persons upon whom the notice was to be served entered in the body of the notice, or indorsed upon it?—They were at the bottom of the notice: it was directed to them.

What has become of those notices?—That I do not know.

Have they ever been served upon the proper parties? — They could not have been duly served upon the proper parties, because there was no time to do it. I know not what has become of the notices since; I have seen them since.

In whose possession did you see them? — In the possession of Mr. Coppock.

Is he the agent for the sitting Member? — I do not know.

Is he the agent for the petitioners defending the return? — I believe not; he told me he was not, but that I cannot know.

Did he assign any reason to you, he being not the agent for the petitioners defending Mr. Alcock's return, why he retained the notice addressed to persons not being his clients? — He gave no reason; it was evidently a mistake on his part taking the notice.

How long did he retain them in his possession? — I presume he has them now; I do not know.

When did you see them in the possession of Mr. Coppock? — On Tuesday morning last.

Do you know when they were delivered to Mr. Coppock by the messenger to whom you gave them? — I do not.

Did Mr. Coppock tell you how those notices came into his possession? — He did not.

And you are not aware how it was that they did? — I am not.

What is the name of the messenger to whom you intrusted those notices? — Mr. Stein.

Why did you apply to Mr. Stein? — He is the oldest messenger of the House, I believe, and a very efficient messenger.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Have you any reason to suppose that he had been accustomed to serve notices under the former practice of the House? — I have reason to suppose so.

Did you give Mr. Stein any directions respecting those notices you had put in his possession? — I did give him directions.

What was the nature of those directions? — That he was to serve them in the same manner as he had served similar notices in previous Sessions.

Did he state to you what was the mode in which he had served notices in previous Sessions? — I questioned him a little; I thought it my duty to see that he knew, coming from a new source, that they were notices upon election parties to defend election petitions; when I found that he knew distinctly what they were, I questioned him no further.

Did he inform you at all of the mode in which he was in the habit of serving notices of that description? — Yes, he told me that he served them usually upon the agent.

Did he inform you by what means he ascertained the fact who were the agents of the parties who were petitioning? — He told me he usually got the information from the Recognisance Office; but that sometimes he could not get the information.

Mr. W. MILES.—Did he state how he got the information who was the agent for the sitting Member under the former practice? — He did not.

Were any of the notices directed to Mr. Coppock? — None to Mr. Coppock.

Under what circumstances did Mr. Coppock exhibit the notices to you?—I called upon Mr. Coppock to find out in what respect the mistake lay.

What induced you to call upon Mr. Coppock? — I understood from the messenger that Mr. Coppock had the notices in his possession.

Was that from the same messenger, Mr. Stein? — No, from another.

What was the name of the messenger who stated that to you? — Mr. Poingdestre.

Mr. GOULBURN.—Have you adopted the same course with respect to the notices in the other petitions which appears to have been adopted in the Ludlow petition? — The same course has been adopted.

Have you employed the same messenger in delivering those notices? — I delivered them all to Mr. Stein.

Did he serve them correctly in the other instances? — I am not aware whether he has or not; I believe they have been served correctly, but I do not know.

You are not acquainted, in general, with the names of the agents to whom you send the notices? — No.

Mr. HOLMES. — The House understood you to say, that you directed the messenger to convey the notices to the agents without knowing their names? — No; I did not direct him to convey them to the agents: they are directed to the parties; and I was informed by the messenger that the usual way was to serve them upon the agents.

You are not acquainted, at the time you direct those notices to be conveyed, with the name of the agent? — Certainly not.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — The House is to understand that the parties to whom those notices were to be directed were Mr. Alcock, on the one hand, and the petitioners, on the other? — Exactly.

To no one else? — No.

Mr. HOLMES. — Are you clerk of the recognisances? — No.

Who is? — Mr. Booth is the examiner of recognisances.

If you had gone to his office, could you not have seen who was the agent of the petitioners? — The recognisances in the Ludlow case were entered in the Recognisance Office in the Session of 1839: in that Session of Parliament, Mr. Rose, my father, was clerk of the recognisances.

Could you not, by reference to that office, have discovered who the agent of the petitioners was? — Undoubtedly, of the petitioners against the return.

By referring to that office, you could ascertain who the agents were? — Yes.

And you did not do so? — It was not my duty to do so; if the messengers were in the habit of doing so before, I presumed they would do so again in this case. I had not the delivery of the notices.

When you saw those two notices, that were directed to Mr. Marsden and Mr. Thomas, on Tuesday last, did the person who showed them to you offer to return them to you? — There was no direct offer to return them. I dare say I might have taken them away; but when I had made myself acquainted with the fact, I left the office. I have no doubt that I might have taken away the notice; but it was so much waste paper at that time.

Did the individual who showed you those two notices offer to leave them with you;—did he hand them to you to retain? — I really cannot say whether he did or not, or what was his motive in handing them to me; I conceived it was only to show them to me.

Where was it that you saw them? Was it in your own office?—In Mr. Coppock's office.

Why did you go to Mr. Coppock's office? — To discover the mistake — in what particular the mistake lay.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — What induced you to go to Mr. Coppock's office to ascertain whether he had possession of the notices that were intended for the petitioners? — To discover the mistake. I was informed by the messenger, Mr. Poingdestre, that Mr. Coppock had taken the two notices.

Where had Mr. Coppock taken the notices from? — That I cannot tell. I have heard; but the messenger would be a better witness to that fact.

Will you explain to the House what you mean by the expression that Mr. Coppock had taken the notices? — That was the expression I used, and I believe it was the fact, though I do not know it, that Mr. Coppock had taken the notices from the messenger. I spoke unadvisedly when I used that expression; but I believe, notwithstanding, that to be the fact.

Which messenger? — Mr. Poingdestre.

Mr. DARBY. — Have you inquired at the Recognisance Office, for the purpose of ascertaining who was the agent for Mr. Alcock? — I should not, I conceive, find, in the Recognisance Office, who was his agent; but I have not inquired.

Have you inquired at the Recognisance Office to ascertain who was the agent for the petitioners? — No, I have not.

Could you have gained that information if you had inquired? — I could, undoubtedly.

But you have not? — No.

Did you ask Mr. Coppock, when you were at his office, where he had got those notices from? — No.

Why did you not make the inquiry? — For several reasons: it was not the direction of the Committee to address the notices to the agent. The Act says that they are to be directed to the parties; and they were, in this case, directed to the parties. It was directed by the Committee that those notices should be served in the way they had been under the 9th Geo. IV. cap. 22. The messengers better knew that mode than I did.

When you say Mr. Coppock took the notices, you mean that he received them? — Yes, certainly; that is what I mean.

The witness was directed to withdraw.

Mr. Charles Stein called in, and examined.

SIR G. CLERK. — Did you receive from Mr. Rose certain notices to deliver to the parties concerned in the Ludlow election? — I did.

Can you state upon what day you received those notices? — I cannot recollect the day.

Did Mr. Rose give you any directions as to what you were to do with those notices? — He told me they were to be served upon the different parties.

Did you serve them? — No, I did not.

What did you do with them? — I gave them to a messenger, Poingdestre, who is appointed to serve the orders of the House. He was not in the House at the time; but about a quarter of an hour after I received the orders from Mr. Rose, I gave the orders to him.

What orders did you give to him?—The orders for the Ludlow election, and the Ipswich.

What directions did you give to him with respect to serving those notices? — I told Poingdestre, if he was in a difficulty in finding the agents, he had better inquire of Mr. Parkes or Mr. Coppock, and he would perhaps obtain some information from those gentlemen.

Were they agents for either of the parties? — Mr. Coppock is, I believe.

Is Mr. Parkes an agent? — No.

Why did you direct the messenger to go to Mr. Parkes? —Because Mr. Parkes, being used to election petitions, knows a great many agents, where, even, he is not the agent himself.

Did Poingdestre afterwards inform you whether he had served the notices according to your direction? — No, he did not.

Have you ascertained, since, that they were not so delivered? — I have, since, that they were given to the wrong person.

Do you know, of your own knowledge, to whom he delivered them? — I heard that he delivered them to Mr. Coppock.

From whom did you hear that?—From himself.

You know nothing of your own knowledge, except what you heard from Poingdestre? — No.

Was there any difference in the practice on the present occasion, and that which had been pursued in former Sessions of Parliament? — Yes, there was.

What is the difference in that practice? — Every messenger has a different station assigned to him this Session; one attends in one place, and one in another; and one is appointed to deliver the orders entirely: formerly, the four messengers attended to the delivering of orders.

Mr. GREENE. — You have been in the habit of receiving notices of this description in former Sessions of Parliament? — I have.

Was there any difference in the directions given to you upon this occasion and former occasions? — No.

Did you receive any fuller directions in former Sessions of Parliament than you received upon the present occasion, as to the persons to whom you were to deliver those notices? — No, precisely the same.

Then the whole of the proceedings on this occasion were the same as they had been in former Sessions of Parliament? — Exactly so.

Mr. GOULBURN. — You told Poingdestre to apply to Mr. Parkes or Mr. Coppock, to obtain information as to the party to whom he should deliver those notices? — I told him he might go to the Recognisance Office to Mr. Rose; and if he could not acquire information, he was to inquire as well as he could.

You mentioned that you advised him to apply to Mr. Parkes or Mr. Coppock? — I merely mentioned, by way of getting information, that they might inform him who the parties were. When I had orders, several times I have applied to Mr. Parkes; and he gave me information.

Do you adopt that course with respect to other notices in other election petitions? — If it is necessary.

Always going to Mr. Parkes or Mr. Coppock for information? — No.

Occasionally doing it? — Occasionally.

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — You stated that, in previous Sessions of Parliament, you have been employed to serve notices with respect to election petitions? — Yes, I have.

Have you, on those occasions, served those notices yourself, or have you employed this messenger Poingdestre? — I have always served them myself.

Why, in this Session, have you omitted to serve them yourself, and employed others? — I am not appointed to leave orders; my duty is in another part of the House.

In previous Sessions of Parliament you have served election notices yourself? — Not always; four messengers attended and served the orders of the House.

If you were directed to serve them, did you serve them yourself? — I always then served them myself; I never employed any other person.

Why did you, on this occasion, employ Poingdestre, when Mr. Rose placed them in your hands? — Poingdestre was appointed to serve the orders of the House; he is particularly appointed to that duty; he does not do anything else.

Can you state why you received the notices from Mr. Rose, and transferred them to somebody else, instead of serving them? — It was the duty of Poingdestre to leave the orders and notices; it was not my duty.

It was your duty in former Sessions to do so occasionally? — Yes.

But it was not your duty in this Session? — No.

The witness was directed to withdraw.

Mr. James Poingdestre was called in, and examined.

SIR G. CLERK. — What is your name? — Poingdestre.

Did you receive certain notices from the messenger, Stein, to deliver to the parties in the Ludlow election petition? — I did.

What directions did you receive from Stein, as to the delivery of those notices? — To inquire of certain agents if it was possible to give me any information with regard to the agents who were concerned in the Ludlow and Ipswich, or any other petitions.

Did he give you the name of the agent of the parties in the Ludlow case? — He did not.

To what agents did he direct you to apply for information? — To Mr. Parkes, or Mr. Coppock.

What did you do in consequence of his direction? — I met Mr. Coppock in the lobby of the House, and I asked him if he could give me any information,—knowing that he had been concerned in these matters before; and he said, if I gave the notices to him, it would be all right, as he was concerned in it; I then delivered them to him.

You had notices addressed to several parties given you by Stein? — Yes.

Did you deliver all the notices in your possession to Coppock?—All, except one.

What was that? — That was addressed to Sir Thomas Cochrane, the sitting Member.

All the other notices you delivered to Mr. Coppock? — Yes, at his desire; he said it would be all right.

Were those the notices with respect to the Ludlow and the Ipswich cases? — They were; there were three of them.

Can you state to whom they were addressed? — To the petitioners and the sitting Member.

In both cases? — In both cases.

How long have you been a messenger of this House? — Three years.

Can you inform the House upon what day it was that you delivered all those notices to Mr. Coppock? — On the 18th instant.

Did you tell Mr. Coppock what notices they were? — I asked him if he could give me any information with regard to the agents who were concerned on the election for Ludlow upon the trial.

On both sides? — On both sides. He then asked me to show them to him, which I did; and he requested me to deliver them to him, as he was concerned in them; which I accordingly did, not having any other direction or instruction what I was to do, except to deliver them to the agents who were concerned.

Did you understand from Mr. Coppock that he was the agent for both the petitioner and the sitting Member in either of those cases? — I understood him as saying so.

That he was agent on both sides? — That he was concerned in the matter.

Did he state that he was concerned for both sides? — He did not.

Did you consider that it was consistent with your duty to deliver the notices, that were intended for the opposite parties, to the agent of one of them? — He requested me to deliver them to him, stating that the trial would not come on, and that it would be all right if I delivered them to him; he stated that the trial would not come on.

What did you understand by that? — That the petition trial would not come on.

Did he give you any reason? — He did not.

Have you ever been in the habit of delivering notices previously to this Session? — Not of that kind.

Had you been in the habit of delivering notices to Mr. Coppock previously? — Never.

Why did you deliver those notices to Mr. Coppock, instead of to the parties to whom they were severally addressed? — It is generally done, that the agents are to be served with them; it is only addressed to the petitioner and sitting Member; we are not to know but by inquiring the different agents.

Are not the agents in each case to be known in the Recognisance Office? — I was not aware that I could be informed of that, there.

Did Mr. Rose give you any directions? — He could not inform me who were the agents.

Did he give you any information as to the manner in which you were to proceed to discover who were the agents? — He did not.

Did you apply to Mr. Rose again to know how you were to discover those several agents, when you were at a loss to find them? — No, I did not.

Did you ever inform Mr. Rose that you had delivered all the notices intrusted to your care to Mr. Coppock, in the lobby of this House? — I told Mr. Rose, at the beginning of the week, that I had delivered three of them to Mr. Coppock.

At the beginning of what week? — This week.

How many days was that after you had given them to Mr. Coppock? — I do not recollect the day; I delivered them on the 18th.

Therefore you could not have informed Mr. Rose earlier than Monday, the 25th, or Tuesday, the 26th? — It is not in general done, that we should inform the clerks with regard to the orders being delivered.

Did you consider that you had discharged the duty intrusted to you, and fulfilled the directions given you, by giving notices to Mr. Coppock, addressed to the various parties in the different election petitions? — I did.

SIR R. PEEL. — Is there no acknowledgment of the receipt of the notice required? — None.

Mr. GOULBURN. — Have you given the notices in the Cambridge and Totness elections also? — I have.

To whom did you give those? — I served two upon Mr. Parkes, and one upon Mr. Baldwin himself, at his house, and one upon the sitting Member, Mr. Sutton.

You did not deliver the whole of those notices to the agent of one of the parties? — No, I did not.

Did you ask Mr. Parkes how you were to deliver them? — I did not.

SIR G. CLERK. — What was the reason for your adopting a different course in the case of the Cambridge and Totness, from that which you adopted in the case of the Ludlow and Ipswich? — I asked Mr. Parkes if I should deliver one of them to Mr. Baldwin, and he said, "Yes; you had better deliver it to him."

Did Mr. Coppock read those notices when you placed them in his hands? — He did.

He looked at them all? — Three of them.

Was it after he had so read them that he desired you to deliver them to him? — Yes; he looked at them, and said it was all right, he would take care of them.

You state that you delivered three notices to Mr. Coppock; did you deliver them separately or together? — Separately; I delivered one at first, and he asked me if I had any more, and I said "Yes:" he requested me to get them.

You delivered them separately? — Yes.

Did he read each of them as you delivered them to him? — No; he had all three of them together in his hand; he looked at them, and kept them.

How many of those notices referred to the Ipswich petition? — Two.

How many to the other? — One to the other.

Did he state to you which of those petitions would be abandoned? — I believe he said neither would come on.

Did you believe Mr. Coppock, when he told you all should be right? — I did so, and we had no further orders.

The witness was directed to withdraw.

SIR G. CLERK. — After the extraordinary evidence we have just heard, showing the very loose manner in which notices in election petitions are served by the messengers of this House, I think it impossible that the House can permit the matter to rest here. I think the House will feel the absolute necessity of calling Mr. Coppock to the bar, in order that he may explain his reason for retaining the notices of the opposing parties in the case of the Ludlow election petition. I will, therefore, now move that Mr. Coppock be ordered to attend at the bar of this House on Monday next.

Mr. GOULBURN.—Before you put the question, Sir, I would suggest that, as Mr. Coppock appears to be amicus curiæ,——

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear!"]

— it is very possible he is at this moment in the lobby; and, if so, it would, perhaps, be as well to call him now.

The Sergeant-at-Arms here announced that Mr. Coppock was in attendance.

Mr. Coppock was then called in, and examined as follows: —

SIR G. CLERK. — What is your name? — James Coppock.

Are you agent for either of the parties in the Ludlow election? — I am agent for the petitioners defending the return in the Ludlow election.

Did Mr. Poingdestre, the messenger of this House, deliver to you any notices upon the subject of the Ludlow election petition? — He delivered two to me.

What notices were they? — One for the sitting Member, and one for the petitioners.

Are you agent for the petitioners? — I am.

For the petitioners against the return? There are two sets of petitioners; and of course each set of petitioners is entitled to a distinct notice.

For what parties are you agent? — For the parties defending the return.

To what parties were the notices addressed which you received from Poingdestre, the messenger? — They were addressed to the parties petitioning against the return.

For whom you are not agent? — For whom I am not agent.

On what day did you receive those notices from the messenger? — One notice only, not those notices, is addressed to the petitioners; the other is addressed to the sitting Member.

Did you receive more than one notice from Poingdestre, the messenger belonging to this House, at the same time? — I received three at the same time; one relating to the Ipswich, and two to the Ludlow.

Of the two relating to Ludlow, one was addressed to Mr. Alcock, who declined to defend his seat, and the other to the petitioners who opposed Mr. Alcock's return? — Yes.

Had you any conversation with Poingdestre respecting the delivery to you of the notices? — I was coming up the lobby of the House, and Poingdestre stopped me, and asked me if I was agent in any of the election petitions. I said I was concerned in the Ludlow and the Ipswich. He said, "I have some notices to deliver." I said, "You can give them to me now, and that will save you the trouble of calling at my office." He went up stairs and brought down four notices, and I took the three that related to myself, and gave him back the fourth.

What notice did you return him? — A notice in the Totness or the Cambridge, I am not quite certain which, in which I am not concerned.

You, of course, looked at those notices to see to what parties they referred? — I looked at the notices in the hurry, as they were put into my hands in the lobby, in the passing of many people, and seeing one addressed to the petitioners in the case of the Ludlow, to which I knew I was entitled, and another to the sitting Member, to which I was also entitled, and another to Mr. Gibson, in the case of the Ipswich, I took the three. I did not examine them.

Will you state how you came to take from the messenger the notices that were addressed to Thomas and Marsden, who were petitioners complaining of an undue election for the borough of Ludlow? — The names were written in a very small hand, and the word "petitioners" was written large; and seeing the word "petitioners," and knowing that I was agent for one set of petitioners, I took the notice, without discovering the error.

When did you discover the error? — On Monday last.

How did you discover it? — I immediately, on receiving those notices, wrote to Mr. Alcock and the petitioners, telling them of the day appointed, and stating the time at which I must have the lists and papers for the defence. Mr. Alcock I saw on Monday last, and gave him his notice, and then for the first time I saw that this was addressed to Marsden and Thomas, I not having seen the notices from the moment I got home till Monday last.

What did you do upon discovering the mistake? — I took it for granted that the notice I ought to have had was delivered to the other party; I thought it was a confusion; I had no occasion to take notice of it, and should have gone on the day appointed to the Committee, supposing that the opposite party had had the notice I should have had.

Had you no further conversation with the messenger, Poingdestre? — No, I had not; I am not aware of any.

Were there any observations made by you to him with respect to the probability that those petitions would not come on? — I told him that the Ipswich would not come on; and I told him where Sir Thomas Cochrane lived, I having previously seen Sir Thomas Cochrane at his house.

Had you any conversation with the messenger with respect to the petitions not going on? — Not that I am aware of.

Are you certain that no observation was made as to the Ludlow election not proceeding? — Certainly not; because it was my full intention to defend it.

Was it possible that any remark was made by you that the Ludlow election petition would not come on for trial; and therefore it was of no consequence to whom those notices were delivered? — I never made such a remark, and never had such an intention.

Did you make any general observation, that those petitions were not likely to come on to be tried at the time named in the notices? — I did not, except I said of the Ipswich that it would not go on; further than that, I made no observation; the Ipswich I knew was abandoned at that moment, and so did Sir Thomas Cochrane.

How were those notices delivered to you; were they delivered altogether, or separately? — Poingdestre brought them down in his hand; I looked them over, and took the three which related to myself, and handed the other back to him, as well as I can recollect what passed.

You ascertained that three belonged to you, and one did not belong to you? — I thought three belonged to me; it appears that one did not belong to me; one ought to have belonged to me.

Are you perfectly certain that no observation escaped you at the time, that the messenger might safely deliver all those notices to you, because it was not likely that those elections would come on for trial? — I made no such observation; I told him the Ipswich was abandoned; but I could not have made the observation of the Ludlow, knowing the contrary to be the fact.

What did you do with the notices after you discovered that they were not the notices intended for you? — I discovered, on Monday, that one notice was intended for the other set of petitioners; I took no notice of it, supposing that the agent on the other side had got the notice intended for me. I thought the service perfectly good; that it was a mere change of papers, and I should never have noticed it or mentioned it in any way.

Did you apply to the other agent? — I did not.

Did the messenger inform you that those were all the notices which had been delivered to him upon the Ludlow case? — He did not; I did not ask the question.

Have you those notices still in your possession? — I have them at home; I gave Mr. Alcock's myself, on Monday last, but I have the other.

Did the messenger ask you if you could inform him who were the agents in the Ludlow petition? — He asked me if I was concerned in the Ludlow petition, and I told him I was.

Did he ask you who were the several agents? — No; he stopped me in the lobby, and said, "You are concerned in election petitions, have you anything to do with any this Session?" and I said, "Yes, the Ludlow and the Ipswich." He said, "I have some notices to deliver;" I said, "I will take them, then, of you; it will save you the trouble of coming to my office;" the usual mode being to deliver them at my office on some day previous.

How do you account for receiving them from the messenger without examining them, to see whether they were addressed to you, or to those who were opposed to you? — I have explained that the word "petitioners," at the bottom of the notice, was written in a distinct hand: knowing I was entitled to one for the petitioners, I did not read the notice; I merely saw "petitioners," and I took the notice.

MR. SERJEANT JACKSON. — When you first met the messenger in the lobby, he had not the notices in his hand? — He had not.

He held a conversation with you, and subsequently went for the notices? — He asked me if I was concerned for any election petitions; I told him I was; he then went up stairs to the gallery and brought them down.

Did he ask you if you were concerned for all the parties? — No; he asked if I was concerned.

Are you quite sure that he did not tell you that he had notices to serve on the different parties, and ask you to inform him who were the different parties? — He did not show me any other notices than four; and I told him where Sir Thomas Cochrane lived; and beyond that he did not make any inquiry.

Did he not tell you he had notices to serve on the different parties as agents? — No.

You are sure of that? — As sure as I can be of a casual conversation in the lobby of the House of Commons.

Do you consider it your duty, as an election agent, to examine notices served upon you? — It is a thing very seldom done; we learn the day of meeting from other sources. We take the notices as a matter of form, very seldom reading them; I do not know that I ever scarcely read them.

Do you not consider it a duty to see that they were right? — I presumed that they were right.

You are not in the habit of reading them? — If I think it important, I read them.

Do you not think the notice of an Election Committee important? — Not the fixing the day.

Where were you when the messenger was under examination? — I was in the gallery.

You heard the examination? — I have heard all the examinations that have taken place this evening.

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — You have stated that you received this notice, conceiving that it was applicable to the petitioners who defend the return? — I have.

Did you, in consequence of receiving it, and being under that impression, make any communication to the parties that you had been served with such notice? — I wrote both to the petitioners and the sitting Member, the following morning.

Did you take any steps towards preparing yourself for trying the petition on the 12th of March, the day fixed? — My lists are quite ready, and have been some days, in consequence of that notice which I received.

Did you observe that one of the notices was directed to Mr. Alcock? — It was.

Mr. GISBORNE.— Were you aware, at the time, that you ought to be served with another notice, beside that to Mr. Alcock? — Certainly.

You read the name of Mr. Alcock at the bottom of the notice? — I did.

And you read the name of the other party upon the notice that you returned, at the bottom of the notice? — I did.

And you did not read the name at the bottom of the notice which ought not to have come into your hands? — The first notice put into my hands being for Mr. Alcock, I looked over it, and the second notice for the petitioners I took, and I saw one directed to Mr. Gibson, which I took; I returned the one directed to Sir Thomas Cochrane.

Mr. GOULBURN. — You said there had been one with respect to the Cambridge or Totness? — I did not.

You have stated that you met the messenger in the lobby? — I did.

Did the messenger immediately apply to you to know whether you were the agent for the party defending the petition? — He asked me if I was concerned in any of the election petitions; I told him the two in which I was concerned, and he fetched the notices.

You did not ask for them? — I had not the slightest notice that they were signed, or ready for delivery.

Were they given separately? — He brought them together in his hand; whether he gave them separately or altogether, I cannot say.

Mr. THORNELY. — Do the House understand that you received a notice that ought not to have been delivered to you, but that a notice ought to have been delivered that you did not receive? — A notice precisely similar in words ought to have been delivered to me, addressed to my petitioners, instead of these petitioners. I did not inquire whether the clerk had drawn out two notices addressed to the same petitioners, or whether he had delivered the wrong one to me. I took it as a good notice.

SIR G. CLERK. — Then, in point of fact, you have not received the notice which ought to have been delivered to you? — I have received no proper notice for the petitioners defending the return, which I ought to have received.

And that notice never has been delivered to you? — That notice never has been delivered to me; that petition not having been referred by the House to the Committee. Immediately on discovering the error, I consulted my counsel as to the course I should adopt, wishing to waive every objection; and the reply was, that I could not waive it: I had no option to do so; that the petition not having been referred to the Committee, my clients had no locus standi.

That discovery did not take place till Monday? — Till Wednesday; because, on Tuesday, when the Clerk of the House waited upon me to ask me if I had had a wrong notice, I showed it to him, and told him I was willing to meet any arrangement that could be made.

The witness was directed to deliver to Mr. Rose the notice addressed to the petitioners against the return, which he had received; and then withdrew.

SIR GEORGE CLERK. — I wish to call the attention of the House to the convenience,—as Monday next is the last day on which the petitioners in the Ludlow case can give in their lists of objections, — of making some arrangement under which the parties may not be prevented from having the opportunity of giving in those lists.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I think it is a grave matter for consideration, whether we can in any degree depart from the letter of the Act of Parliament upon this subject. The Act is very precise upon this point; and I really do not think that the suggestion of the Honourable Baronet should be hastily adopted.

Mr. GOULBURN. — If the discussion of the Ludlow petition, which is to come on on Monday, were fixed for four o'clock, I think we might, by five o'clock, be enabled to come to a decision upon the subject, — thereby giving the parties ample time to put in their lists.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Perhaps the Speaker will have the goodness to take the chair at three o'clock on Monday; in which case the matter will present no difficulty.

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — I think the best way will be, for all the parties to write a letter, stating that they will let the day stand as at present fixed, and that they will take no advantage on account of the want of notice. My object is, to save the parties from any inconvenience.

The SPEAKER. — Acting on the suggestion of the Noble Lord, I will take the chair at the hour he has proposed.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I beg to move the Order of the Day for going into Committee on the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill.

Agreed to.

The House went into Committee; Mr. BERNAL in the chair.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I rise, Sir, to ask a question upon a point of order. I have a clause to introduce into this Bill, and I wish to know whether the present is the proper time to propose it?

The CHAIRMAN. — That entirely depends upon the pleasure of the Committee. I should say, however, that the better time would be on the bringing up of the Report.

Mr. LYNCH. — I hope that the Noble Lord below me has reconsidered the question of boundary, in the case of the town of Galway.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I should have been glad to have made an exception in favour of the town of Galway; but that, a general rule having been laid down for ascertaining boundaries, I fear that any departure from the principle would lead to inconvenient results.

The CHAIRMAN. — I would here suggest, that as there are, I understand, objections to be raised against some of the towns, now in Schedule A, remaining in that schedule, it would, perhaps, be better to put the question on each of the towns separately.

Question put, " That Belfast stand in Schedule A."

Mr. DUNBAR. — I rise, Sir, to oppose the motion. It is not my intention to occupy much of the time of the House; as I well know that anything I may say can add no strength to the statements made on a former occasion by my Honourable Colleague and Friend the Member for Bandon, when petitions were presented from Belfast aginst a municipal corporation being forced upon that town. At the same time, I feel it to be a duty I owe to my constituents not to remain silent on the present occasion, but to endeavour, if possible, to have the town of Belfast transferred from Schedule A to Schedule B. I would call the recollection of the House to the fact, that two petitions have been presented from Belfast,—one against, and the other in favour of, a corporation; and although I am bound to admit that they were both most numerously and respectably signed, yet I do not hesitate to say that the one " against having a corporation " represented much more of the wealth, respectability, and intelligence of the town, than the other. I have no objection, however, to suppose that in these respects they were quite equal. It may be said that I am not supported in the motion I am about to make by any petitions at present in its favour. That may be true; but does not the total silence we find on the subject show an indifference on the part of the people in Belfast with respect to corporations? I have inquired from persons on whom I can rely, whether it were likely, if a petition signed by persons of all political opinions could be obtained, praying that the town of Belfast might be transferred from Schedule A to Schedule B, it would be listened to; but I am told it would not be, and for this reason, — that the question of municipal reform having been completely considered as a great party and political question, petitions respecting it are got up without serious consideration as to what the effect of them may be; and persons, having committed themselves to support the proposition for a corporation for this town, would not like to sign any petition of a contrary nature; and that, if any such attempt were made in Belfast, it would have the effect of again creating agitation and disturbance. But of this I am assured, that if Belfast were placed in Schedule B, and the power given to the people in Belfast to have a corporation, or not, as they pleased, they would, on cool reflection, reject the proposition by a large majority, and that majority composed of persons of all shades of political opinions; and most sincerely do I agree in this opinion. I can assure the Noble Lord (Lord Morpeth) that I have no private or selfish object in view, in making this motion; but that what I have stated is my conscientious conviction; and I do not believe that either of the two great parties in Belfast will be materially strengthened or weakened, whether a corporation be forced upon them, or not. But I do apprehend that the agitation and interruption to business, by the frequent elections that must necessarily take place, under this Bill, will seriously interfere with the happiness and prosperity of that great commercial town. With these views, then, I will not trespass longer upon the House, but beg leave to move that Belfast be transferred from Schedule A to Schedule B.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I rise at once, Sir, to say that, as I do not believe there is a town in Ireland of greater importance than Belfast, I do not consider that this schedule ought to be reduced, so far as that town is concerned. With respect to what the Honourable Gentleman tells me as to leaving it open to this town to have a corporation or not, I can only say, that, as we have one common object in view, I do not think it desirable, by thus leaving the question open, to set one political party in the town against the other; and thereby create unnecessary excitement and bad feeling. I cannot, therefore, consent to the proposition of the Honourable Gentleman.

Mr. LITTON. — I shall support the motion of my Honourable Friend the Member for Belfast; and if the object of the Noble Lord be to prevent disturbance and political excitement, I think that, in the case of Belfast, at least, he might consent to the reduction of this schedule; because the fact is, that no bad feeling does, in reality, now exist between the two great parties in that town. It has been clearly demonstrated, on a former occasion, by the colleague of my Honourable Friend, that everything a municipal corporation could do for that town is effected already through the means of various public bodies; and my Honourable Friend has satisfied me that the functions which would devolve upon a corporation are now administered with little cost to the inhabitants, and without any of that political heat which the annually recurring elections under this Bill would be sure to engender. Heartburnings and strife would be the consequence of these elections; and the result must be ruinous to the peace of the town. I would ask the Noble Lord, then, what ground exists for forcing corporations upon towns that want them not? Upon what principle is it that the Noble Lord persists in dealing with all these eleven towns in the same way? Belfast and Galway, for instance, differ most widely from Derry and Dublin; in fact, they differ as much in their views, wants, and wishes, as they do in the situation they occupy on the map; and yet the Noble Lord persists in dealing with them all in the same manner. Wishing, Sir, to see each of these towns dealt with, with reference to its particular circumstances, I shall give my cordial support to the motion of my Honourable Friend.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I cannot see that there is anything in Belfast for a corporation to do; and as that town objects to receive a corporation, I do not perceive any just reason why the Noble Lord should persist in inflicting one upon it. I think a fair line of demarcation might be drawn between those towns which have petitioned against having corporations, and those which have not. In the schedule now under discussion, four towns have petitioned against having corporations, and seven in favour of them; and, under these circumstances, I contend that Belfast ought to be transferred to Schedule B.

The CHAIRMAN. — The question I have now to put, is, "That Belfast stand part of Schedule A."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 67, Noes 26; majority 41.

The question "That Clonmel stand part of Schedule A," was then put.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I rise to move, Sir, that the town of Clonmel be struck out of Schedule A, and transferred to Schedule B, pursuant to the prayer of the petition presented by me some days since. When this matter was last under discussion, I stated that the petition presented by me was signed by three fourths of the ratepayers of the town. I was contradicted by my Honourable and Learned Friend opposite (Mr. Pigot), who maintained that it was not signed by one sixth of the ratepayers; and my Honourable and Learned Friend, on the same occasion, proceeded to disparage the character of the petitioners generally, because it was signed by a tailor, a tinker, a deputy turnkey of the gaol, and others. Now, I think it is no reason for despising the prayer of a petition, to say that it is signed by the humbler classes of society, as well as the richer. I trust the Committee will bear with me for a few moments, while I vindicate, not only my own veracity, but that of my respectable correspondent, on whose authority I made the statement to the House, with respect to this petition. When my Honourable and Learned Friend asserted that the petition was not signed by one sixth of the ratepayers, I asked what rate he referred to; and my Honourable Friend replied, "the watch tax." Now, I must be permitted to say, that Mr. Peddar, who sent me the petition to present, referred me, for a verification of the facts contained in his statement, to the Honourable Member for the county of Waterford (Mr. V. Stuart), and to the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Callaghan); both of whom have, in the most unequivocal manner, borne testimony in favour of the truth of his allegations. I have Mr. Peddar's letter with me at this moment; and it sets forth that the petition was signed by 65 persons, whose property in the town of Clonmel was rated at 9050*l.*, and others rated at from 10*l.* to 40*l.*; making, in all, 10,000*l.*; which is more than than three fourths of all the rated property of the town; and yet my Honourable and Learned Friend, on the authority, perhaps, of the priest who signed the counter petition, takes upon himself to say that these petitioners do not possess one sixth of the rated property of the town. The letter which I hold in my hand goes on to state that some of the petitioners are rated at 400*l.*, 380*l.*, 200*l.*, 140*l.*, 105*l.*, and several other large sums. I think, then, that I have now vindicated myself from having acted on loose information as to this petition. I trust that neither in this House, nor out of it, I have ever uttered anything which I did not believe to be true; and, in vindicating my own character from the doubts which were on a former evening cast upon my statements, I trust I have also vindicated the character of the respectable gentleman who sent me this communication. I shall now move, that the town of Clonmel be transferred from Schedule A to Schedule B. The respectable portion of the people of that town know, by sad experience, what they have to expect from popular elections. By the 9th of Geo. IV., commissioners were appointed for carrying the provisions of that Act into execution; and in no one instance has a Protestant gentleman been elected under it. Then again, with respect to the poor law guardians, only two Protestants have been elected; and these, I have every reason to believe, will be squeezed out at the next election. On the whole, then, — seeing what the inevitable consequence must be, and taking into account the petition which I have presented from the inhabitants of Clonmel, — I entreat the House not to inflict the calamity upon them, of having their town inserted in Schedule A.

Mr. PIGOT. — I think my Honourable and Learned Friend would have exercised a more wise discretion if he had not again reverted to the subject of this petition; but, as he has done so, I am bound to repeat that that petition is not signed by three fourths of the ratepayers of the town. On the contrary, I am in a situation to prove that it is not signed by one sixth of the ratepayers, as I originally stated the fact to be. My statements have been authenticated, not by the priest, to whom my Honourable and Learned Friend refers; but by a most respectable person, who could not possibly be mistaken on the subject. In addition to this, I have referred to the Appendix of the Report on Fictitious Voters in Ireland, for a corroboration of the statement I have made; and the result is, that, of the 171 persons, who, alone, out of a population of between 18,000 and 19,000, have signed the petition, 75 are not rated at all to the tax to which I referred.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON.—What tax?

Mr. PIGOT.—The watch tax—the rating under the 9th Geo. IV.—is the one I speak of. The amount levied altogether under that Act is only 800*l.* Ninety-six of those who signed the petition presented by my Honourable and Learned Friend are rated, under that Act (which includes all 5*l.* householders), at 136*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.*; of whom, forty-six are rated below the sum of 1*l.*, and seventy-five are not rated at all.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

It is evident, then, from the statement I have just made, first, that that petition does not contain the names of one sixth of the rated inhabitants of Clonmel; and, secondly, that it does not, therefore, contain such a proportion of the names of the rated constituency as to entitle it to consideration, with reference to this Bill. I cannot sit down without expressing my regret that my Honourable and Learned Friend should have commented on the petition which I presented from Clonmel, in favour of a corporation being granted to that town, in such terms as he indulged in on a former occasion. That petition was signed by 1449 persons,—nearly one tenth of the population of the town;—and, under these circumstances, I cannot consent that Clonmel should be removed from the schedule in which it now stands.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON.—I must deny having commented on the petition at all. It was a Right Honourable Friend of mine who did so; and now that I have looked at the petition, I think the wording of it fully justifies my Right Honourable Friend in the observations which he made; inasmuch as it describes the existing corporations as "corrupt and bigoted nuisances."

Mr. O'CONNELL.—Hear, hear!

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON.—My Honourable and Learned Friend has made a very flourishing statement; but he has withheld the name of his informant; whereas I have stated the name of the most respectable gentleman who supplied me with the information I have given the House, as to my petition. I shall now proceed, with the permission of the Committee, to read a few of the names of those who signed that petition. There is, first, the mayor, a most respectable gentleman,—John Bagwell, Esquire, the proprietor of the greatest part of the town——

Mr. O'CONNELL.—Ay, and the purchaser of the corporation.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON.—There are also the names of D. Gordon, Esquire; J. R. Smith, Esquire, J. P.; J. Moreton, Esquire, who is rated at 360*l.* (though the Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite says ninety-six of the petitioners are only rated at 136*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.*); Charles Riall, Esquire, rated at 400*l.*; Doctor Bell, rated at 140*l.*; Walter Gyles, and others, rated at various other considerable sums. But I will not fatigue the House by reading the entire list. I have done enough, I think, to show that my Honourable and Learned Friend's anonymous correspondent has grossly deceived him; and I repeat that persons who are rated at nearly 10,000*l.* have affixed their signatures to this petition.

Mr. PIGOT.—The persons to whom I have referred as having, as rated inhabitants of Clonmel, signed the petition, are persons who, under the 9th Geo. IV., are only rated at 136*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.* With respect to what my Honourable and Learned Friend has said, of my speaking on the deceptive authority of an anonymous correspondent, I beg to tell him that my informant is Mr. O'Leary, a most respectable man, and one of the commissioners under the Act of 9th Geo. IV.

COLONEL PERCEVAL.—I merely rise to say that, having been quartered in Clonmel some time ago, I very well remember many of those gentlemen whose names are affixed to the petition of my Honourable and Learned Friend (Mr. Jackson), and can bear my testimony to their great respectability.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON.—I hope the House will not be led away in its view of this proposition by the mere authority of this Mr. O'Leary.

The CHAIRMAN.—Do you divide?

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON.—I think it unnecessary to put the House to the trouble of a division; as I consider that the sense of the House was sufficiently ascertained, as respects the principle, by the last division.

Clonmel was then admitted to stand part of Schedule A.

On the question, "That Galway be added to Schedule A," —

Mr. BLAKE said: — I shall feel it necessary to oppose the admission of Galway to Schedule A; and I can assure the House that the people of Galway universally agree in repudiating the proposition that the town should be admitted into that schedule. They would much prefer remaining under the existing municipal regulations by which the town is lighted, watched, and cleansed; and I therefore hope that, in accordance with the wishes of the people who are most interested, the Noble Lord below me will not persist in pressing the proposition. When the Bill of last year was before the House of Lords, Galway was omitted from the schedule by their Lordships; and I trust that it will not, now, be added to it. It is impossible that, in such a large population as that of Galway, there should not be found some interested parties, who might be prevailed on to express an opinion in favour of the proposition; but the general wish of the cess-payers of the town, almost without an exception, is, that the town should be omitted from Schedule A. The duty of opposing the admission of Galway to Schedule A is one which has been imposed on me by the earnest desire of my constituents; and I am quite sure that, if I fail in inducing the Noble Lord to omit it, I shall fail only from a want of ability to put forward, in a sufficiently strong light, the just claims which the inhabitants of that town have for making such a demand. I shall therefore move, Sir, that Galway be omitted from Schedule A.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON.—I have been requested by a gentleman, who is an extensive proprietor, and who belongs to an important mercantile firm in Galway, to support the motion of the Honourable Gentleman opposite; and I have much pleasure in seconding it. Last year, a petition was presented to the other House of Parliament, signed by all the wealth and respectability of Galway, requesting that that town might, instead of being placed in Schedule A, be placed in Schedule B; and the result of that petition, and of the representations which were made on that occasion, was, that Galway was omitted by their Lordships from Schedule A. The gentleman who has requested me to support the present motion for its omission from Schedule A, states that a petition, praying for such omission, has been signed by nine tenths of the ratepayers of the town; and unless there be some other Mr. O'Leary to oppose that petition, I cannot see why its prayer should not be attended to. The gentleman to whom I allude pays 94*l.* a-year cess; and he would much rather that the town of Galway were allowed to remain under its existing municipal regulations, than that it should be admitted into Schedule A. There is no analogy between the corporations in Ireland and England; and the institution of similar arrangements in both countries should not be carried so far as to induce us to refuse to listen to the request of the inhabitants of the towns which are to be affected by this schedule. I cannot agree to the proposal to force this boon on the people of Galway, whether they will have it or not; and I must therefore oppose the proposition that the town stand part of Schedule A.

Mr. A. H. LYNCH. — I believe the general wish of my constituents is, that Galway should be placed in Schedule B; and I therefore feel it my duty to accord with that opinion, and support the motion in favour of its omission from Schedule A. The people would prefer the present municipal government of the town, which answers all the purposes of a corporation, to having it placed in Schedule A.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Sir, it has been charged that it is a Popish conspiracy — to give the municipal power in the towns to the hands of the Roman Catholics—which brings forward this Bill. Now, the town of Galway contains more Roman Catholics, in proportion to Protestants, than any other town in Ireland. The proportion is, I believe, as 40 to 1; so that, if the people of Galway disclaim the proposition in the Bill, it can scarcely be called a Popish conspiracy. There is a quarrel in Galway, which I am quite unable to understand. I believe that some fear prevails there, that, if Galway were admitted to stand part of Schedule A, that would confer an advantage on some party or other; but I must say, that in no town is there a more complete or unintelligible split than in Galway; and it is evident they would sooner have no corporation, than that any party should take a triumph by this Bill. For my part, I think they ought to settle their quarrel, and that Galway ought to be added to Schedule A.

Mr. BLAKE.—There is no place where greater unanimity prevails on the subject than in Galway; and the people are almost universally opposed to the Bill. The proposition will be considered by the people of that town to be more a blight than a boon.

COLONEL PERCEVAL.—It is quite clear that the people of Galway are opposed to this proposition; and it is a most extraordinary thing to force a boon upon them against their own inclination. I think that it ought to be placed in Schedule B.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH.—I very much regret that I cannot accede to the request which has been made; but as I was insensible to the advances which were addressed to me from the other side, with respect to Belfast, I am afraid that I must be equally coy to the advances at this side of the House. I have witnessed, with much interest, the great progress which has been made in prosperity by the town of Galway, since the changes were made in the former corporation; and I cannot forget that so great were the objections to that corporation as to call for the direct interference of the Legislature. But the corporation which it is proposed, now, to give that town, will be subject to public control; and will not, I hope, be found liable to those abuses which were found to exist under the former corporation.

Mr. DUNBAR.—As the Noble Lord has referred to his refusal of our advances in the case of Belfast, I must assure him, that, although Belfast has been added to the schedule, I shall not be the less willing to support the claims of other towns to be omitted from it, where I think those claims may be equally well founded. It is quite evident that all the wealth and respectability and the cess-payers of Galway wish to have it added to Schedule B; and I hope the Committee will accede to that proposal.

SIR W. SOMERVILLE.—I do not see how any Gentleman, who has considered of what utility corporations have been, when placed on a proper and good foundation, and the support which they have supplied to the liberal cause, can be opposed to the principle; and I shall support the proposition to admit Galway to stand part of Schedule A.

Mr. W. S. O'BRIEN.—I shall support the motion of the Honourable Member for Galway; and I must say, that, finding, as we do, the inhabitants of that town to be unanimous in opposing the admission of Galway to Schedule A, the Committee ought to attach much weight to that expression of their opinions.

The Committee then divided; when there appeared—For the original motion 79, for the amendment 47; Majority for the motion 32.

Galway was then admitted to stand part of Schedule A.

On the question, "That Sligo should stand part of Schedule A," —

Mr. E. J. COOPER said: — I must oppose the admission of Sligo to Schedule A. The funds of the corporation are very small, and I venture to remark that those who signed the petition which has been presented would be the first to complain of the assessment which, under this Bill, must fall upon them, if this motion be agreed to. Persons of all political parties in the town of Sligo subscribed a petition to this House praying that the town should not be placed in Schedule A. There exists in Sligo, at present, a power, by means of commissioners, of levying an assessment for watching, paving, and lighting the town; and, under that system, no expense is incurred for salaries, with the exception of the salary of the town clerk. If the new town council should think fit to give heavy salaries, for the purpose of being able to accommodate their friends, then those who now seek to be included under this Bill will be the first to complain. Two of the principal proprietors, of whom I am one, have objected to the retention of Sligo in the schedule; but the third proprietor is the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and I am not aware whether that Noble Lord is desirous of retaining Sligo in Schedule A, or not.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I have nothing to add to what has just been stated by one of the principal proprietors of the town of Sligo. All the principal proprietors of the town are in favour of the views of my Honourable Friend, with the exception of the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I can assure the Honourable Gentlemen opposite, that, in the course taken with respect to Sligo, I have the strenuous support of my Noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. I am aware that two of the proprietors of the borough are adverse to the retention of Sligo in Schedule A; but my Noble Friend is of a different opinion, and entirely concurs in the propriety of its insertion into Schedule A.

The question was then put, and Sligo was ordered to stand part of the schedule. The rest of Schedule A was agreed to.

Schedule B was agreed to.

On Schedule C being proposed, —

Mr. DUNBAR said: — I wish to call the attention of the Noble Viscount opposite to the fact, that, in Belfast, the boundary is so laid down as that one part of a street is in the borough and another part out of it.

LORD MORPETH. — The boundary has been defined, under the inspection of an officer of engineers. I have not before heard any objection made to it, nor am I prepared to consent to any alteration. But if the Honourable Gentleman has any well-founded objection to bring forward, it may be considered in a subsequent stage of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord whether he has any objection to the proposition, that, in Galway, the parliamentary boundary shall be substituted for the boundary proposed under the Bill?

LORD MORPETH. — That is a sweeping alteration; and I can by no means consent to adopt it.

Schedule C, and the remaining schedules in the Bill, were then agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. — I wish to know whether there are any new clauses to be proposed?

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I beg to move the insertion of a clause immediately after Clause 41., to enable all persons entitled to vote as freemen or burgesses in the election of Members to serve in Parliament for any borough, to vote, likewise, in the election of the town councillors and aldermen of such boroughs, to be elected under the provisions of this Bill. The ground of my motion is this: that the freemen of these corporations have vested interests in the local government of their towns; they are efficiently represented in the town council of Dublin, as in other corporations; and I think it only right and just to continue them in the same position, and to give them a voice in the election of the aldermen and common councillors under this Bill. The effect of the Bill, as it now stands, will be, to transfer these corporations from the Protestant part of the community into the hands of the Roman Catholics. That, certainly, will be the case with all the towns in Schedule A, except Belfast and Londonderry; and Sir M. O'Loghlen, Her Majesty's late Attorney General for Ireland, stated, in this House, that if he thought that would be the effect of the Bill, he would be the first to oppose it. The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin seems to doubt this fact; but I took the liberty, the other night, of showing the House, from the Returns laid upon the table of the House, on the authority of the Commissioners of Public Instruction, that that would be the case in most of the towns in Schedule A. I clearly demonstrated to the House, on that occasion, that in Cork, Dublin, Galway, Kilkenny, Limerick, Waterford, Clonmel, and Drogheda, the majority of 10*l.* houses are in the hands of Roman Catholics; and that in these towns this Bill will effect a transfer of the power of these corporations from the hands of Protestants to those of Roman Catholics. This, I contend, will happen in all the towns in Schedule A with the exception of Belfast and Londonderry. I know that, in some respects, those Returns are inaccurate, which were furnished by the Commissioners of Public Instruction; but they leave me a wide margin, and are not inaccurate to any extent that can affect my argument. I can prove their inaccuracy; but they are the nearest approximation to the truth which I could obtain. I propose, now, therefore, to give the freemen a voice in the election of the aldermen and town council, with a view to counterpoise the influence of Roman Catholics, which this Bill must produce; and I beg, now, to move the insertion of a clause to provide that every person entitled to vote as a freeman or burgess, under the Reform Act, for a Member of Parliament, in any borough to which a municipal corporation is granted, shall also have a right to vote for town councillors and aldermen.

LORD MORPETH. — I think that the Honourable and Learned Member can hardly be serious in pressing a proposition so entirely inconsistent with the principle and framework of this Bill. It is not necessary for me to argue the question. The Honourable and Learned Serjeant has said, that most of the present freemen are Protestants; and that may be so; but, looking at some of their late proceedings in the corporation of Dublin, — looking at the vulgar squabbles in which they have been engaged, — the charges bandied about by them, of peculation and corruption; — looking, too, at their recent conduct with regard to the Learned Recorder, — I must say, that a body of men who could treat one of their stoutest defenders as he has been treated, are not exactly the class of persons most fitted to take the management of local interests. I shall decidedly oppose the amendment, as being at variance with the spirit of the Bill.

Mr. WILLIAM ROCHE. — I beg to ask the Learned Serjeant, how can the majority of Roman Catholics be town councillors, unless where they have property to qualify them? I think that nothing could be more destructive of the principle of this Bill than an amendment like the present.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Anything equal to the profligacy with which the corporation of Dublin have squandered 200,000*l.* really cannot be conceived. The Honourable and Learned Serjeant has admitted that he speaks from inaccurate Returns; but he reminds me of the lawyer, who replied to an objection, that certain evidence was not legal, — "True, it is not legal; but it is good enough for the jury." And so the Learned Serjeant says, — "It is not accurate, but it is good enough for the House of Commons." The Bill will be good for nothing, if you let these freemen in. During the last fifty years, Roman Catholics have been admissible to the freedom of the corporation of Dublin, but not a single one has been admitted in that period. The object of this Bill is, to throw religious distinctions aside, and to substitute, by way of qualification, the resident property of the town. The great cause of the present quarrel between the corporation of Dublin and the Recorder is, that, in presenting a petition to the Queen, he defended them from the charge of being an exclusive corporation; but they insisted that they were so. They have, no doubt, been exclusive; and this Bill is proposed to remedy that evil.

Mr. BELLEW. — If the Returns referred to by the Learned Serjeant are correct, I can only rejoice that the Liberal party are so strong; and he ought not to be quite so sure that there will not be a Liberal majority even in Belfast and in Londonderry. I regard the discussion upon this measure with great satisfaction, because I look upon it as the last time at which these questions will be discussed in this House. The opposition to this Bill seems now, indeed, to be coming to the whispering of a faction, not strong enough to be heard out of the House, and very little within it.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — With respect to the calculations I made use of, I referred to the only Returns which were at my command; and they were the Parliamentary Returns laid on the table of the House. They, at all events, give an approximation to the truth; and if they are not quite accurate, the disproportion is not so great that my argument will be affected by it. The proportion between the Roman Catholics and Protestants was as two to one, or as three to two, in all the towns in the schedule, except Londonderry and Belfast. I will just repeat those calculations, to show the House what an extent they affect, and how great the disproportion is.

In Cork, with a population of 107,000 inhabitants, the case stands thus:—Number of houses owned by Protestant voters, 1634; Roman Catholic, 2776.

In Dublin, with a population of 240,000 inhabitants, the following is the result:—Houses of Protestant voters, 4082; Roman Catholic, 9220 — or two to one.

Galway, with a population of 33,000, stands thus: — Houses of Protestant voters, 134; Roman Catholics, 327.

Kilkenny, with a population of 23,000: — Houses of Protestant voters, 187; Roman Catholic, 420.

Limerick, with a population of 66,000: — Houses of Protestant voters, 683; Roman Catholic, 1517.

Waterford, with a population of 28,000: — Houses of Protestant voters, 917; Roman Catholic, 1183.

Clonmel, with a population of 12,000: — Protestant houses, 217; Roman Catholic, 535.

Drogheda, with a population of 15,000: — Protestant Houses, 321; Roman Catholic, 599.

God forbid that I should entertain any unkind feeling towards any man on account of his religious opinions; but it should be recollected that the constitution of this country is a Protestant constitution; and the local Government of these towns ought not to be transferred wholesale from the Protestant to the Roman Catholic inhabitants. It has been said, that if the property were in the hands of the Roman Catholics, then they ought to have a voice in the local government, on account of that property. But I deny the fact; for though a majority of those who occupy 5l. and 10l. houses may be Catholics, still the property of the country, is, in a large proportion, in the possession of the Protestants.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — The Noble Lord has said something about the "vulgar squabbles" of the corporation of Dublin; but is that the only place where vulgar squabbles take place? The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin has charged the corporation with peculation and profligacy, to the amount of 200,000*l.*; but is this House the tribunal to decide such a case? If the case were true, the courts of law would be the proper tribunals to appeal to. No ground can be more untenable for the destruction of a class of persons holding vested rights, than that particular persons may not have always spoken and acted with discretion.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — The Honourable Baronet seems to have taken offence at the words "vulgar squabbles," which were used by my Noble Friend; but the Honourable Baronet, I think, has heard words not much more civil used on the part of Members, at his side of the House, towards the corporation of Dublin.

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL. — I wish to know from the Learned Serjeant, if he carries his motion, how he intends to distribute the freemen through the wards for the purpose of voting?

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — If the Honourable Member will, by his vote, assist me in carrying this motion, I will then have an opportunity of seeing what other clause I may think fit to propose.

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL. — I am perfectly satisfied that this clause has not been proposed with a view to carrying it into effect. The Learned Serjeant could not carry it into effect; but, though he has acted according to the letter of the understanding which has been entered into, he seems disposed to violate its spirit. I am, however, rejoiced to see that the Honourable and Learned Serjeant has, by his conduct, driven away the leaders of his party in this House. It would be much better to oppose the measure openly and honestly, than, professing to support the principle of it, to attempt to introduce clauses calculated to defeat its main objects. As to the corporation of Dublin, they admitted 88 freemen between the years 1832 and 1835, of whom only one was a Catholic.

Mr. W. ROCHE. — Hundreds of those who have been admitted freemen of Limerick have never seen the place, — the drummers and fifers of a particular regiment, I believe, on one occasion, were made freemen. With respect to the Learned Member for Bandon's apprehension of the preponderance of Roman Catholics over Protestants, I can only state, that, when commissioners were chosen for Limerick, under the 9th of Geo. IV., there was a fair proportion of Protestants and Roman Catholics.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — The Honourable Member for Kerry charges my Honourable Friend with having introduced a factious amendment. I contend that this amendment furnishes no ground for charging my Honourable and Learned Friend with factious opposition to this Bill; he, last Session, gave notice of the same motion as the present; and was only prevented by an accident from bringing it forward. I regret that any allusion to another Right Honourable Friend of mine should be made in his absence; but I believe that the present unpopularity of the Learned Recorder of Dublin, which, I hope, is only temporary, has arisen from the part he took in supporting the second reading of this Bill; but that Honourable and Learned Gentleman, myself, and my Learned Friend near me (Mr. Serjeant Jackson), have felt ourselves bound in honour so to act, in consequence of our acquiescence in the proposition, that, if the tithe question were settled on a satisfactory basis, we would not oppose the principle of the Government corporation plan.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I do not think I am fairly open to the charge made against this amendment by the Honourable Member for Kerry. What I considered that I agreed to, as the principle of this Bill, was, the principle of reconstruction; but I never agreed to submit to the transfer of these corporations from the hands of Protestants to Roman Catholics.

Mr. JOHN YOUNG. — Although I have assented to every other amendment of the Honourable and Learned Serjeant the Member for Bandon, I cannot agree to the one which is now under consideration. All the money to be laid out will be derived from the rates; and I think that the parties who pay the rates ought, in the last resort, to have the control over them; and I cannot see that it would be right to admit 700 or 800 persons to vote along with the ratepayers, who have no right to do so.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — It is my intention to propose certain clauses; but I think the most convenient opportunity for discussing them will be on bringing up the Report. I shall propose a clause by which the aldermen, who have not already passed the chair, may be enabled to obtain compensation for the loss which they have sustained; also, that Mr. Dickinson and other individuals who have taken office under corporations since 1833, be entitled to compensation; and that such members as choose to resign may also be compensated.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON.—I shall have great pleasure in seconding the amendments of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, because I believe them to be founded in justice.

The House then resumed. Bill to be reported on Tuesday next.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY— NAVY ESTIMATES.

Mr. MORE O'FERRALL. — I beg to move that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to. The House went into committee.

Mr. M. O'FERRALL. — I beg to propose that a sum, not exceeding 1,142,504*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charge of wages to seamen and marines, and to the ordinary and yard craft, which will come in the course of payment during the year ending on the 31st of March, 1841.

On the question being put, —

Mr. HUME said: — I think it would be desirable to have an estimate, not only of the number of ships and men, and the amount of their wages, but of the annual expense of building and repairs. The navy estimates are swelled to a greater amount than they ought to be by the present system; and the public are kept in the dark as to the real expense of the navy. The outlay of every shilling of the steam packet service, also, ought to be inquired into.

Mr. M. O'FERRALL. — I cannot, at the present moment, give the estimate required by the Honourable Member. The steam packets are employed in the Post Office service; and I am not aware that there is any objection to inquiry on the subject.

Mr. C. WOOD. — There would be no difficulty in giving an account of the expenses of the dockyards in any one year; — for instance, from the 31st of March, 1839, to the 31st of March, 1840. The repairs are so mixed up, from one year to another, that it would be impossible to give any estimate. My Honourable Friend asked the same question last year, and received a similar answer.

Mr. HUME. — I have had the same answer for the last ten years. I shall be satisfied with obtaining an account for the last year. If an account were kept of the expense of every ship sent out, I do not think there would be any difficulty in forming an estimate.

SIR T. COCHRANE. — I wish to obtain some explanation from the Honourable Secretary to the Admiralty, as to certain parts of the paper which I hold in my hand, which purports to be the naval balance sheet for the last year. I deeply regret the slender information afforded to the country, as to the state of our naval establishment; and I think, if there be one moment at which, more than another, such information ought to be given, it is when the Government come down and make great demands — certainly not greater than are required — for the service of the country. I have, in vain, looked to the estimates, and to the speeches delivered, for adequate information as to the number of ships building, their progress towards completion, the expense of naval stores, the wages of artificers, the charge for the conveyance of troops, and many other details of the highest importance. I had prepared a motion for Returns, which would have given the House adequate information on all these points; but when I was told that the motion would be opposed, on the ground that furnishing the Returns would embarrass the Government, I felt it to be my duty not to press for them. I confess that I think it a very questionable policy to conceal the state of the navy of this country. I do not believe that a full disclosure would be half so injurious to the public service as the frequent statements which go forth of the decrepitude of our naval force. No person, who has not been abroad, can be aware of the extent to which, it is believed, our navy has declined, and how unprepared we are for a great and extensive war. I cannot see why the Admiralty should not follow the example of the French Government, which annually makes a clear and elaborate statement as to the naval force of that power. Where you are strong, you require no concealment; it is only where you are not strong that you require a cloak to cover your weakness. If, unfortunately, the statements which have been made should prove to be true, I am sure that the country and the House would not hesitate to supply any defect, and place the navy on such a sound and substantial footing as would cause it to be respected by its friends, and feared by any hostile power. I now wish to ask the Honourable Member for Kildare some explanation as to two items which appear in the naval balance sheet; — one is, the sum saved on the wages of seamen and marines, amounting to 74,892*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.*, and the other, the saving upon victuals, of 46,340*l.* 4*s.*; — making, together, the sum of 121,232*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* Now, this sum is about equal to the charge for the maintenance and wages of 2160 seamen for one year. I feel it the more necessary to ask this explanation, because, unless it be given, the House may be led to believe that the Admiralty are reverting to the practice, pursued some years ago, of transferring the balance of one vote to the deficiency of another. When the Government of Earl Grey came into power, the ex-Government were told that that practice was illegal, and that they had almost laid themselves open to impeachment, for it; and so important was it deemed to put an end to that system, that a clause was introduced into the Act passed at that time, enjoining the production of an annual balance sheet, to prevent the sums of money voted for one purpose being appropriated to another. For this reason, I am anxious that the Honourable Gentleman should explain why these two sums, with the exception of about 300*l.*, have been appropriated to the dockyard establishments, to the wages of naval artificers, and the purchase of naval stores?

MR. M. O'FERRALL. — With respect to the first observation of the Honourable and Gallant Officer, I can only repeat what I stated to him on a former occasion, that the Admiralty consider that such Returns could not be given consistently with the welfare of the service; but that, if the Gallant Officer, or any other naval officer, chose to call at the Admiralty, I should be very happy to furnish him with the information which he required. With regard to devoting the surplus of one vote to any deficiency in another vote, I believe the practice has always been followed; and I never heard it complained of before. It is hardly possible to avoid doing so in certain respects, in consequence of the system of paying the wages of seamen.

SIR T. COCHRANE. — The Honourable Gentleman certainly was so kind as to say I might see the necessary documents, for my own private information; but I did not feel myself justified in going to the Admiralty, and looking over the papers in question, as I could not afterwards avail myself of any information that I might acquire from them. What I wished for was, that the House and the country should be put in possession of this information in a tangible form. I confess that the explanation of the Honourable Secretary as to the balance sheet is not satisfactory. The question is, not as to the custom of transferring the surplus of one vote to the deficiency of another; because, whether the custom be good or bad, it is in contravention of the rule laid down by Lord Grey's Government, for putting an end to the system. In the year 1831, the Right Honourable Baronet, then First Lord of the Admiralty, denounced the system in the strongest terms, and said that it was illegal; and, if I am not much mistaken, he stated that he had taken the opinion of counsel as to the propriety of undertaking prosecutions for it.

MR. C. WOOD. — I believe that I am the person who ought, properly speaking, to have been called to account, by the Gallant Officer, for the transfer, which appears in the balance sheet. The Gallant Officer stated, and truly, that the Right Honourable Member for Pembroke, in 1831, blamed the Admiralty for the transfer of any surplus to other votes. I admit that this is an apparent departure from the rule then laid down; but I think the circumstances under which it took place will appear to be a sufficient justification in the eyes of the Committee. In the summer of 1838, when affairs in the East assumed a more hostile appearance than they had previously done, it became necessary to make some considerable addition to the naval force; which there was no opportunity of providing for immediately by a vote. It is exceedingly inconvenient to make a very large increase at once; and we determined to make it gradually; and I stated that intention to the House at the time: and we have since made a gradual increase in the votes for wages, for the yards, and for stores. A greater increase, however, became necessary in 1838 than was anticipated, particularly in the charge for stores. The chief portion of the additional charge arose from the necessity of purchasing vessels, and stores for ships, in Canada. I trust that this explanation will satisfy the Committee as to the excess on that head. I will now say a few words with respect to the naval balance sheet. It does so happen that, although the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for Pembroke brought in the Act with the laudable intention of limiting the expenditure of the Admiralty within the votes of the year, yet there is no part of the public service to which that rule of limitation is so little applicable as the navy. With respect to yard-wages, salaries, and the regular expenses paid within the year, there is no difficulty; but it is impossible that the expense of stores and buildings, and seamen's wages, within the year, can correspond with the votes of the year. The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Stamford expressed his surprise at the expenditure having been kept so accurately within the estimates; but the solution of that fact is, that, for many years subsequent to 1830 the expenditure under every head was considerably under the estimate. But the moment the expenditure runs close upon the estimate, it becomes impossible to keep the expenditure of the year within it. Take the case of the wages of men. Suppose that a certain number of men are employed, and that their annual wages amount to 1,000,000*l.*; it is perfectly notorious, according to the system of payment, that those men will not receive, in the course of the year, that amount of wages; and that a large balance will be due to them when they are to be paid off. In consequence, however, of the change introduced by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for Pembroke, increasing the amount of current payments to families, and of pocket-money to the men, there is now a less amount of such balances. Nevertheless, in the fourth year, there will be payable a sum of money equal to the amount of the difference between the annual vote and the annual sum paid to the men. In the fourth year, there will, therefore, always be a considerable excess on the item of men's wages; and if, at any time, the number of men be reduced, there will be a corresponding excess in the amount to be paid. With regard to stores, the contracts are made for their delivery on the 3d of March; but if they should not be delivered until April, a much larger amount will be payable in a subsequent year than was calculated on in the year preceding; and such a case it is impossible to guard against. Under the old system, the department could draw on the Exchequer, and the payments were made partly to the credit of one year, and partly to the credit of another; but, under the Bill of the Right Honourable Baronet, the moment the year is out, the credit for that year is extinguished, at the Exchequer. There might be a sum of 300,000*l.* or 400,000*l.* payable in a year for which no provision had been made in the estimates, which must necessarily come under the head of excess, and, if paid, must be paid from the surplus arising from some other vote. It is, however, the same thing in the end, to the public; and, although the Admiralty may appear to be open to blame, the fault, if fault it be, arises from circumstances over which they have no control. The advantage of the balance sheet is that, at all events, the matter is brought before the public. I agree with the Honourable Member the Secretary to the Admiralty that it is expedient to make some provision to meet the objection; and I think it might be done by continuing the credits for a certain time.

MR. WARBURTON. — Several valuable and instructive Returns have been laid before the House with regard to the medical department of the army; and I wish to ask, whether similar Returns have been prepared with respect to the seamen on the different stations? If so, I trust they will be laid before the House, in order that we may test the comparative treatment of our seamen at different periods.

SIR T. TROUBRIDGE. — The statistical accounts to which the Honourable Member refers have been in the course of preparation for several years, and they are now in a state of forwardness. I believe they will be found perfectly satisfactory. I cannot say, exactly, when they will be produced; but I will take care that they shall be brought forward as soon as possible.

Mr. HUME. — I wish to ask, whether any arrangement is likely to be made for the more regular payment of seamen, who, on returning home, frequently have large sums of money to receive, of which they are sometimes plundered in the course of a week? I think great advantages would result from the correction of this irregularity; and that, if seamen had the means, they would purchase many useful articles, instead of squandering their money in irregularities. Their health would be much benefited, and their satisfaction with the service would be greatly increased.

SIR CHARLES ADAM. — A regulation, by which seamen receive a monthly allowance, has been in existence ever since the time the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke held the office of First Lord of the Admiralty; but it is a system which has been much complained of, by the officers, as producing habits of intoxication. I am persuaded, however, that, in its ultimate effects, it will be found to be a proper and useful measure. The indulgence requires a considerable degree of attention on the part of the officers; but that they will readily bestow. With regard to any further allowance being paid, that is a subject which requires mature deliberation; and it certainly shall receive my anxious attention.

Mr. HUME. — If a ship remain abroad two or three years, I wish to ask, whether there is any settlement, meantime, with the seamen, before her return, and what proportion of their wages they would receive monthly?

SIR C. ADAM. — The amount paid to them is 4*s.* per month. There is no balance paid to a seaman abroad; but he has clothes, and many other things, on account.

SIR GEORGE CLERK. — I wish to correct an error into which the Gallant Admiral has fallen, in answering a question put by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny. The practice of monthly payments has existed for fifteen years.

SIR C. ADAM. — That is quite true; but the allowance has been increased since its first establishment.

SIR GEORGE CLERK. — The practice was introduced, in 1825, by Sir George Cockburn. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny inquired as to the probable amount due to a seaman after two years' service. I believe a seaman is entitled to two months' pay before leaving the harbour; and this, together with bedding, clothes, &c., the allotment to his family, and his 4*s.* a-month, will leave him without any claim for two years to come. The only doubt as to the propriety of these advances was, whether, by allowing him thus to become a debtor to the public, a temptation would not be held out to quit the service; but I believe no inconvenience has arisen in this respect, and that the regulation has been conducive to the health and discipline of the men. But I rose chiefly to make a few remarks on the observations which have fallen from the Honourable Gentleman opposite (Mr. Wood). I agree with the Honourable Gentleman that it is almost impossible to confine the expense within the estimates; but when Parliament required a more strict compliance with the letter of the Appropriation Act, it was the bounden duty of the Admiralty, in forming the estimates, to take care to propose adequate sums to meet the demands likely to arise. With respect to the packets, I think the best course would be, to ask for an increased vote under that head. I am well aware that, at the time you are reducing the naval force, you will have a larger amount to pay in wages; but there is one reason why this has not occurred within the last five years, and why there is a considerable excess in that department; and that is, that, since the year 1836, when the Honourable Gentleman moved for an addition of 5000 men, until the present year, he has never raised within 2000 of that number, although the wages have been calculated to the full extent. In 1836, the Honourable Gentleman annexed an explanatory statement of the total amount of wages to be required for the seamen employed, which gave such satisfaction to the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, that he waived the objection to the increase of men; and I find there was a wonderful coincidence between the number of men voted and the actual number employed at the time the estimates were made: for the number voted was 15,500, and the number mustered on the ships' books, on the 1st of January, 1836, was 15,502. In 1837, there were 2180 men less employed than were voted; and, in 1838, there were 3000 less. At that time, the ships employed would have required 23,275 men to make up their full complements; and, as Parliament sanctioned a vote for 23,165, that number might have been sufficient, if the Admiralty had been able to find men willing to enter. But let us look at the present estimate. The number of seamen required for all the ships now in commission is 26,524. The Honourable Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty has explained the reason for the increase of men, by stating, that there are now 239 ships of war of all classes, whilst last year there were only 224. But the Admiralty, this year, instead of calling upon the House to vote such a number of men as will complete the complements of these ships, ask us to vote a smaller number of men than are actually employed at present; because we have now 24,376 men, being 2148 less than the proper complement; whilst the number proposed is only 24,165, being 2359 less.

The Honourable Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty informed the House, on Friday last, that, owing to the state of our foreign relations, it was impossible to hope for any reduction of our naval force. If it be necessary to employ 239 vessels of war, we ought, at least, to vote such a number of men as will complete the complements of the ships up to the peace establishment. I do not ask the House to complete them up to the war establishment, as recommended by the Honourable Member for Brighton, and some other Honourable Members. Again, we are asked to vote only 880,000*l.* for wages; whereas the amount necessary to pay the ships, if the complements were complete, would be 963,000*l.* I cannot sit down without adverting to the difficulty which has been experienced of late years in manning the navy. During the last five or six years, ships have frequently found it next to impossible to procure an adequate number of men, and have been obliged, in some instances, after a long detention in harbour, to quit the ports with a reduced crew. In the event of hostilities unexpectedly breaking out, it is evident that the most lamentable consequences may be apprehended. I would strongly urge the Admiralty to allow those seamen, to whom pensions for long services have been granted, to receive their pensions while serving on board Her Majesty's ships; a privilege which is now denied to them. It is true, that in the year 1816, when those pensions were first granted, a regulation was made that no man should receive a pension while serving in the navy; but the Committee must bear in mind the great difference between the state of our maritime affairs at that time and at the present. Instead of there being any difficulty in finding an adequate number of seamen at that period, there was an immense number unemployed in the various ports of the empire; and the compassion of the public was appealed to for the purpose of relieving their distress; and it was thought better to give employment to those men who had no pensions, than to those who had a moderate income. But circumstances have now entirely changed; great difficulty is experienced in getting men when they are wanted; and the effect of the regulation is now to deprive the country of many of its very best seamen, since it operates as a bar against their continuing in the service. It is perfectly clear, that, when they receive higher wages in merchant ships, and are, besides, allowed to draw their pensions, they cannot be expected to re-enter the navy, where they will get lower wages and forfeit their pensions. I am therefore impressed with the conviction, that the rescinding of the regulation will be an excellent means of facilitating the manning of our ships. Above all, whatever reasons might exist twenty years ago for sending out our ships with short complements, I contend that the altered circumstances of the country, the state of our foreign relations, the necessity of making a warlike demonstration in the Mediterranean, by sending out a squadron as large as that which Nelson commanded at the battle of the Nile, impose on us the duty of sending out our ships in an efficient state; because we know that the French ships are not only much larger than ours, but that their complements of men greatly exceed those of our ships. I believe that an increase has taken place since last year, to a small extent; but, judging from the ordinary sources of information, it is by no means sufficient; for almost every ship which has sailed for the Mediterranean has gone out short of hands; so that it was impossible they could take a sufficient number of supernumeraries to complete the complements of the vessels previously in that part of the world. I trust the Government will seriously consider the present position of affairs, and take measures for improving, not only the number, but the quality, of the men; for it is too much to expect that undermanned British vessels can compete with other vessels of greatly superior force.

they are now in a state of forwardness. I believe they will be found perfectly satisfactory. I cannot say, exactly, when they will be produced; but I will take care that they shall be brought forward as soon as possible.

Mr. HUME. — I wish to ask, whether any arrangement is likely to be made for the more regular payment of seamen, who, on returning home, frequently have large sums of money to receive, of which they are sometimes plundered in the course of a week? I think great advantages would result from the correction of this irregularity; and that, if seamen had the means, they would purchase many useful articles, instead of squandering their money in irregularities. Their health would be much benefited, and their satisfaction with the service would be greatly increased.

SIR CHARLES ADAM. — A regulation, by which seamen receive a monthly allowance, has been in existence ever since the time the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke held the office of First Lord of the Admiralty; but it is a system which has been much complained of, by the officers, as producing habits of intoxication. CAPTAIN PECHELL.—I quite concur in what has fallen from the Right Honourable Baronet, as to the necessity of increasing the facilities for manning the navy. I think the time has arrived when those old seamen ought to be permitted to return to the service, and retain their pensions. I am rather surprised at the inconsistency of many Honourable and Gallant Gentlemen opposite, who contend that there ought to be no such thing as a peace establishment; for, on the motion of my Gallant Friend (Sir E. Codrington), on the 21st of April last, for completing the complement of our ships, only one Noble Lord opposite (Lord Ingestre) voted in favour of the proposition; which was negatived by a majority of 90 to 27. These Honourable Gentlemen, however, now come forward and blame the Admiralty for the inefficient manning of our ships; but if a similar motion should be again made, I trust they will give it their support. I wish to call the attention of the Committee to one very meritorious class of men, who have hitherto been neglected. According to the present estimate, there appear to be 387 mates; whilst, in 1839, there were 487; and I should like to know, from the Honourable Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty, what has become of the hundred? In 1838, the number of mates, midshipmen, and volunteers amounted to 1303; in 1839, the number was 1069; and in 1840, the number is 1099; so that the number of these valuable officers is less by 200 than it was in 1838. By a Return which I hold in my hand, the number of mates on board ships on the 1st January, 1840, is stated to be 567; whilst, in the estimate, the number is only 387; and I am very anxious to hear that difference accounted for. Amongst these individuals, there are 11 whose services range from 25 to 30 years; 5 who passed their examination 12 years ago; 11 who have been in the service 11 years; and the majority have been employed more than 9 years. Their pay is only 2*s*. 9*d*. per day, whilst midshipmen receive only 1*s*., and volunteers no more than 9*d*. I consider this state of things to be a disgrace to the service; and I trust the case of these individuals will be taken into serious consideration, and that they will shortly be placed on a more respectable footing.

Mr. F. H. BERKELEY.—I had the honour of being in the minority on the occasion alluded to by the Gallant Captain who has just sat down; and everything which has since occurred has convinced me of the correctness of the principle laid down by the great Captain of the age, that no British ship should leave port unless with crew and equipment complete in every respect. With respect to what has recently occurred in China, if the Chinese had had a disposable force, or if they had been disciplined like the French, or the Americans, what would have been the consequence? Disgrace to our flag. It would be useless for us to attempt to enter into a contest with the French navy with our present short complement of men; for their bravery is not a matter of doubt; and if we send out a force of one to three, we must be humiliated. I, therefore, am of opinion, that our squadrons should be sent out in such a condition as to enable them to protect the flag at their mastheads. The first events of a war often give a character to that war; and if we should be defeated in our first efforts in a war with America, success would not be likely to attend us afterwards; for the enemy's ranks would be strengthened by desertions from our own, and the confidence of our men would be lost. On these grounds, I contend, that no ship of war ought to leave a British port unless she be completely prepared to act against any force, however well prepared it may be. I would not have a nominal, but an actual, equality. I would have a British frigate of thirty-six guns able to contend with one of the same force belonging to any other nation; but, at present, our 36-gun frigates are not more than a match for a 28-gun ship well armed and well manned. I contend, that more attention should be paid to the manning of our navy; and if that be not done, events may occur which we shall have the greatest cause to regret.

SIR H. VERNEY.—It appears to me most desirable that our navy should be fully on an equality with the navy of any other country; and that a smaller number of ships than we have, now, actually employed, is quite out of the question. It does appear extraordinary to me, that we should persevere in a practice which offers a bounty to our most experienced sailors to quit the service of the country. It is quite evident, that an officer at the age of forty is in the very prime of life; and to deprive him of his pension if he remain in the navy, is a direct bounty to engage in the American merchant service. I have heard it represented, over and over again, that our vessels are under-manned. I think it very impolitic, in those who are at the head of a gallant profession, to instil into the minds of those below them that our fleets are not fully manned; and if I were at the head of a regiment, I should be extremely sorry to find an opinion gaining ground that we were not in a condition to perform, in an efficient manner, any duty, which might be required of us. When statements are reiterated, that our ships leave the country in a condition which unfits them for the proper discharge of their duty, it must lead to the conviction, that they cannot perform that duty; and such an impression must be most injurious. I do not believe that they are undermanned. I do not believe that our large ships in the Mediterranean are incapable of any services that may be required of them, or that they are at all inferior to any ships in the world; for, in all our victories, we have had one half or one fourth less men than the vessels with which we have had to contend. I have heard, with great regret, the statement of the Gallant Officer opposite (Captain Pechell), that there are officers receiving not more than 30*l.* a-year, who have been for twenty years in the service. I think that an extremely low rate of remuneration; and I have no doubt that, if the case were brought before the House, it would receive the consideration to which it is fairly entitled.

LORD VISCOUNT INGESTRE.—I cannot agree with the Honourable Baronet who has just sat down, that naval officers ought not to express their sentiments on the state of the navy; and I should like to know where they are to speak their sentiments, if not in this House? I quite agree with the Honourable Member for Bristol (Mr. Berkeley) as to the expediency of fully manning the navy; and I had the honour of seconding the motion of a Gallant Friend, that ships going on foreign service should be completely manned. Since that time, I have been given to understand that a change has taken place; and I believe our force to be now more effective. I do not wish to make any factious opposition, on the subject of manning; my only desire is, that the service should be put on a proper footing, so that it may continue to maintain the honour of our flag. I cannot, however, subscribe to the opinion of the Honourable Member for Bristol, that we are likely to incur disgrace; for I do not believe that British ships would incur disgrace under any circumstances whatever, whether inadequately manned, or not. At the same time, they ought to be put in a proper state to meet the enemy, whenever they may be called upon. With respect to the condition of the mates and midshipmen, I perfectly agree in all that has fallen from the Gallant Officer the Member for Brighton. It is a disgrace to the service that there should be officers of that age holding no station, no rank, as compared with the army, — receiving, comparatively speaking, no pay, — and no half pay whatever. It is a hard case that men who have attained the age of forty-four years should still be kicking about in a midshipman's berth. I do not think that they ought to be placed in such a position after twenty-five years of age. There is one circumstance, with respect to the mates, which is most oppressive on them, and that is, when they are put on board ships, with acting orders, doing the duty of lieutenants. They are then frequently put into the officers' mess, but are not entitled to receive a tittle of additional pay. I believe that that plan has been forced upon the Admiralty in a false spirit of economy; but, I think, the sooner they put an end to it, the better will it be for the service. Now, with respect to the periodical payment of the men. A great amelioration has been effected in that respect; and my only doubt is, whether it has not been carried too far; for it has frequently led to breaches of discipline, by inducing intemperance, for which the men have been punished. It certainly is difficult to draw a proper line with respect to the mode of payment, and the question requires very serious consideration. If a man allot one half of his pay to his family, and obtain two months in advance, besides slops, there is very little chance of keeping him in the service, if he should consider himself aggrieved. These are reasons which ought to induce us to pause before increasing the monthly pay, which is quite sufficient at present, if not too much. With respect to the midshipmen, there is one class deserving of immediate attention. I allude to those who have received medals at the Royal Naval College. It has always been understood that a person receiving a medal is entitled, according to custom, to promotion at the end of the period of his servitude; and I think that persons so circumstanced ought to receive such promotion. I wish to mention one case to the Committee, which is peculiarly deserving of consideration. The case of a young gentleman, named Wood, who, after receiving a medal, went out and served in Portugal, with great satisfaction to his captains. On his return home, he passed his examination with the utmost credit to himself, exceeding, in point of numbers, an individual named Elliot, who was examined at the same time. Mr. Wood is still serving as a mate, whilst Mr. Elliot (a name familiar to the Admiralty) has been made a commander in the navy.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I think this is a case which calls for observation; and I must say, that, in my opinion, the patronage of the Admiralty is exercised, now, in the most profligate manner. I wish, before I sit down, to make a remark with respect to Sir James Gordon. I believe the Gallant Admiral mistook what I said on a former evening, for he thought I referred to the removal of that officer.

SIR C. ADAM. — No, no! I only took the opportunity of alluding to Sir James Gordon, in consequence of the Noble Lord having mentioned his mame.

LORD VISCOUNT INGESTRE. — What I intended to say was, that that officer was much more deserving of the governorship of Greenwich Hospital than Admiral Fleming, who had no earthly claim to it, except his political adherence to the present Administration. Taking the conduct of the Admiralty altogether, I must say that they have exercised their patronage in a very discreditable manner.

SIR T. TROUBRIDGE. — I am most reluctant to take up the time of the House; but so much has been said on the subject of undermanning the navy, that, considering the station which I have the honour to hold, and my own connection with the profession, I feel bound to trouble the House with a few words. I have never shrunk from expressing my opinion of the absurdity of war complements in a time of peace; and that opinion is every day strengthened by the information which I receive. Such a course must be expensive, and is wholly unnecessary. I admit that, some time ago, in consequence of the improvements made, not only in the ships, but in the armaments, it became necessary to review the complement of men, and to consider whether some addition should not be made; and the alterations were carried into effect in the new ships, the Pique, the Inconstant, and other ships of that class, and also in some other vessels of a larger size. Now, it will be asked, under what arrangement those additions were made? They were made upon a calculation of the increased number of men necessary to work the guns of the ships. A Gun Committee sat in 1828, which made certain recommendations. Since that time, an alteration has taken place in the weight of the guns, and other improvements have been made; and, after consulting the best officers connected with the gunnery department, the whole of it has been revised, and the result is, that a certain number of men are considered sufficient to work a 32-pounder, another fixed number to work a 68-pounder, and so on. I do not mean to say that many officers would not rejoice in having 50 or 60 extra men, to make a display with, in any port to which they might be ordered. But we are to consider whether we allow a sufficient number of men to do the duty of the ships in time of peace; and I defy any officer in the House to point out a single case in which our ships, manned as they are at present, have not done their duty. Have our sailors failed in the performance of their duty either on the coast of Africa or on the coast of China? Have they not shown the same gallantry, steadiness, and bravery as on former occasions; and have not those qualities been attended with the same success as formerly? Will any man tell me of any disaster we have recently met with? If anything of the kind had happened, I think, from the situation which I have the honour to fill, that I must have heard of it; and yet I have heard nothing of the sort. Many other charges have been made against the Admiralty, but they are quite irrelevant to the vote before the House; and the better time to answer them will be, when the items to which they refer come regularly in the progress of the estimates under the consideration of the Committee. I am quite aware of the advantage of taking a vote on this estimate to-night; and I am equally aware of the impropriety of so humble an individual as myself making a long speech upon it. But there is one other point which I feel bound to notice. I have no hesitation in declaring, that, in our naval service, there must be some hard cases so far as regards the mates. That is a matter, however, which does not rest entirely with the Admiralty. We can only promote 1 in 3, and therefore, upon that score, no complaint can be made against the Admiralty. The Noble Lord has stated, that there are a number of hard cases arising from the long service of the mates. No doubt there are; but there are mates upon the list, who, though they have been fourteen, and even seventeen, years in the service, have not been anything like that time at sea. They have been on board steamboats; they have gone to Australia; they have been in India, and elsewhere, for their private emolument; and they have not, therefore, the same claim upon the Admiralty as those who have been all the time at sea in the service of the country.

LORD G. LENNOX. — Sir, I beg to suggest to the Honourable Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty the propriety of making a supplementary estimate for the marines, thus separating their expenses from those of the navy. Unless this be done, it is impossible accurately to ascertain what portion of the sum of 51,426*l.* is received by the 9000 marines. There is a charge of 1383*l.* for the pay of one lieutenant general of marines. Now, that officer belongs to the navy, and never was in the marines. There is also a charge of 1037*l.* for a major general of marines, who never served in the marines. There are other charges of a similar description. Now, the Committee ought to be able to ascertain, exactly, what the actual marine force costs the country. I object to having officers of the navy paid for being officers of marines, when, in point of fact, they are mere idlers. There is another item still more objectionable. I find that the pensions granted to flag officers, captains, and marine officers amount to 4350*l.* Can any man, on reading the words of that estimate, believe it possible that marine officers have not an equal share in those pensions? I deny, most positively, that they have. Two pensions of 150*l.* were last year granted to two gallant naval officers, and I am far from objecting to them; but I should like to see some share in those pensions granted to the marines. I also observe, in the estimates, one item for eight retired colonels of marines. I wish to ask the Secretary of the Admiralty whether the vacancies occasioned by those eight retirements have been filled up; because I believe that two of them were not to be filled up till the presentation of the Report of the Naval and Military Commissioners?

MR. BERNAL. — I wish to remind Honourable Members, that, although great latitude is allowed, on occasions of this kind, the present vote regards only the charge for the wages of seamen; and I would suggest whether the discussion would not more properly arise on the different points in the estimates, as they are brought forward.

CAPTAIN A'COURT.—I wish merely to say a word or two on behalf of the unfortunate mates. I believe that, if the Admiralty persist in their present system, they will find it matter of difficulty to get young men to enter the service as mates. I wish the Admiralty would promote the whole of the 300; and, I believe, it would not cost the nation more than 15,000*l.* a-year. I quite disagree with the Gallant Officer opposite (Sir T. Troubridge) as to the manning of the navy. It is my opinion that no ship ought to leave this country without being fully manned to meet all emergencies.

CAPTAIN THEOBALD JONES. — The Honourable and Gallant Member for Brighton has accused Honourable and Gallant Gentlemen on this side of the House of not supporting the motion of Sir E. Codrington. I am of opinion that none of our ships ought to be sent to a foreign country unless fully manned; but I do not think that a proper question for this House to decide; it ought to rest with the responsible advisers of the Crown. With respect to the observations of the Honourable and Gallant Member for Sandwich, that the present complement is founded on the Report of the Gun Committee; if that Report be good for anything, it shows the necessity for two establishments.

SIR T. TROUBRIDGE. — I said that the Report of the Gun Committee was the foundation of that alteration, which had been carried out by Sir Thomas Hastings. In consequence of the change in the system of armament, with respect to shells, it became necessary to attach a certain number of men to that department. Of course, their services are available for the purpose of furling the sails, weighing anchor, and many other things; and, therefore, I say that the ships are better manned than the generality of officers believe; and I will venture to add, that there never was a fleet in such order and discipline as our's is at the present moment.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — I am very anxious that this and the succeeding vote should pass through the Committee this evening, because it will be a great convenience to the service. I think, however, that we ought not to grant any further votes until the Report of the Naval and Military Commission shall have been laid before the House. That Commission has suggested various improvements; and, when we are acquainted with them, we shall be in a much better situation to discuss the estimates. I understand that not more than another sitting of that Commission is necessary to complete its Report. The Duke of Wellington is now sufficiently recovered to attend to business; and I trust that, in the course of next week, he will be able to devote a day to the consideration and approval of that Report. If any grants beyond those at present under discussion be proposed before that Report is received, I shall meet them with every opposition in my power.]

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I think one of the propositions of the Honourable and Gallant Officer reasonable enough; and that is, that the Government should be content to take the next two votes, and not go further into the estimates, to-night. But I cannot agree to the Honourable and Gallant Officer's second proposition, that we should take no more votes upon the navy estimates until the Report of the Naval and Military Commission is received. I cannot see any such connection between the two subjects as should induce the Committee to consider that they cannot decide on the estimates independently of the Report of that Commission. That point, however, can be decided when the estimates again come before the Committee.

Mr. HERRIES. — I quite concur in the view of the Honourable Gentleman opposite as to the propriety of taking this vote; and I think, after the long discussion which has taken place, there must be a general disposition to bring it to a close. But I cannot allow the present vote to pass through the Committee without taking notice of a subject closely connected with it. I allude to the total want of information respecting the interruption of our commercial intercourse with the Chinese. Six weeks ago, Her Majesty, in her most gracious Speech from the throne, made this announcement to the two Houses of Parliament: —

> Events have happened in China which have occasioned an interruption of the commercial intercourse of my subjects with that country. I have given, and shall continue to give, the most serious attention to a matter so deeply affecting the interests of my subjects, and the dignity of the Crown.

Since the delivery of that Speech it has become notorious to all the world that preparations have been made for the departure from England of a considerable armament, destined for the accomplishment of some national purpose connected with this very untoward event; and it is well known that the merchants of England are knocking daily at the doors of the Treasury, in the hope of receiving some satisfaction for property of their's, worth 2,400,000*l.*, which has been sacrificed at Canton, in compliance with the demands of the British commissioner. But still their demands are left in abeyance, and they have received no encouraging answer to their application. The House of Commons remains up to this day totally uninformed, except by the statements in the newspapers, of any of these important proceedings; and this is the more singular, because a very general impression prevails that there has been considerable mismanagement in the administration of our affairs in that part of the world; that there has been great vacillation in our policy from day to day, — which has been not only injurious to private individuals, but highly disgraceful to the country. I do not mean to say that that impression is true; I only say that it is nearly universal. Of this, however, there can be no doubt, that not one single word has been uttered by any of Her Majesty's Ministers to satisfy the House of Commons, or to give it an insight into the grounds on which it is called to vote for additional expenses on account of our expedition to China. Honourable Members have asked for this information in almost every possible shape; and the Noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs has given promises on the subject in his most affable and agreeable manner: but, unfortunately, nothing like performance has ever followed those promises. When I asked the Noble Lord, last week, on the subject of these papers, he said that he thought the information would be forthcoming in the beginning of the present week, although he refused to bind himself to any particular day; but the week has now very nearly elapsed, and still no papers are forthcoming. I think the time has really arrived at which it is incumbent upon Government to present this information to the House. In other and better times, if such delay had taken place in the production of papers, a motion would have been made for an Address to the Crown to compel their production. I hope that there will be no occasion for a measure of that description at present, but that the Government will, without further delay, place upon the table the information which the country is now looking for with so much anxiety.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — If the Right Honourable Gentleman had not, himself, been so long in office, I might have thought his present complaint a natural one; but the Right Honourable Gentleman knows the details of office, and can very well understand that the business of the production of such papers is not to be compared to a Member framing a motion and bringing it on at the very moment fixed for discussion. When the Right Honourable Gentleman talks of the production of papers, he ought to remember that they have to be copied, and that printers have to perform their work; and that it is not possible to say that they shall be produced on a given day. I assure the Right Honourable Gentleman that there has been no unnecessary delay, and no indisposition, in the office over which I preside, to forward the production of these papers. With regard to an Address to the Crown, the Right Honourable Gentleman must know that the papers have been already moved for, and that their production is not a matter of courtesy, but of duty, on my part, as soon as they be ready. I have no doubt that I shall be able to lay them on the table in the course of next week. I can only say, with regard to the other points referred to, that whatever impression may have gone forth as to the manner in which our affairs have been conducted in that part of the world, the papers, when produced, will prove that there is no foundation for the opinions to which the Right Honourable Gentleman has alluded. I must say, that there is no shrinking on our part, touching the production of these papers. It is now a mere question of clerkship and of printers' labour.

Mr. HERRIES. — I must say, that I never recollect anything like the delay which has occurred in preparing these documents. I well know the attention and diligence of the gentlemen employed in the public offices; and, with that knowledge, I cannot imagine any reason for this extraordinary delay. There must be something beyond all former precedent, or the papers must be extremely voluminous. The announcement in Her Majesty's Speech was an indication that these papers would be presented; and they ought to have been ready long ago.

SIR C. ADAM. — Some remarks have been made with respect to the great difference between the number of mates in 1838 and 1840. This is not a question which can be answered off-hand. I believe there are 75 fewer mates than last year; and out of these, 35 have been promoted.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord opposite whether the Government have received any despatches from China, giving an account of an assault on two vessels of war; and if so, what force was employed, and what number of the Chinese were killed or wounded?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I have received no official accounts of the matter.

Resolution agreed to; to be reported on Monday next. The House resumed.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

The BISHOP of EXETER. — My Lords, I hold in my hand several petitions on a subject of vital importance to the Church;—I mean the system of church discipline. It has been my misfortune to differ on this subject from many whose judgment I revere; but I am now happy to say that, in a recent conference of the Bishops upon this matter, an understanding has been come to without a compromise of principle on the part of any one, which will enable us to lay before both Houses of Parliament a Bill, that I hope will give satisfaction to all parties. I am heartily rejoiced to be able to make that statement. I beg to present to your Lordships petitions praying that in any measure upon this subject which may be introduced to Parliament, provision may be made for the salutary exercise of episcopal power; upholding, at the same time, the appellate jurisdiction of the metropolitan courts,—from the clergy of the deanery and peculiars of Pyder; from the archdeacon and clergy of the archdeaconry of Exeter; from the archdeacon and clergy of the deaneries of Barnstaple and Sherwell; and from the clergy of the deanery of Furness and Cartmel; West Powder; Penwith; and West.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The BISHOP of LONDON. — My Lords, it is my pleasing duty to confirm what has just fallen from the Right Reverend Prelate, and also to express my hope that the measure, in which the Bishops have concurred, will prove satisfactory.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.—NON-INTRUSION.

The BISHOP of LONDON. — My Lords, I have to present a petition in favour of the principle of non intrusion,—from the minister, elders, and others, of Kilmenny. The prayer of the petition relates to a subject of vital interest to the Church and people of Scotland. The petitioners say, that the excitement which prevails upon it in that country is so great, that the question ought to be speedily settled by legislation; and that no persons in Scotland would oppose such a settlement, save Chartists, Socialists, and those who are anxious for disorder and revolution. I trust we shall be able to settle the question in such a way as may prevent those painful discussions which must otherwise take place in both Houses of Parliament.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — My Lords, I have to present twenty-five petitions against the present law of church patronage, and the intrusion of unacceptable ministers; from the congregation of Renfield Church, Glasgow, — from the minister and members of the Presbyterian Church of Galway; from heritors, ministers, elders, and others of Blantyre; from members of the congregation and inhabitants of Wellpark; and West parish, Airdrie; from the Presbytery of Dunoon, and Forres; from individuals belonging to John Knox's Church and parish, Aberdeen; and from inhabitants of Callander; Dundonald; North Renaldehaye; Banff; Boindie, and Aloah; Alves; Arngask; Glammis; Cummertrees; Ladyloan; Rathven; East parish of Airdrie; Dyke; Rhyme; Dallas; Fordyce; Inveravon; Sanday; Inchture; Tomintone; Edinkillie; Rothes; Brechin; Rosemarkie (including the royal burgh of Fortrose); Camlachie; Monzie; Rafford; Forque; Rothiemurchus; Inverness; Irvine; Old Kilpatrick; Enzie; Kilwinning; Errol; Kilmaurs; Lochmaben; Monteith; Deskford; Mortlach; Symington; and Melville. I can confirm the statements which have been made as to the extent and intensity of the ill-will which prevails on this subject; and I beg to ask the Noble Viscount (Lord Melbourne), whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to adopt any measure, speedily, for reconciling these grievances? I have, also to present a petition from Rothes, which is the only one I have received, complaining of the conduct of the General Assembly in suspending ministers for obeying the civil law.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I cannot say, as the Noble Duke wishes me to do, that I will immediately introduce into Parliament a measure to remedy these grievances. But I must remark, that the Government are as much aware as the Noble Duke is, of the great extent of ill-will which has grown out of these questions; and the whole subject shall have their immediate and most serious attention.

The EARL of HADDINGTON. — I understood my Noble Friend on the cross bench, to remark that the twenty-five petitions, all of them, complained of the conduct of the General Assembly. In conclusion, however, the Noble Duke said, the last one, only, was against it. I understood him so, and perhaps other Noble Lords did. It may be as well, therefore, to give an opportunity for explanation.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — What I intended to say was, that the twenty-five petitions were in favour of non-intrusion. While I am on my legs, I will take the opportunity of saying, that I am happy to hear the matter is under consideration. I hope that the assurance will go forth, and that the people of Scotland will receive it in a kindly manner, and that it will put an end to the dreadful excitement which prevails; otherwise it will become most dangerous to the Church, and to every one possessing property in that kingdom.

The EARL of HADDINGTON.—I am quite sure that the Noble Duke has spoken correctly. I perfectly concur with him in thinking that the excitement now prevailing in Scotland is much to be deplored; but it ought to be remembered, that it was produced by the conduct of the Commissioners of the General Assembly, who suspended a majority of a whole presbytery from all spiritual functions, because they declared they would obey the law as expounded by the Supreme Court. That excitement did not arise from the interference of the civil court; that court did not at all interfere, until it was called upon to interpret, and put the law, as declared by this House, in force; and, accordingly, it has interdicted any interference in the parishes of the seven clergymen. Those unfortunate gentlemen have had their motives and conduct grievously misrepresented; their conduct has been loyal and peaceable, and they are well deserving of the sympathy, regard, and support of all peaceable and well-thinking persons.

The EARL of MINTO. — My Lords, considering the great importance of this subject, and the excitement which prevails, I would submit to the Noble Earl the propriety of abstaining from discussing the question of non-intrusion at the present moment. I think it would be better to wait until the measure is proposed; and I trust I am not too sanguine in hoping that it will be such a one as will put an end to the excitement so unhappily prevailing in Scotland.

The EARL of HADDINGDON. — My Lords, I entirely agree with the Noble Earl. I did not rise to express my opinion, but merely to state what were the true bearings of the case. I should be extremely sorry to enter into the details of the measure; but I had an anxiety to set the conduct of the seven clergymen in its proper light.

The EARL of GALLOWAY. — I do not wish to say one word as to the merits of the question; nor would I do anything to increase the excitement which now unhappily prevails upon it. I believe that excitement has mainly arisen from the great tardiness of the Government in doing its duty.

The EARL of ROSSE. — In my opinion, Her Majesty's Ministers are quite justified in abstaining from active measures on this matter until they have had full opportunity for consideration.

The EARL of ABERDEEN.—Although I think there might have been time found, since last summer, for a full consideration of this question, I still hope that nothing will be done without due consideration; as precipitation might be most injurious. To show my unwillingness to enter into the subject at all, I will not advert to the few words of my Noble Friend, which, though few, I do not wholly agree with.

The EARL of ZETLAND, the EARL of ROSSE, the EARL of MINTO, the MARQUESS of BUTE, and the DUKE of SUTHERLAND presented petitions in favour of non-intrusion, — from Jedburgh; Stromness; Dreghorn; Cromdale; Galashiels; Kirkgunzeon; Boindie; Kinnethmont; and Stonykirk.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The DUKE of RICHMOND presented a petition, praying that some measure may be adopted for settling the question of Scotch Church patronage, — of parishioners of the parish of Knockand, and county of Moray. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CATHEDRALS.

The BISHOP of EXETER presented a petition, praying that the endowments of cathedrals may be protected, and that religious education may be promoted, — of members of the Ilchester deanery board of education, in the diocese of Bath and Wells. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (COLONIES).

The BISHOP of LONDON presented a petition for protection of, — of the minister, churchwardens, and others, of Cheltenham. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FOREIGN AGRICULTURAL PRODUCE.

The EARL of GALLOWAY presented a petition of the Guildry Incorporation of Dundee, praying that the importation of foreign agricultural produce may be permitted, duty free. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CORN LAWS.

The EARL of ROSSE and the EARL of MINTO presented petitions, praying for the repeal of, — of the workers at Claverhouse bleachfield, and Douglas bleachfield; and of inhabitants of Pittenween; Coupar Angus; Jedburgh; Perth; Auchterarder; and Hawick. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CHURCH EXTENSION.

The BISHOP of EXETER presented a petition in favour of, — of the clergy of the deanery of West Looe, in the county of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CHURCH RATES.

The EARL of GALLOWAY presented a petition praying for the release of John Thorogood (a prisoner in Chelmsford gaol), and for the abolition of church rates, and of the criminal jurisdiction of ecclesiastical courts, — of Dissenters of Kettering; of Dissenters of Devonshire Square Chapel, London; and of Over Darwen and Auchtermuchty.

DISSENTERS.

Petition for relief, — of inhabitants of Over Darwen.

FIRE ARMS (IRELAND).

On the motion of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, Return of the number of persons who have registered fire arms at the several quarter sessions of the peace holden in Ireland, in the years 1837, 1838, 1839, and at the Hilary quarter sessions in January, 1840; distinguishing the number at each sessions, and the several periods and places at which the same were registered respectively. — Ordered to be laid before the House.

POOR LAW (IRELAND).

On the motion of the MARQUESS of WESTMEATH, copy of the several warrants of the Poor Law Commissioners constituting the union of Kells, in the county of Meath, the union of Old Castle, in the county of Meath, and the union of Mullingar, in the county of Westmeath. — Ordered to be laid before the House.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS (IRELAND).

Report of, for the year 1839, laid on the table by the MARQUESS of NORMANBY.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON THE PETITION OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY PRAYING FOR RELIEF.

The Viscount Strathallan added to the Committee; and the evidence taken before the Committee from time to time to be printed, for the use of the Members of this House; but no copies to be delivered, except to the members of the Committee, until further order.

On the motion of the MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY, summons of the Lords for to-morrow, discharged: (to present a petition from Londonderry, relative to Municipal Corporations (Ireland).

SULPHUR TRADE WITH SICILY.

LORD LYNDHURST. — My Lords, I have been requested to present to your Lordships a petition respecting the commercial relations of this country with Sicily, and in particular as far as these relate to the sulphur trade carried on with that country. The petition is signed by several merchants of the city of London. From communications which I have received, I did expect similar petitions from Liverpool and Glasgow; but owing to some accidental circumstances, those petitions have not yet reached me. The subject is one of considerable importance, not only to the petitioners in particular, but also to the manufacturing concerns of this country. The Noble Viscount, three nights since, said that he had reason to suppose that many statements would be made, in the present Session of Parliament, with respect to the condition of our commerce. Whether that arose from any consciousness that the commerce of this country has not been sufficiently protected, I shall not stop to inquire; but I beg to observe, that these petitioners come before your Lordships with no political or party view; but that they petition the House solely with the desire of obtaining compensation and redress for the losses and injuries which they have sustained in relation to the subject-matter of the petition. Your Lordships are no doubt aware that, in consequence of modern discoveries in chemistry, the article of sulphur has become one of great importance to the principal manufactures of this country. In the course of eleven years preceding 1837, its importation into this country increased eleven fold. In 1826, we imported about 4000 tons; and in 1837, the importation had increased to the enormous amount of 44,000 tons. From this fact your Lordships will be able to estimate the immense importance of this article to our manufactures. Your Lordships are also aware that nearly the whole of the importation is from the island of Sicily. Sulphur is found in other places; but it is procured in such large quantities in Sicily, and it is, there, of so easy access, that almost the whole supply is derived from that island. In the year 1816, a commercial treaty was entered into between England and Sicily; and by the stipulations it was provided that ample protection should be afforded to British subjects and British property; "that British subjects should, without any let or hindrance whatever, be allowed, at their free will and pleasure, to dispose of their property; that they should be treated as the subjects of the most favoured nations; and that no duty, tax, or impost should be levied on them beyond the duties, taxes, and imposts levied on the subjects of the most favoured nations." These were the stipulations in that well-known treaty. In consequence of that treaty, and the faith and reliance which were placed upon it, the merchants of this country have embarked a very large capital in the sulphur trade with Sicily. They have taken leases of the mines in that island, and they have established machinery, at a very large expense, to increase the supply of the article. In fact, they have created a trade; and up to the year 1838, it was carried on with the utmost advantage to those concerned in the trade, and to the manufacturing interests of England. These proceedings continued till the month of July, 1838. Then, for the first time, it was announced by the Sicilian Government that they had granted a monopoly of this important article, not to the French Government, not to the French nation, but to a number of French adventurers, at the head of whom was a person named Phillippe. By the terms of this monopoly, the stipulations of the treaty to which I have referred are directly violated. By one of the terms of the contract, it is provided that no greater quantity than a certain stipulated amount of sulphur shall be exported from that country by British or other subjects. The object of this stipulation is too obvious to require comment. How these parties obtained an influence over the Neapolitan Government sufficient to induce them to make a stipulation so disadvantageous to the interests of England, and to the interests of the Neapolitans themselves, it is not for me say. We know enough of the manner in which these transactions are carried on, to be able to form some opinion, and, perhaps, a correct one, on the subject. But the advantage which was given to the French was enormous; for, at the time, an immense quantity of sulphur had been imported into France, which was being sold at a loss; and, in consequence of this prohibition, the price advanced, and that which had before been a losing trade, became a very advantageous one, at the expense of British interests. But this was a direct infraction of the treaty; because by that treaty every British subject was allowed to dispose of his property without any let or hinderance whatever. This prohibition was directly in the teeth of that provision. It has been suggested, that the limitation was made for the general benefit of the trade. That suggestion, however, can hardly be supported; and for this reason, namely, that these monopolists are not bound at all by the limitation. They may export to any amount, one third of the proceeds of the quantity sold beyond the stipulated amount being paid to the Sicilian Government. Therefore they can at all times pour into the market that quantity which will best suit their own interests, and most injure the interests of British subjects. But this is not the only circumstance which has made the grant of this monopoly a direct infraction of the treaty. By another article of the contract with these monopolists, no person is allowed to sell in the island any sulphur except to the French contractors. There is this limitation, that British subjects and others may, if they think proper, instead of selling to the contractors, export for their own benefit, and at their own instance; but then the contract says, if they do so, they must pay a duty which would amount almost to the cost price of the article, and to twice the amount paid by the monopolists. This is another violation of the treaty — of the stipulation which says that no duty, tax, or impost shall be paid by British subjects beyond those paid by the subjects of the most favoured nations. Here, then, are two distinct infringements of the treaty to which I have referred.

But there is another circumstance of which the petitioners complain, and by which they have sustained great loss. The contract establishing the monopoly came into operation one month after it was announced. Having been announced in July, it came into operation in August. The consequence of this was, a great increase in the price. Many of the British merchants had contracted to furnish the article at a certain price; and if they had then been compelled to do so, it would have been their ruin. I have been informed that twenty-four British ships, which went to Sicily for the purpose of conveying sulphur to England, have been obliged to return home without cargoes. The consequence of all this has been, that the sulphur trade—one of so much importance to England and to Sicily—has almost been put an end to. It is true, that the parties still hold their property, and that their mines are still worked; but at a loss, and the trade is substantially at an end. The price of the article is now double what it was in 1837; and, in consequence, the manufacturers of this country are obliged to have recourse to all kinds of expedients to obtain a substitute for the high-priced article from Sicily. My Lords, your Lordships will naturally suppose that this has created a great outcry, and remonstrances from the British residents in Sicily. The Sicilians themselves have complained; for the effect of the monopoly has been, to throw a great number of the native labourers out of employ; and I am told, that the excitement at one period was such, that, if a single British man-of-war had appeared on the coast, an end at once would have been put to this monopoly. But what has been the course adopted by the British Ministry? A Mr. Macgregor was sent out; and that gentleman has now been engaged eighteen months in negotiation, and, hitherto, without any practical result. The monopoly still continues; the trade is still stopped; and nothing, in effect, has been done to remove these evils. My Lords, I have been informed that some treaty was actually signed towards the close of last year. Why that treaty has not been ratified, I have no means of ascertaining; but I am happy to see a Noble Friend in the House, who, I believe, was, during the negotiations, resident at Naples, being then a member of the Government; and he, no doubt, will be able to give some satisfactory intimation on the subject. The object of the petitioners is, to call the attention of the House and Her Majesty's Government to the matter. They state that they have a right to be protected; and that they have a right to call on Her Majesty's Ministers to see that justice is done them. They also feel that they have a right to call upon Her Majesty's Ministers to insist that compensation be awarded them for the losses they have sustained, and redress for the evils of which they complain; and it is with this view, and with these objects, that the petitioners have requested me to present the petition. My Lords, I move that the petition be now read.

" The petition having been read by the clerk at the table,—

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE said:—My Lords, the whole facts connected with the question to which the Noble Lord has called the attention of your Lordships; the treaty which exists between this country and the Two Sicilies; and the obligations entered into, under that treaty, by the Governments of the two countries; and the whole transactions relative to them,—with the exception of some slight inaccuracies in the latter particular—have been stated with perfect justice, candour, and fairness, and without any exaggeration, or any too high colouring, by the Noble Baron. The Noble Baron inferred, that my observation, some time ago, " that we should have many commercial discussions during the Session," arose from a consciousness on my part that that portion of the policy of the country—that those duties—had not been attended to by us. Now, my Lords, my remark arose from no such idea. I had no such notion. It arose, solely, from the importance, frequently acknowledged by me, of such subjects, and of the benefit arising from their free and open discussion; and it also arose from the number of the motions now entered on the books of the House, and from the discussions which have already taken place on such subjects in this and the other House of Parliament. My remark arose from no such shadowy and spectral feelings as those attributed to me by the Noble Lord. The Noble Lord, too, has adverted to the influence by which this sulphur monopoly—which he has described so minutely that it is quite unnecessary for me again to state it to your Lordships—was obtained. It certainly is a monopoly in favour of the inhabitants of France; but it was not obtained by the present Government of France, nor by the present reigning power of that kingdom. My Lords, I will only say, in the next place,—as the Noble Lord stated correctly,—that the monopoly is not now a subject of treaty or negotiation. We have always thought that the infraction of the law of 1816, and the direct and open violation of the two articles, were not matters to be treated of, or on which negotiation would be proper. But we have thought the proper course to pursue would be, for the Government of this country to call upon the Government of the Two Sicilies for the fulfilment of the engagements entered into by them, and by which they are strictly bound. This is the view which we have taken of the matter. A strong remonstrance, at the time, was made against this monopoly by our minister at Naples; and, in August last, a verbal promise was given by that Government that the monopoly would be abolished and departed from. That statement was made; but it has not been attended to, and the fulfilment of the promise has not yet been accomplished; and it is now left to the Government of England to demand that fulfilment, and to demand, also, on behalf of the subjects and merchants of this country embarked in the trade, that protection which is most unquestionably their right.

The Noble Lord said that we had resorted to negotiation, and had sent Mr. Macgregor to make arrangements and negotiate on the subject. Now, the facts connected with this part of the case are these: — This is the only passage in which the Noble Lord, during the course of his statements, fell into some inaccuracies. In the summer, we understood that the Government of Naples was favourable to some new arrangement respecting commercial matters. It is not necessary to state what we understood to be the particular changes contemplated; but it will be sufficient, generally, to state, that the basis of this new arrangement was to be, an entire alteration of the tariff — of the import and export duties levied on the goods of this country. Now, Mr. Macgregor was sent by us to know what was the proposed reduction in the tariff, — to settle with the Government of Naples what reduction was to be made in the duties on our commodities. This was the sole object of Mr. Macgregor's mission to Naples. Unquestionably that gentleman — no doubt actuated by the best intentions — went farther, and entered into the treaty alluded to by the Noble Lord and the petitioners, whose case he has brought forward. In the steps which Mr. Macgregor subsequently took, he acted without the authority of his Government at home. It is unsatisfactory, no doubt, that by these means Mr. Macgregor should have made that a matter of treaty which ought not to have been thus treated. The Government, holding this view of the question, and holding it to be their duty not to negotiate at all on the question, did not think fit to ratify the treaty thus entered into. Mr. Macgregor is a gentleman of great talent, ability, and experience; and there can be no doubt that he acted with the best intentions. He, however, did that which he was not authorised to do, not being at the time in the possession of the feelings of his Government on the subject. The Government thought that it was fit that they should take decided measures on the question; and therefore the strongest remonstrances have been sent out; and it has been intimated to the Sicilian Government that we shall insist on the strict fulfilment of the treaty.

LORD LYNDHURST. — Let me remind the Noble Viscount, that eighteen months have elapsed since the infraction of this treaty. Now, during that time, what act has been done, or what steps have been taken, to procure indemnity for the merchants? The amount of loss has been fearful. It has amounted to 1000*l.* a-day, at the lowest estimate. Surely this calls for prompt and decisive measures.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — The Noble Lord asks what acts have been done? Why, no act has yet been done; but he must remember that we had a promise from the Government of Naples, which it now rests with that Government to fulfil.

LORD LYNDHURST.—Does the Noble Viscount know that they insist on a continuation of this monopoly for six months, from January last?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.— I have not heard that.

LORD LYNDHURST. — Something ought to be done. Six line-of-battle ships sent from Malta to Naples would settle the matter in a fortnight.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

CHURCH BUILDING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

CANTERBURY PAVEMENT.

Order for consideration of petition from Canterbury (presented 28th February), read.—Report from Select Committee on Standing Orders (12th February) read.

SIR EDWARD KNATCHBULL.—I rise to move, that the commissioners of pavement of Canterbury—who obtained leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Paving and Lighting Act for that city, passed in the 27th year of Geo. III., which renders it imperative on them to make an annual rate of one shilling and sixpence in the pound upon the annual value of all rateable property within the city, which rate produces a larger sum than they require, for the purposes of the Act—that, as they pray, under these circumstances, they may be allowed to proceed with the Bill, notwithstanding that the General Committee on Standing Orders have reported that the Standing Orders have not been complied with. Of course, unless the House interpose its authority, the Bill cannot proceed; and I certainly think this is a case in which it may justly so interpose. It seems to have been entirely through inadvertency that the Standing Orders were not complied with in this instance; and, inasmuch as great injury will be done to the ratepayers of Canterbury (on whom the expense of a new Bill will fall) should the measure now before us not be carried forward; whilst, on the other hand, no party can, in any degree, suffer, by allowing it to be proceeded with; I do trust the House will consent to the motion.

Mr. BRADSHAW.—I have great pleasure in seconding the motion. I hope the House will not inflict a grievous hardship on the ratepayers of Canterbury, because these commissioners or their agents have been betrayed into an error through inadvertency. It is clear, that no injury can accrue to any party by allowing the Bill to proceed; while much inconvenience, expense, and delay will be avoided.

Mr. GREENE.—I feel it my duty to oppose this motion. It is one in principle similar to that which was made a few evenings ago, in the case of the Ardwick Improvement Bill; and which the House refused by a very decided majority. In that case, there was no doubt that the omission to comply with some of the Standing Orders had happened through mere inadvertence; and, probably, such is the fact, too, in the present instance. But there is this difference between the two cases,—that, in this one of Canterbury, the parties promoting the Bill have not complied with a single "Standing Order." Under these circumstances, I trust the House will see that this is not a case in which it ought to interpose its authority, to dispense with the orders.

SIR GEORGE STRICKLAND.—Sir, I am sure the House will do me the justice to believe, that I would not, on slight grounds, support the suspension of any of the Standing Orders relating to Private Bills; but I do think the present case is one in which the House ought to interfere; as the Standing Orders Committee has not thought proper to exercise that equitable jurisdiction in the question which it undoubtedly possesses in such cases. If the House do not interpose, as it is prayed to do, much hardship will accrue to the parties interested in the Bill, to whom no blame whatever is fairly attributable.

Mr. ESTCOURT.—I agree with my Honourable Friend (Mr. Greene), that no case whatever has been made out to justify the House in acceding to the proposition of my Right Honourable Friend the Member for East Kent. As I stated on a former evening, when a somewhat similar case was brought under the consideration of the House, our "Standing Orders" will be worse than useless, if we are to have them dispensed with on every occasion where parties, by negligence, or other cause, have omitted to comply with them. Those Standing Orders were made for the protection of the public; and that protection will be altogether removed, if such motions as the present are complied with,—no good ground for that compliance having been stated.

Mr. BROTHERTON.—I supported the motion on a former evening for the suspension of the Standing Orders in the case of the Ardwick Improvement Bill; and I thought that a strong case was then made out why the House should accede to the motion. I do not think the present case so strong as that; but still I do think it is one in which, to avoid great individual hardship, this House ought to interpose its dispensing authority. I shall therefore support the motion.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — I would beg to call the attention of the House to the fact, that the parties promoting this Bill did not know that all the necessary Standing Orders had not been complied with, until they came before the Committee. The omission was altogether the result of inadvertence, which I trust the House will not visit on parties who are wholly innocent, but on whom the expenses that must be consequent on the rejection of the Bill, and the introduction of a new Bill at a future period, will inevitably fall.

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — I must oppose this motion; for, if the House complies with it, it will be establishing a very dangerous precedent. My Right Honourable Friend (Sir Edward Knatchbull) says, that the circumstance of this Bill being allowed to proceed will injure no party; but that great inconvenience will arise from its rejection. I should be sorry for any such result; but it is really a result on which all parties must calculate, when they fail to comply with the rules which the House has laid down for the regulation of these matters. Besides, I understand that there is an opposition to the Bill, which makes the observance of the Standing Orders still more necessary.

The House then divided upon the question, "That the commissioners for the Canterbury pavement be allowed to proceed with their Bill:" — Ayes 5, Noes 54; Majority 49.

SALE OF BEER BILL (No. 2).

Bill, "to alter and amend the Laws relating to the Sale of Beer," presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Wednesday, the 18th of March, and to be printed.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on question (28th February), "That the order for the attendance of panels, No. 1. and 2., on the 12th and 16th of March, be discharged." Question again proposed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL — Having looked into the Act of Parliament since the House last met, it appears to me that the proper course to pursue will be to negative the motion of the Honourable Member for Newcastle, and to let the panels attend on the day named; when the General Committee may pass by the Ludlow petition, and without nominating any Committee for trying that petition, proceed to the nomination of the Committees for the trial of the cases lower down in the list. The section of the Act which seems to me to justify this view of the case, is the 30th section, which enacts, that in case a Member declines to defend his seat, thirty days' notice there shall be given in the London Gazette; and that, in the mean time, the proceedings shall be suspended, unless the petition of persons claiming to be admitted shall sooner referred to them. It then declares that in every case in which the proceedings in any petition, inserted in such list shall be afterwards suspended, the petition shall be struck out of the list, and shall be again inserted at the bottom of the list at the end of such suspension of proceedings. It is evident from this, that the Act contemplates a subsequent suspension proceedings. In the 52d section, which regulates the proceedings of the General Committee in the nomination of the Special Committee to be appointed to try any election petition, it is enacted, that the General Committee shall not, in any case proceed to choose a Committee to try any election petition until they have chosen a Committee to try every other election petition standing higher in the list aforesaid, the order for referring which shall not be then discharged, or in which the proceedings shall not be then suspended. In the present instance, the Committee have four election petitions to take into consideration on the 12th and 16th of March. The first is that of Ludlow; the question then is, whether the proceedings are not suspended in this case, under the provisions of the Act; and whether it would not be the proper course for the General Committee to pass that by, and to proceed to nominate the Committees in the other cases. By the 47th section, it is enacted, that the General Committee shall give three weeks' notice, in writing, to all the parties petitioning, as well as to the sitting Member, before it proceeds, in any case, to appoint a Special Committee to try an election petition. Until, then, the Committee shall have given the required notices, and until those notices shall have expired, I apprehend that the proceedings of the Committee are necessarily suspended; and as the notices in he Ludlow case have not been given as required by the Act, the General Committee is not in a situation so to proceed. By the 52d section, as I have stated, the General Committee are bound to nominate the Election Committees in the order n which the respective election petitions tand in the list, except in any case where he proceedings have been suspended; nd, as I conceive that, in the Ludlow case, he proceedings are suspended, for the easons I have stated, I think the General Committee should pass that case by, and roceed to nominate the Committees in the ther cases. In truth, the question whether this petition in the "Ludlow" case an be placed at the bottom of the list, or whether the petition can be passed by, , practically, the same. The question, herefore, comes to this: — Are we to suspend the proceedings on all the four ection petitions, because the General ommittee cannot nominate a Committee r the first? If I am correct in saying hat the Ludlow petition falls within the xception of the 52d section, the proceedings in the other cases ought not to e suspended. I do not believe the House in a situation to interfere, and that the eneral Committee must, on the day amed, pass by the nomination of the ommittee in the Ludlow case, and proceed to appoint the other Committees. I herefore see no reason why the Order of e Day for the attendance of the panels hould be discharged.

SIR WILLIAM RAE. — It may be considered presumptuous in me to offer any opinion in opposition to that of my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General; but having taken some pains to ascertain the meaning of the Act, I feel bound to declare that I cannot concur in the view taken of it by my Honourable and Learned Friend. It appears to me, that as the Ludlow petition was presented to the House last Session, it must be regarded as coming under the operation of the 93d clause, which enacts, that if, at the close of the present Session of Parliament there shall be any election petition or petitions before the House, the order for taking which into consideration shall not have been discharged, and for trying which no Committee shall have been appointed, such election petition or petitions shall be tried by a Committee, to be chosen under the provisions of this Act; and such petitions shall be referred to the General Committee of Elections before any petition presented in the next Session, and in the order in which they were presented to the House; and shall be treated as petitions on which the examiner of recognisances has reported that the sureties are unobjectionable; and the recognisances entered into on the part of the petitioners shall be taken to remain in force, for securing payment of all costs and expenses, &c. Now, under these last terms, it is clear that the petition cannot be treated as a petition the proceedings on which are suspended. A case in which the recognisances still remain fully in force cannot be described as relating to a petition on which the proceedings are suspended. The clause, however, distinctly states, that every petition of last Session must be taken before any petition of this Session. In the Ludlow case there are two petitions, the one against the return, and the other from certain electors, praying to be allowed to defend the seat of the sitting Member. The section of the Act which refers to voters admitted to become a party to the defence of the seat of the sitting Member, declares, that any person or persons claiming to have had a right to vote at the election to which the petition shall relate, to petition the House of Commons, praying to be admitted as a party or parties to defend such return, or to oppose the prayer of such election petition, and such person or persons shall thereupon be admitted as a party or parties, together with the sitting Member, if he be then a party against such petition, or in the room of such Member, if he be not then a party against the petition, and shall be considered as such to all intents and purposes whatever; and any such petition shall be treated as an election petition. It is very plain from this, that the petition must be treated as an election petition.. If this be so, it is equally plain, that it must be referred, under Clause 93., to the General Committee, before any petition of the present Session can be taken into consideration. The Committee must, therefore, take this petition into consideration before they proceed to the consideration of the Cambridge petition, which was presented during the present Session. The terms of the Act have not been complied with; although I think they ought to be complied with in the strictest sense; for the object of the Act was, to tie up the hands of the House of Commons. I apprehend that the case of the Ludlow petition cannot be dealt with as a case in which the proceedings are suspended. The only way in which it appears to me that we can proceed with safety is, to discharge the rules for taking into consideration the four petitions from Totness, Cambridge, Ipswich, and Ludlow, and to remit those petitions to the General Committee, who will deal with them in their proper order, taking the Ludlow first; but at such a period as will give time for the service of the notices required by the Act. The General Committee, then, are to suspend their proceedings when the sitting Member declines to defend his seat, and notice is to be inserted in the Gazette, giving the electors thirty days to come in and defend the seat; and in the mean time the General Committee are to suspend the proceedings. I think, however, it will be found that in no other case has the General Committee the power to suspend the proceedings on any election petition under the Act.

Now, in the Ludlow case, the proceedings never have been suspended by the General Committee. If the petition had been presented this Session, as the Cambridge petition has been, then the power to suspend would apply, and the 52d section would operate; but the present is not a case of that sort. Suppose a sitting Member declines to defend his seat against an election petition presented in the present Session, the 52d section will apply in that case, because the proceedings will have been suspended under the provisions contained in a former part of the Act. Under all the circumstances, therefore, inasmuch as the General Committee have not given the proper notices to the parties in the Ludlow election petition, I think it necessary that they should be given before the Committees proceed to try the other election petitions. The General Committee has, in my opinion,—although it is not expressly stated in the Act,—the power to fix other days for the nomination of the other Committees; and they will, of course, take care not to take any petition out of its regular order. There is no other course, in my opinion, which the House can pursue. The parties in the Ludlow case are entitled to notice; and it will therefore be necessary to alter the day fixed for the nomination of the Committee; and, so far as my humble judgment goes, I think it will be necessary also to alter the days originally fixed for the appointment of the remaining Committees, because the Ludlow case is not one which comes within the suspension contemplated by the 52d section, and must be the first proceeded with.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL.—Unfortunately, I was not in my place when the present discussion began; and I lost, therefore, the benefit of my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General's argument. I am sorry to say that I cannot recommend any course whatever for the House to pursue. In fact, it appears to me that the House is at a dead lock. Unfortunately, the House has parted with the jurisdiction which it possessed by the common law, and by the constitution of the country. When the Bill which has since passed into an Act was brought in by the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, I ventured to say, with great humility, that I thought it would have been much better to repeal altogether the statute 9 Geo. IV., and pass an Act to secure the payment of costs. That was all that the House wanted for the purpose of enabling them usefully to exercise a jurisdiction in the case of election petitions. That tribunal—namely, one for the trial of controverted elections — was a tribunal consisting of Members of the House of Commons, and was one as much constituted by statute as any court of conscience, or any borough court in the kingdom. It appears to me that the mode of proceeding which, by the 93d section of the Act, ought to be followed, with reference to election petitions has not been pursued in the case now under consideration; and I confess I do not see how the House can get out of the difficulty. The 93d section directly enacts "that all petitions of last Session shall be referred to the General Committee of Elections before any petition presented in the next Session, and in the order in which they were presented to the House." The 20th section admits voters to defend the seat of the sitting Member, and provides that their petition, praying to be so admitted, shall be treated as an election petition. I am afraid that, under these sections, at present, no legal Committee can be constituted for the trial of the Ludlow election. The petition against the seat and for the defence of the seat should both have been referred to the General Committee; and as the latter has not been referred, I fear that all the proceedings will be regarded as coram non. I regret exceedingly that the House has got into a position of such difficulty; nor can I see my way out of it except by fresh legislation.

SIR WILLIAM FOLLETT.—I should not have felt it necessary to offer any observations on the subject of this motion, if I could have brought myself to the conclusion at which my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General has arrived. The great weight which attaches to the opinion of my Honourable and Learned Friend induces me to say, that I think it right, so far as I am myself concerned, to express great doubts upon the propriety of the course which my Honourable and Learned Friend has recommended. I will therefore state what is my own view of the Act of Parliament. In the first place, however, I would remind the House of the facts of the case. The petitions against the returns for Ludlow, Ipswich, and Totness, were presented in the last Session of Parliament, and the Cambridge petition was presented in the present Session. In the last Session, the sitting Member for Ludlow gave notice to the Speaker that he did not mean to defend his seat. The consequence was, that voters applied to be admitted as parties to defend the seat, and an order of the House was made that they should be admitted accordingly. Now, under the 93d section, petitions presented last Session are to be referred to the General Committee of Elections before any petition presented in this Session; but the Ludlow petition had not been so referred to the General Committee before the Cambridge petition. Well, it appears that the General Committee are to give three weeks' notice of the day on which a Committee is to be chosen. Now, no notice at all has been given; and therefore the provisions of the 47th section of the Act have not been complied with. The petitions, again, are to be dealt with in the order in which they stand on the list; and the first on the list is the Ludlow petition. These are the facts. It appears to me that the 93d section never can operate so as to prevent the electors of Ludlow from being considered as parties to the petition. Then comes the question, What course shall be taken by the General Committee, and what power have they of nominating the Committees in the Ipswich, Totness, and Cambridge cases, before the Ludlow Election Committee? There are only two clauses of the Act which bear upon this part of the case. A list of election petitions has been made out by the General Committee, and at the top of that list stands the Ludlow petition. Now, the 52d section of the Act requires the General Committee to choose election Committees in the order in which the petitions stand on the list. So far, then, it appears that they cannot proceed to try the Ipswich, Totness, or Cambridge election petitions until they shall have nominated a Committee to try the Ludlow petition But then comes the exception in that clause, excluding election petitions in which the proceedings have been suspended. Now, the question is, whether this is a case in which the proceedings can be said to have been suspended? Upon a reference to the 30th section, it will be found that there are cases provided for, in which election petitions shall be discharged, or the proceedings thereon suspended; and that there are no other provisions in the Act of Parliament on that subject. We must, therefore, look to the 30th section of the Act, to see what are those provisions. Under the 30th section, it is enacted, that in every case in which any election petition shall be withdrawn, or the examiner of recognisances shall have reported to the Speaker that the sureties are objectionable, the order for referring such petition to the General Committee shall be discharged, and no further proceedings shall be had upon such petition. Now, if anything of that sort had occurred in the Ludlow case, the present difficulty would not have arisen. But I come now to the case of a suspension of the proceedings. That part of the clause runs thus: —

> And the General Committee of Elections shall suspend their proceedings in the matter of any petition referred to by any notice inserted in the Gazette as aforesaid, and shall not do anything therein until after thirty days after the day on which such notice shall have been inserted in the Gazette, unless the petition of some person or persons claiming to be admitted as a party or parties in the room of such Member shall be sooner referred to them.

I entertain the greatest respect for the opinions of my Learned Friend the Solicitor General, as well as for those of my Right Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Edinburgh; but I differ from both of them on this subject. The Act of Parliament only gives us the power to refer the petitions to the General Committee. We have referred four petitions to that body; and I do not see what power we have to alter the arrangement of them. The House is now exercising a power which is restricted and defined by law; and I do not see how it can suspend its proceedings in this matter. If there were an indictment for perjury against any person who gave evidence before these Committees, and the Court of Queen's Bench were called upon to determine whether the Committee was duly constituted or not, the court, by the power confided to it by the law, must proceed to determine in the matter; and could that tribunal hold that this House had exercised its jurisdiction in the manner directed under the 93d section of the Act? We have made one reference to the General Committee, and I know not what power we have to make another, — to rescind that order and commence de novo. I regret the difficulty we are in; and I only feel the more strongly what I stated on a former occasion, that this House can never satisfactorily and beneficially exercise its right to determine election petitions, until all the Acts on the subject be repealed. All the House wants is, the power to award costs, by which its proceedings would be rendered independent of the courts of law.

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — I regret that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman does not approve of the suggestion of my Right Honourable Friend (Sir William Rae), which is, to consider all the previous proceedings as irregular; to discharge the order; and then to put ourselves regularly before the Committee again, according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament. The Honourable and Learned Attorney General says, that the House has already done what is required by the Act of Parliament, and that that cannot be undone, unless by legislative enactment. I do not agree with him. I think that the House has done things in connection with these petitions in such an irregular and informal manner, that they have not complied with the provisions of the Act of Parliament. On the whole, it appears to me, considering all the difficulties of the case, that the safest course which we can pursue is that recommended by the Right Honourable and Learned Member for Buteshire; which I believe differs but very little from that which the chairman of the General Committee proposes. I shall therefore support, in the first place, the motion for the discharge of the order of the panels; and then, that all proceedings under the petition shall be declared to be irregular.

SIR GEORGE GREY. — If all the proceedings in this case were held to be irregular, some inconvenience might, perhaps, result from it. Under all the circumstances, I think it will be sufficient if we adopt the suggestion of the chairman of the General Committee. I do not agree with the Honourable and Learned Member for Exeter, that the 52d clause of the Act raises a bar to the course proposed by my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General. That clause merely prescribes that the Committees shall be taken as they stand on the list. Then the question is, What is the order in which they now stand? I believe that the Committees may now be considered to have changed their places, and that the Ludlow Committee may be regarded as the last on the list. I think the General Committee has the power so to displace them. I should have thought that the notice in the Gazette was a sufficient intimation to the General Committee, that the sitting Member did not intend to defend his seat; but that that would be done for him by certain electors of Ludlow. They, however, have presented a petition to the House, and the House, in violation of the direction of the Act, has neglected to refer that petition of the defenders of the seat to the General Committee. Now, it appears to me that we may consider that petition as constituting a case which is provided for by the 30th clause; which states, that in every case in which the proceedings in any petition inserted in such list shall be afterwards suspended, the petition shall be struck out of the list, and shall be again inserted at the bottom of the list, at the end of such suspension of proceedings. If the notices could have been served in time, it would not have been necessary to have any delay; and it would have been impossible to allow the parties to suffer from the negligence of the House. I should be sorry to come to the conclusion of my Learned Friend the Attorney General; and I think the irregularity may be got over by adopting the course proposed by the Honourable chairman of the General Committee.

MR. KELLY. — Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the questions raised on the occasion, we must all admit that it is of the last importance that a correct decision should be arrived at on the case now before the House; because if there should be any deviation from the statute, all the proceedings of the Committee will be void, and the most injurious and inconvenient consequences might follow. I cannot agree with my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General, that the least difficulty is created by the operation of the 93d section of the Act, which refers to the election petitions remaining over from last Session. I think that the provisions of that section have been strictly, as well as substantially, complied with, and that, therefore, the proceedings are not, in any degree, irregular in that regard. That section merely requires that petitions pending at the close of one Session of Parliament shall be referred to the General Committee before any petitions presented in the next Session. That has been done in the case now under consideration. During the last Session, an election petition was presented in the usual way from Ludlow. It was referred, during the present Session, by the House to the General Committee; and that reference was made in due time, and in the proper order, that is to say, before the Cambridge petition, presented this Session. But it is urged, that another petition, which has been presented from the electors, to defend the election, was not referred before the Cambridge petition, and that, therefore, the proceedings are irregular; but, as I conceive, a petition by the electors is not an election petition, within the terms of the statute, at all. All I contend for here is, that that petition is not within the 93d section, which requires that election petitions, pending in the "then" Session of Parliament shall be referred to the General Committee in the order pointed out; that is to say, before any petition of the present Session. What has been done? There is, under the 20th section, a power given to refer the petition of electors to defend the election; but that section does not require that it should be referred before any election petition of the present Session. In the 30th section, as well as other parts of the Act, where the Legislature intended to point out, not merely election petitions (strictly so called), but petitions, which, under the Act of Parliament, are ordered to be admitted or considered as such, there, the word is expressly used. The 30th section, in referring to election petitions says, "and also all petitions hereinbefore mentioned, which shall be directed to be treated as election petitions." The 93d section requires that election petitions (strictly so called) of last Session shall be referred, during this Session, to the General Committee, before any election petition now presented for the first time. That has been complied with; because the Ludlow petition was referred before the Cambridge petition. The provisions of the Act, which require the petition of the electors to be referred, have also been complied with; because it has been referred, and is now legally and properly, according to my view of the Act, before the Committee. I therefore conceive that no difficulty at all arises under the 93d section, as to the legality of the proceedings under the Committee, either past or to come. I am quite unable to agree with the Solicitor General in his construction of these words of the 52d section,—"in which the proceedings shall not have been suspended." My Honourable and Learned Friend seems to construe the word "suspension," as if it were any sort of suspension that had become necessary by, or had taken place in, the proceedings of the General Committee. A meaning is given to the word by the 30th section; which provides, that where a petition shall be sent in by the electors, and that, in consequence of that petition, further time shall be necessary for the final appointment of the Committee, then the General Committee are desired to suspend their proceedings, in order to allow that time. But it is necessary to remember that here the General Committee have actually made the list; and, while that remains in force, the General Committee is bound by the 52d section to proceed with the petitions as they are named in that list. It is, therefore, not lawful to appoint any other Committee before that on the Ludlow petition. The greatest difficulty is, in the course to be now adopted. To appoint those Committees in the order in which they appear in the list, would be nugatory and erroneous. The General Committee cannot appoint the Ludlow Select Committee when certain parties, entitled by law to notice, have not received that notice. The important question then arises—What can now be done, consistently with the provisions of the statute? We are now called upon to consider, not what might have been expedient before the passing of the Bill, but what the Bill, now an Act, enjoins us to do. I think it is perfectly clear that the powers formerly possessed by the House have been, under the Act, transferred to the General Committee. There have been four election petitions referred to the General Committee; there has also been another petition, that for defending the Ludlow election: these petitions have all been taken, as I contend, in their proper order. Although the Act does not give any powers to the Committee, as respecting petitions of this class in particular; yet inasmuch as it has, according to my view of it, transferred to the General Committee the powers of the House, and as the House formerly possessed the power, in such cases, to enlarge the time or postpone the matter altogether, I conceive that this Committee must have similar and equally extensive powers. The Committee may dispose of the question in any manner that the House would have disposed of it previous to the passing of the Act. I apprehend that the General Committee has the power of rescinding the orders for referring these petitions to a Select Committee, or of making new orders, as to the time when they shall be so referred, and deferring the whole of the proceedings, so as to take the Ludlow, Ipswich, Totness, and Cambridge election petitions in the order in which they now stand. Every one must see that it is of the greatest possible importance that these proceedings should be strictly regulated by the terms of the statute. Under these circumstances, I cannot, in point of form, support either the motion or the amendment. I conceive the proper course will be, to leave it to the General Election Committee to do as they may think fit, after the suggestions that have been offered by the House.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — As I apprehend the question, the House is directed by the 93d section of the Act to refer to the Committee petitions which were before the House last Session; and that those petitions shall be referred before any petitions presented this Session. It appears, that the House has referred the petitions generally, and that the Act has been complied with in respect to all of them, except as to one, which has been since referred to the General Committee of Elections. I think the question is, whether the General Committee has any power, under the Act, of appointing days for the Committee to sit, and whether they can make any alterations in the order in which they stand? Now, as to the last point, I do not conceive that that order can be properly altered. With regard to their fixing days for sitting, I agree with the Honourable and Learned Gentleman who spoke last, that there is a general power given to the Committee by the 47th section of the Act from time to time to appoint days for sitting; but that section does not say, directly, that they may alter those days, or change the times of sitting. I think, also, as the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has argued, that as the House had formerly the power of rescinding its orders in such cases, and has now transferred its powers to the General Election Committee, that Committee can do so too. I do not deem it necessary that the House should interpose in this case. But as the chairman of the Committee has stated, if any notices are given other than those appointed by the Act, members of the panels might not be in attendance, and it might then be desirable for the House so far to interfere as to direct the attendance of the first and second panels on certain days. It therefore appears to me, on the whole, that the course proposed by the Committee is the right course to take; and that then the House will not interfere with the powers given to the General Committee under the Act. It is most desirable, when the Act intends that the Committee shall have certain powers, that those powers should be left to them; for I have no doubt that the Committee will attentively look to the directions of the Act, and be most anxious to comply with them.

SIR R. PEEL. — I am very confident of this, that if, to do effectual justice in this matter, it shall be found necessary to pass an Act of Parliament; rather than defeat that end, the House will proceed to the passing of such an Act as will put the parties in their proper position. I apprehend it was the intention of the House that the petition of the electors to defend the return should have been referred by the House to the General Committee; but, by some accident, that reference has not taken place. I quite agree with the Noble Lord, that, in point of prudence and policy, it would be better for the House to interfere as little as possible: but, in reference to what has been stated by the Honourable and Learned Attorney General, I beg to say, that the object of the Act was to take from the House the powers which they previously had in these matters, in order to prevent discussions of this kind, which necessarily involve party and political interests. In point of law, also, I think it is much more probable that the Committee have the power to give directions in this case, than the House, — not to alter the order in which the petitions stand, but — to postpone the whole the proceedings to such period as shall enable notices to be given with respect to the first petitions; so, indeed, as to allow notices in the case of the Ludlow election petition to be served. But the wisest plan for the House may be, to remove all the obstructions to the free course of the proceedings of the General Committee; and if the Committee shall afterwards find the interference of Parliament necessary, it will be in their power to make a special Report of that to Parliament; and the House may then consider whether an Act shall not be passed to remove the difficulty; but for the present, it appears to me that the motion of the Honourable Chairman of the Committee should be complied with, and that it should be left to the Committee to see whether they have not the power of finding a remedy for these proceedings. I therefore mean to support the original motion of the Honourable Gentleman, that the House shall rescind the order for the attendance of these panels, leaving it to the Committee, if they shall think proper, to make a special Report to the House on the subject; and for the House then to pass an Act, if necessary, for the purpose of rendering substantial justice to all parties.

Mr. GISBORNE. — I have a petition to present from Mr. Alcock, the sitting Member for Ludlow, in reference to the matter now under discussion, which I request may be read by the clerk, at the table. It has only just now been placed in my hands, and I have not made myself acquainted with all the arguments therein made use of in support of the prayer; but the petition, after reciting the circumstances of the case, goes on to state, that certain provisions contained in the 93d section of the Election Petitions Trial Act, have not been complied with in the case of the Ludlow borough election petition; and prays, that the petitioner may be declared duly elected to serve in this present Parliament for the said borough. I do not know whether I shall be in order in moving that the petition be now read.

Mr. GOULBURN. — The Honourable Member cannot do so, as there is already a question before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. — The petition cannot be read until the question before the House is disposed of.

The question was then put from the chair, and the original motion was agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. GISBORNE, Mr. Alcock's petition was then read by the clerk.

Mr. GISBORNE. — I move that the petition be printed with the Votes.

Mr. WYNN. — I apprehend that the House cannot, without a violation of the Act, adopt any proceedings on the present petition; for, by the 21st section, it is enacted, that if any person has given notice of his intention not to defend the petition for his return, he shall not be afterwards allowed to appear or act as a party in any such proceedings.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — I entirely agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, that Mr. Alcock has no locus standi in the House; and I therefore think that the motion of the Honourable Gentleman cannot be complied with. I beg to express my concurrence with the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, that if it were found that justice could not be done without an Act of Parliament, an Act should be accordingly passed.

SIR G. CLERK. — After the clear exposition given of the Act by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for Montgomery, I doubt whether the petition is such as the House can receive.

Mr. SPEAKER. — As this does not appear to be an election petition, I apprehend that the Honourable Member is not entitled to call on the House to have it printed with the Votes; particularly as the Honourable Member does not give notice of his intention to bring it under the consideration of the House at a future day. I think the best course for the Honourable Member to pursue would be, to withdraw the petition.

Mr. GISBORNE. — I will, of course, Sir, comply with your suggestion, and withdraw the petition.

CHINA.

SIR J. GRAHAM — If the papers relating to China shall not be laid on the table of the House by the Government before Thursday next, I give notice that I shall, on that day, move for an Address to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to give directions that the papers relating to the events which have led to the interruption of our commercial intercourse with China be laid before the House forthwith.

PRINTED PAPERS.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I give notice, that, on Thursday next, I shall move for leave to bring in a Bill for the summary protection of persons employed in the publication of Parliamentary Papers.

PAPERS, RETURNS, &c.

Fresh Fruit. — On the motion of Sir Thomas Winnington, — Account ordered — "Of the quantity of apples, pears, plums, and cherries imported into the United Kingdom since the establishment of an ad valorem duty of 5l. per cent. in 1838, distinguishing the number of bushels of each sort during each year, the duty paid on each sort during each year, and the country from whence imported (being a continuation of Parliamentary Papers, Session 1839, No. 229.)

School of Design. — Copies presented — of Reports made by William Dyce, Esq., consequent to his journey on an inquiry into the state of schools of design in France, Prussia, Saxony, and Bavaria, (Address 14th August, 1839).— To lie on the table.

Navy. — Return presented — of the number of seamen, marines, and boys employed during the year 1839 (ordered 25th February). — To lie on the table.

CORN LAWS.

Mr. BARNEBY. — Seeing the Honourable Member for Cambridge in his place, I wish to inquire of him whether he intends to bring forward his motion next week respecting the corn laws?

Mr. PRYME. — My course will be regulated, very much, by that of my Honourable Friend the Member for Wolverhampton; and until I know when my Honourable Friend intends to bring the general question under consideration, I cannot give a specific answer, with regard to my motion.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS (SERVICE OF NOTICES).

SIR G. CLERK. — With reference to the examination that took place at the bar, on Friday last, upon the subject of the Ludlow election petition, I think it would be desirable to refer the evidence then taken to the consideration of a Select Committee, in order that they may consider the subject, and report their opinion to the House, as to what manner the service of the notices, in future cases, can be made more secure. The General Committee, having to issue the notices, wish some directions to be given as to their more regular service; and it is quite clear, that if the House does not make some special order on the subject, many other similar cases of embarrassment will occur, from the careless manner in which those notices are now served. I shall give notice of a motion for the appointment of a Select Committee on the subject, to-morrow.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT ACT.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I move that the Order of the Day for the House resolving itself into a Committee of Supply be now read.

LORD G. SOMERSET. — I wish to know from the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, when he proposes to bring on the measure, which he is understood to be preparing, on the subject of the poor laws? It would be very desirable that it should come on for discussion at an early period of the Session, so that due time may be given for considering its provisions.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I hope to be enabled to bring forward the Bill to which the Noble Lord's question refers before the Easter recess.

INCREASE IN THE NAVY.

Mr. HUME. — I wish to state to the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, that though I objected to divide the House on the subject of the number of men for the navy; yet, in consequence of the information received from Constantinople and India, as to the conduct of the English Government in those parts, I deem it to be of the utmost importance, before half a million sterling is added to the estimates, that it should be understood why and wherefore that useless expense is to be incurred, and more especially, that we should know precisely what is our position with regard to the Eastern question, as it is called. I therefore beg to state, that, on Friday next, or on the bringing up of the Report of the Committee of Supply, I shall consider it to be my duty to call the attention of the House specially to this subject, and to point out, as clearly as I can, this fact; that it is the conduct of the British Government, which, by keeping up the war between Turkey and Egypt, has rendered necessary the large addition now proposod to be made in the expenditure of the country. When the Report of the number of men for the service of the year shall be brought up, I shall call attention to this subject, and require an explanation from the Government, of the principles upon which they have acted, in regard to this question.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — When that discussion shall be brought forward, I shall be prepared to show, that the conduct of Her Majesty's Government has very much tended to prevent the further prosecution of the war.

BOUNDARY QUESTION.

SIR R. PEEL. — I beg to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, in the absence of the Noble Viscount the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, whether there will be any objection to lay on the table the papers relating to the negotiations that have taken place upon the subject of the boundary between the state of Maine and the province of New Brunswick? Extracts from the official papers, which have appeared in the public prints of other countries, and of the authenticity of which we know nothing, afford, at present, all the information that is to be obtained upon the subject; and unless the public service would be greatly prejudiced by laying the papers on the table, I think it would be much more dignified if the country were not left to collect from foreign newspapers the purport of the official correspondence that has taken place.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — The publication, in the foreign newspapers, to which the Right Honourable Baronet has referred, has taken place in consequence of the President of the United States having thought fit to submit the correspondence to the Senate of that country. I believe my Noble Friend the Secretary for the Foreign Department will have no objection to lay the papers upon the table; but, at the same time, I do not think the question is, at present, in such a state that it could properly be discussed in the House, inasmuch as the correspondence is still going on, and the instructions which have been issued are still matters of discussion between the two Governments.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Mr. HUME. — I wish to know whether it is the intention of the Government to lay on the table of the House, before the discussion on the corn laws, a Report of the information obtained at the recent meeting of delegates from foreign courts at Berlin? I understand the Report has been printed, and that some Honourable Members of the House have copies of it. It seems strange, if such is the case, that the Report should not have been produced, in order that we might have an opportunity of judging how far the corn laws interfere with the commercial relations of this country. As the discussion on the corn laws is fixed for the 25th, the document should be laid upon the table immediately.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — There is no objection to the Report being laid upon the table.

Mr. HUME. — We were told that nearly two months ago. I want the papers, and not a mere assurance that there is no objection to their production.

The Order of the Day was then read.

SUPPLY — NAVY ESTIMATES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of Supply; Mr. Bernal in the chair.

Resolution proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding 602,610*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the expense of victuals for seamen and marines, for the year ending the 31st day of March, 1841."

Mr. HUME. — Before this vote is passed, I wish to ask the Right Honourable Secretary to the Admiralty what is the increase in the amount of the estimates consequent upon the rise in provisions; because that will be a question of great importance in discussing the corn laws on a future occasion.

Mr. O'FERRALL. — As I stated, in proposing the estimates, on a former evening, the increase is 18,000*l.*, in consequence of the additional number of men, and 23,000*l.* in consequence of the increase in the price of provisions.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I understand that a natural harbour has been lately formed on the coast of Dorsetshire, with twenty-five feet depth of water. I wish to know whether any steps have been taken to make use of that harbour?

SIR C. ADAM. — This is the first time I have heard of such a harbour. I will cause inquiries to be made whether or not the report be correct.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — When the debate took place on the navy estimates, the other evening, I was prevented, by the lateness of the hour, from making some observations which I was anxious to address to the House in reference to the complements of our ships, and to other matters connected with the administration of the navy. I feel, therefore, compelled to trespass upon the attention of the Committee, for a few moments, on the present occasion. I have no scruple whatever in saying that I, for one, shall at all times support the principle of sending ships to sea with an efficient or full complement of men. I care not whether it be denominated "a peace" or "a war" complement; but I mean such a complement as shall enable a vessel to perform whatever service may be required of her, and to meet all the exigencies to which a ship of war is liable. I am very anxious, also, that, when cruisers are sent out to act in the suppression of the slave trade, they should have such complements of men as that, when they make prizes, they may not be compelled to accompany them into port; and thus to leave their cruising grounds, in the mean while, open. At the same time, I do not at all concur with the Noble Lord (Lord Ingestre), and the Honourable Member for Bristol, that our ships of war are, at present, so inefficient, that, should they come in contact with those of France or of Russia, it would be to the inevitable discomfiture and disgrace of Her Majesty's vessels. I believe, on the contrary, that there is not, in any part of the world, a British ship of war which is not only ready to meet any vessel of equal or superior force, but that would not come out of a contest with an enemy as triumphantly as at any previous period of our naval history. But, Sir, in saying this, I wish not to be understood as advocating the expediency of sending out ships with insufficient complements; and I do find that we vote, every Session, in the estimates, 2000 men more than we actually employ. Now, if these were actually engaged, the Admiralty would be enabled to fill up the complement of every ship in commission. I can state, from my own experience, that the smaller class of our vessels of war, especially the cruisers off the African coast, frequently suffer very severely from being sent out to sea with insufficient crews. I am not of opinion — and I believe I may add, that no Honourable Gentleman who hears me is of opinion — that the crews of the British navy are deficient either in courage or naval skill. I believe that never, at any former period, did a better spirit pervade the whole of that service than animates it at the present time; and I am quite sure that no feeling, on the ground of mal-administration of patronage, or neglectful treatment at the Admiralty, would have any effect in diminishing the high intrepid bearing and patriotic spirit of the officers and men employed in the service. I must, at the same time, acknowledge, that I think there are many improvements necessary, and to which the attention of the Admiralty should be immediately and earnestly directed. With regard to the condition of the officers, more especially of the subordinate classes, such as midshipmen and mates, I will not now further allude to their case, than to say, that much good is expected to result from the labours of the Naval and Military Commission now sitting, and whose Report is looked for with much anxiety. With respect to the seamen, it would be very desirable if some plan could be adopted, by which able seamen, who have left the service, should be not only permitted, but induced, to return to it. Then, as to those seamen who have been instructed, and are efficient in naval gunnery, I would suggest, that not only should every inducement be given to them to continue in the service, but that they should not be permitted to leave it. Again, I think that the establishment of boys, which is now 2000, might very properly, and with good effect, be increased to 4000 or 5000; and, if proper rewards and encouragements were held out to them, I am quite sure that there would be no difficulty whatever in obtaining, at a short notice, as many able stout lads as might be required. I offer these suggestion, in the earnest desire to see that noble service, in whose well-being the safety and prosperity of this country are so intimately bound up, rendered as effective as possible. But, however anxious I may be, as a naval officer, for the efficiency of the navy, I am not one of those who wish to increase our naval force beyond what the circumstances of the country require.

Mr. PLUMPTRE. — I wish, though an unprofessional man, to offer a very few words upon this subject. Comparing the navy of England with that of other powers, I must say, that, judging from all I have heard and read on the subject, I believe that the naval force of this country is by no means in a satisfactory state. And, so far as I am concerned, instead of objecting to a larger force than that of last year, I should have been willing to support a proposition, had it been brought forward, for a still larger vote than that which is now proposed. I do not think it at all satisfactory, dependent, as we are, on our navy for protection, that it should be, as I believe at this time it is, inferior to the naval force kept up by other great nations of Europe. I was glad to hear, in the course of the debate the other evening, that there was no apprehension, on the part of the Government, that the present peaceful relations between the great powers would speedily terminate. No one is more anxious for peace than I am; but can Honourable Gentlemen on the opposite side guarantee to us a continuance of peace for any length of time? And if not, I ask them, Are they prepared for a war, should it suddenly break out? It cannot be denied, that, in comparison with the navies of Russia and of France, England is far inferior to either, as regards ships in commission and ships upon the stocks. The information I have been able to obtain upon the subject of the disparity of our state of preparation for war, is as follows:—Nominally, we have 22 ships of the line; but, I believe, the effective force in commission does not really exceed 17. Then, we have only 9 frigates, which are of a very inferior size to those of other nations. Russia has 30 ships of the line, of which 16 are in the Black Sea, and 21 frigates. France, I believe, has nearly as many effective ships of the line as England; besides which, she has 17 large frigates France has, also, 25 large war steamers; while England has only 16. Here, then, is a vast difference in favour of France in this useful class of vessels. Again, France has on the stocks 26 ships of the line; while England has only 17. Of frigates building, France has 21 of 60, 50, and 46 guns; while England has only 10, and those of smaller calibre. France has, also, 13 large war steamers building; while England has only 7. This, I consider, is anything but a satisfactory state of things. Honourable Members talk of "the wooden walls of old England." Where are they at this moment? In point of fact, with regard to a naval force, the shores of this country are all but in a defenceless state. I wish that the letter of "The Flag Officer" to the Duke of Wellington had been more attended to by the Government; for I believe that that letter contains many suggestions, the adoption of which would be of most essential service to the country. I am fully sensible that the strength of our naval force, the bravery of our army, and even the wisdom of our councils, will avail but little without the blessing of Divine Providence; but I also feel, that we should be acting the part of madmen, if, trusting in that protection, we did not use the human means of effective national defence, and maintain our establishments somewhat on a scale corresponding with those of foreign powers.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I cannot at all agree with the lamentations which have been uttered by the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down, with respect to the weak and inefficient state of the navy. As a peace establishment,—and it is only in that light that I, or any one else, can now speak of it,—I believe the navy is, at this time, in a very efficient condition. A considerable sum is asked from Parliament; the Honourable Member for Kilkenny thinks it too large; my belief, however, is, that it is not too large; but of this I am quite confident, that it will be applied with great judgment and skill, to make the navy what it ought to be. I do not think it fair, in time of peace, to compare our present establishment with what it might be necessary to keep up in case of war. With respect to foreign powers, there can be no test of comparison, except in time of war. If, in time of war, we found our navy unequal to meet successfully the fleet of an enemy, to protect the commerce of the country, and to perform any other service that might be required of it, that would be a proof of its inefficiency; but, in peace, which I hope will long continue, there is no means of contrasting the efficiency of navies; and it is unfair to say that the naval force of this country is inferior to that of any other power, in point of efficiency. If, however, the calamity of war should come upon us, I feel confident that our navy will not be found inferior to what it has been at any former period. The Honourable Member for Kent has talked of the unprotected state of our coasts and harbours. Acting upon that Honourable Gentleman's suggestion, what would the Committee arrive it? France has a considerable fleet in the Mediterranean; it is not thought advisable that our fleet, there, should be unfit or unequal to protect British interests in that sea. Russia has 18 or 20, and sometimes—as was the case during the last summer, when the whole of the three divisions of the Russian fleet were there—even so many as 27 sail of the line in the Baltic. Are we, then, to have in our harbours, or on our coasts, a fleet equal to the defence of our shores, and in other places a force equal to what Russia might send out during the summer? Such an establishment, and in time of peace, would not only be most improper, but would be ruinous to the country: it would, in fact, be a war establishment kept up, not as if we were at war with Russia or France, or any other foreign power alone, but as if we were contending with them all at once, and that at a time when we were at peace with those powers, and when the negotiations which might be in discussion with those powers were in such a state as to afford every prospect of their being brought to an amicable conclusion. With every desire to keep up the efficiency of the navy, I cannot think it would be politic in the Government to enter into expenses so exceedingly enormous, that very soon the country would say, "Better have war at once, than keep up such armaments, and such a state of suspicion." Then, with respect to the manning, it has been said this year, as it was last, that we ought, at all times, to keep up a war complement of men in our ships. That is entirely a naval question, on which I will not pretend to give any opinion, further than what I have collected from those best able to form a correct judgment upon it. But the question to be discussed is — not whether we should keep up the same number of ships, and equip them all with the larger complement of men, which would enormously increase the estimate, but — whether it is better to have 20 ships of the line without the full complement, or 17 with the full force. I believe that the complement with which our ships are now manned is sufficient to make them effective for all the services that are required of them. In time of war, they may require a full complement; but I think the present complement amply sufficient for a time of peace. A full complement, no doubt, is necessary in cases of expected action with the enemy; but, even comparing the present complement with what it was at the beginning of the war in 1793, it will be found that it was then very little larger than what is now kept on the peace establishment. It has been thought advisable to change the form and class of some of the ships in commission; and, consequently, a different rate of complement has become necessary; but these alterations have been made with sufficient judgment, and with a view to maintain the efficiency of the force generally. A question was asked, the other evening, by an Honourable Gentleman opposite, as to the proportion which the number of men bore to the number of ships in commission. It is quite true that the number of men was proposed, not exactly as being fully sufficient to the number of ships in commission, but upon the consideration that some of those ships which were on foreign stations were about to be called home, and would be paid off; and that there would, consequently, be a reduction in the number of ships in commission. But this must, of course, be dependent upon the state of the political world, and the amount of protection necessary for our commerce and our colonial possessions. If it should hereafter be found necessary to keep up the whole number of ships now in commission, the Government might have occasion to come again to the House of Commons for a further grant. But the estimates, as proposed, have been framed upon the ground I have stated, — namely, that it would not be found necessary to continue the full number of ships in commission. This is the explanation, and the reply to the question of the Honourable Baronet, which I wish to give. If it should be thought necessary to keep up a larger naval establishment than that proposed, that is a question open to be discussed. Under the present circumstances, I do not agree that any such necessity exists; and much less can I admit that, in the present naval force of this country, there is any falling off, either in the efficiency of the ships, or in the skill and courage of the officers and men.

SIR G. CLERK. — I am happy to have received an explanation so satisfactory, as to what certainly appears to me a great anomaly in the estimates, — that is, the great difference betweeen the number of men and ships. I consider the Noble Lord's explanation to be the more satisfactory, inasmuch as it holds out a prospect to the country, that our relations with foreign powers are in such a state as will enable us shortly to reduce the number of ships which we have kept afloat during the last autumn, and up to the month of January in the present year. I am sure that the country will receive the Noble Lord's announcement with much pleasure, when they remember that his Noble colleague the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs stated, not long ago, that the state of our negotiations in the East was such as could not lead any person to suppose that any speedy reduction in the amount of our naval force could take place, especially in the number of ships employed in the Mediterranean. Now, I am glad to be informed that many ships are about to be brought home and paid off, and are not to be replaced by others; and I further understand, from the Noble Lord, that if it should be found necessary to continue the whole of those ships in commission, he will feel himself authorised to come down to the House of Commons, and require its sanction to a vote for an increased number of men, in order to enable the Admiralty to keep up the efficiency of the navy. And I trust, should the necessity arise, the Admiralty will not hesitate in calling for such an increase. I cannot, however, at all concur in the eulogy which has been passed upon that branch of the Administration by the Noble Lord opposite, with regard to the distribution of our naval force. The Noble Secretary for the Colonies should remember, that we have possessions requiring protection in various and distant parts of the world; and, looking at the extent of our colonial interests in North America and the West Indies, I certainly cannot agree that there is a sufficient force kept up in those seas to protect our commerce, and to prevent the recurrence of events similar to those of last year. Then, it is also essential to maintain a reserve force at home, which should be available in any sudden emergency that might arise. We have very recently experienced considerable inconvenience from the want of such a reserve, in the case of the differences with China. Although the Government was made aware of those differences as early as the month of July last, it was only in January the Admirality were enabled to send out a force to the Chinese seas; whereas, had there been a reserve of ships at home, immediate assistance might have been sent out. I think it might be very advisable to keep up a number of guard-ships, cruising in the Channel, and around our coasts; the crews of which would be thus kept in constant exercise, while the Government would have the means at their disposal of sending immediate assistance wherever it might be required. I am happy to admit, that the Noble Lord (Lord John Russell) has given a most satisfactory answer to my question, with respect to the anomaly in the estimates, in regard to the difference of the number of men, as compared with the number of ships in commission; and I should be at least as glad to hear some member of the Government give an equally satisfactory answer to the question that has been put by the Honourable and Gallant Member for Brighton, with regard to the number of boys employed in the service. The Committee will be aware, that it is usual to allow a certain number of boys to every hundred men employed. A proposal was made, some years ago, by my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Pembroke, which, by introducing boys, would, in a short time, have brought into the service a number of excellent and most efficient seamen. The proposal was, that 1000 boys should be kept constantly employed as supernumeraries; that number has since been increased to 2000, which are provided for in a separate vote. What I desire to know is, what number of supernumerary boys will be now kept up, besides those which are necessary, as forming a part of the complement of the ships? I am glad to hear from the Honourable and Gallant Member for Brighton, that there would be no difficulty in obtaining any number of stout active boys that the service might require. I hope, therefore, that the Admiralty will not lose sight of this most effectual means of providing efficient seamen for our fleets.

Mr. CHARLES WOOD. — Considering the importance of the subject, and the many observations which have been made during the discussions that have taken place on these estimates, reflecting upon that department of the public service with which, until recently, I have had the honour to be connected, — I hope I shall be excused for trespassing for a short time on the attention of the Committee. It was said, on a former evening, — and it has been repeated during the present discussion, — that the shores of this country are in a defenceless state, and that, when the necessity arose some few months ago, we had no force to send to China to protect our trade in that country. But it was not owing to any neglect on the part of the Admiralty that the ships destined for that service did not leave this country long ago. And, so far as relates to the defence of the shores of this country, I can affirm, with confidence, that when I left the Admiralty, they were better protected than at any former period. There were eight line-of-battle ships in commission, of which three were on the shores of this country, two at Lisbon, and the three guard-ships. These eight line-of-battle ships were within the immediate call of this country throughout the whole of the last summer. Then, with regard to what has been said as to the difficulty of completing the complements of the flag-ships, a doubt has been expressed whether this could be done from the ordinary. I can assert, that no difficulty whatever would be experienced in transferring, at twenty-four hours' notice, a sufficient number of men from the ordinary to complete the complements of those ships.

The Honourable Member for East Kent and others, resting upon the statements of the writer who signs himself a "Flag Officer," appear to be in great alarm as to the defence of our shores. I have no wish to enter into the questions which have called for the present increase in the navy estimates; but this I will say, that whoever relies upon the statements in the pamphlet of a "Flag Officer" will depend upon a false basis. I repeat, that the navy is now in a more efficient state than it has been in for many previous years; and, instead of any reduction having taken place, the estimates for the last five years, during which the present Board of Admiralty have been in office, have gone on increasing. Then, with respect to the naval force of this country, as compared with the navies of other countries, the statements of the "Flag Officer" are quite incorrect. And if the writer of the pamphlet be indeed a flag officer, he must have known that, from the Quarterly Naval List, he might have obtained correct information. This writer of the pamphlet states that the French navy has considerably increased since last year; while the fact is, that France has 3 line-of-battle ships less at this time than she had last year. Last year, France had, building and afloat, 49 line-of-battle ships, whereas, now, she has only 46. Then, with respect to steam ships, England has 30 steam vessels of all powers; while France has only 26. And of the large and powerful steamers of above 100 horse power, this country has 14 afloat; while France has only 3. I ask, then, can anything be more improper than for a person professing to belong to the service to put forth, in a printed shape, statements so grossly incorrect as those which have appeared in the pamphlet of the "Flag Officer," when the means of obtaining accurate information were so perfectly at his command? I will not further go into the comparative state of the naval forces of the two countries; but I cannot avoid expressing my regret, that, relying on statements so unfounded and incorrect, language should be used in discussions upon this subject calculated to give offence to foreign powers. It is too often the habit for Honourable Gentlemen to suppose that that which they are not themselves acquainted with, is equally unknown to all else; but I assure the Committee, that the Admiralty consider it their duty to make themselves acquainted with the state of the naval forces of foreign powers; and I can further assure Honourable Gentlemen, that the Admiralty are in possession of full information upon the subject, and will take care, no doubt, to act upon that information, for the good of the country. And, certainly, I think it would be far better that topics of a nature calculated to give offence to foreign countries, and to give rise to hostile feelings, should not be brought into discussion in this House. Then, with regard to the difficulty which has been experienced recently in manning the navy, and to which allusion has been made in the course of this debate,—it must be known to Honourable Gentlemen opposite, that it is impossible to obtain men so quickly in time of peace as in time of war and excitement. But, if Honourable Members would take the trouble to compare the manning of ships now with former times, the comparison would be found much in favour of recent years. The difficulty of obtaining men was experienced even during the Peace of Amiens, notwithstanding the shortness of its duration; and I have been told by a gallant friend of mine, that, at that time, he was a month before he could obtain men to fill up the complement of his ship. But take a more recent period,—take ten years back, when I believe there was some little excitement in regard to the policy of Russia; and if we compare the manning at that period with the present, we shall find it much in favour of the latter. In 1828, 1829, and 1830 there were five small frigates of 28 guns put in commission; and the shortest time that either of them took to complete its complement, and go out of harbour, was three months. The longest time taken was 133 days, the shortest 104 days. In 1836, three line-of-battle ships were put in commission, at the several harbours of Portsmouth, Plymouth, and Sheerness; the one that was commissioned at Portsmouth went out of harbour in less than three months, that at Plymouth in something less time, and that from Sheerness completed her crew in a still shorter period of time. Thus, it took a less time by 30 days, in 1836, to commission a line-of-battle ship, than it had taken ten years ago to commission a 28-gun frigate. I say, therefore, that there are greater facilities at this time for manning our ships than at any former period of peace.

It is quite true that the object of putting the ordinary into commission was to give a larger number of available seamen that might at any moment be drafted into ships to fill up their complements; and for that purpose the ordinary has been found fully efficient. I stated, last year, that I thought the coast guard might be so organised as to form a still further reserve; and a Committee was appointed to consider and report upon the subject; but no Report has yet been made. Indeed, to a certain extent, that Committee is defunct; but I would impress upon my Honourable Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty the propriety of reviving the inquiry, whether the coast guard might not be so organised as to afford a means of recruiting the navy in time of need, and of forming a valuable reserve of men, whose services might, at any moment, be made available. I do not think it would be advisable to adopt any plan (as has been suggested by Honourable Gentlemen opposite) by which men who have served twenty-one years in the King's service, and who are now serving in merchant ships, should be compelled to return to the navy in time of peace. About 200 seamen are discharged every year, who might be able for their duties for some time longer; but I think it is a good principle to allow those men who are receiving pensions for their services in the navy to enter the merchant service, and thus to show to the merchant seamen the advantages which the Queen's service offers. I consider it advisable that the merchant seamen should be made acquainted with the advantages which the Queen's service possesses, and that they should know the attention which is there paid to the health and comfort of the seamen. The moment a war breaks out, the pensioned seaman discharged from Her Majesty's service may come back into that service again, and enjoy his pension and his pay together. To whatever extent able-bodied seamen may be engaged in the merchant service, I consider them a reserve which may be relied on; and one on which we may at any time call; and I hold it to be desirable to increase that reserve. I should be anxious to keep up as large a number of men as might be compatible with the circumstances of the country. I confess, that I do not entertain much hope as to the result of a registration of seamen, as a means of keeping up a supply of men; and I think, whatever may be said against it, that the present system is, perhaps, the best that can be devised. The system of "inscription," adopted in France, has been found not to answer; and it is allowed to have inflicted as much misery as has ever been imputed to our system of impressment. Now, with respect to the promotion of officers, I admit that there is a numerous body of them for whom there is no employment. The rule which was formerly laid down has been strictly adhered to, — namely, that only one promotion should take place for every three vacancies. I know there is a serious complaint of want of employment; and I feel for the state of these officers, — gallant and spirited men as they are, — who are unemployed. I know, from experience, what a painful thing it is to have to administer the patronage of a department, under conditions which require that two thirds of the applicants for employment be sent away without the gratification of their hopes. But this state of things must go on during the continuance of peace; and peace, I hope, may last for a long period. Nothing but the old military toast, "a bloody war," could remedy the complaints that are made of the want of employment. So far as the Admiralty is concerned, they would be happy to afford promotion and employment to the fullest extent to which it is sought; but, then, they have to consider what the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Parliament would say; and to look to the circumstances of the country. With these few observations, I will leave the subject, hoping that I have succeeded in attracting attention to those points to which I have addressed myself.

SIR THOMAS COCHRANE.—Many of our vessels are remaining at home, because we have not men to carry them to sea. I do not think that the Honourable Gentleman can take credit for the efficiency of the guard-ships, because, as I before stated, those guard-ships are not in a condition so fit to go to sea as ships in ordinary. They are merely what are called "demonstration ships." I concur in the observation, that it is not to be expected that, in time of peace, this country should keep up a navy adequate to meet those of France and Russia; but there is a great difference between this and keeping up a force sufficient to perform those duties which are necessary in time of peace. I think, however, that if foreign countries knew that we had a fleet which was ready for any emergency, the knowledge of that fact would be influential in preserving peace, and would be a good test of the state of our foreign relations. I am averse to the keeping up a very large naval force; but, still, I think there ought to be a reserve sufficient to meet emergencies.

Mr. AARON CHAPMAN. — From the course of my pursuits in earlier life, I am led to entertain strong feelings with respect to the maritime interests of the country. I am bound to say, and I do so without reserve, that the executive administration of the Admiralty was never better conducted, nor under better management, than in the hands of the Gallant Officers opposite. I have, however, an objection to make as to one point in it, — namely, that a great number of mates and midshipmen, owing to want of employment, are thrown back upon the world, with their hopes disappointed, and without seeing before them any chance of promotion. On that point I object to the proceedings of the Admiralty; but I must say that, so far as regards the fitting out of the ships, — as to their construction and fitness for sea, — the country was never better served, nor its force in a better situation, than at present. With respect to manning, there does seem to be some tardiness; but that tardiness cannot be at present avoided. I quite agree in the opinion, that pensions ought to be granted to those who, having left the service, and entered the merchant service, return in time of war. There is no necessity whatever for distressing the merchant service; but every encouragement ought to be given to those men in time of war to re-enter the service in which they had formerly been.

SIR CHARLES ADAM. — I am extremely gratified, both on the part of my Honourable Colleagues and myself, at the opinions which have been expressed by my Honourable Friend; not only because those opinions have proceeded from him, individually, but because my Honourable Friend is one who is so practically acquainted with the maritime service of this country. He is a great shipowner himself, and knows the difficulty of manning the navy at a time when the merchant service is in so flourishing a situation. I recollect that, at the time when eight line-of-battle ships were to be manned, many merchant ships had to lie in the Thames for a considerable time for want of hands. Yet these eight line-of-battle ships were not long in getting ready for sea, considering that the time was unfavourable for manning them, owing to the fact of so many merchant ships looking out for men at the time. In case a war should break out, there would be no difficulty in getting a number of young men, who could be sent out, by steamers, to make up the war complements on foreign stations; and this could always be done before, in the present state of the country, it would be possible for us to be involved in actual hostilities. Much has been said about ships not having been manned as speedily as they should have been in the last year; but it should be remembered, that last summer there was very great activity in the commercial marine. This, in a great degree, accounts for the scarcity of hands. As for the boasted rapidity with which my Gallant Friend Sir George Cockburn, whose name I mention with the greatest respect, got the ships ready for sea which were to bring home our troops from Lisbon in 1829, for which the Honourable Member for Stamford (Sir George Clerk) has so often taken credit, I must remind the House that those ships were not fully manned; in fact, they were only half manned, and sailed without their lower deck guns, otherwise they could not have contained the troops they were appointed to convey. Now, with respect to the complements of men employed, there can be no doubt that, when the guns are well manned, it is impossible but that the ship should be well worked. The peace complement of men is always made with reference to the war complement, from which a certain per centage is deducted, to form a peace complement. At the present moment, the peace complement of our ships is little less than the war complement of 1815. With respect to the boys in the navy, I have the pleasure to tell the Committee, that all the boys are employed. When the ships on the foreign stations fall short of their complements, there is always a supernumerary complement of boys ready to be sent out to those stations. With respect to the deficiency of hands on the Mediterranean station, there are 156 men and 20 boys short; but, then, 116 supernumeraries are going, or have gone out, to fill up these vacancies. It should be recollected, that the boys who are sent out now-a-days are in such a state of training as to be able immediately to enter upon active service. There is a considerable number of boys on board the guard-ships in ordinary. They are in a most efficient state, and go through the gun exercise in a most extraordinary manner. When my Honourable Friend the Member for Halifax was Secretary to the Admiralty, there was an additional number of 5000 men voted; but it was upon the understanding that these men should be called into service only as they might be wanted. As to want of force on other stations, I admit that there was not, at the time of the blockade, a sufficient force on the coast of Mexico, in proportion to the great force of the French; but I and my Honourable and Gallant Colleagues had made every effort to supply the deficiency; and it was only owing to a remarkably tedious passage, that the ships which were in consequence sent out did not arrive in time. With respect to ships not being ready to send to China, it has been said, "If we had had a force ready in this country, we could have had that force now at Singapore, ready to take part with the Indian squadron." All I can say is, that if the force had been there, it would have been to very little purpose; for the monsoon would have certainly told against the progress of the fleet, and it could not have got to its destination. I know, very well, this, that the gallant officer (Captain Sir J. B. Gordon) who has succeeded my gallant friend the late Admiral Maitland, on that station, has written to us to say, that if he could have the ships in June, it would be time enough. Here I may mention a fact, with respect to this appointment. When the illness of my gallant friend Sir F. Maitland rendered it necessary for us to send out a successor, the Court of Directors of the East India Company wrote to apprise us that they had a steamer going out on the 30th of January, which was expected to reach the Cape of Good Hope in a month after her departure; but what was the fact? Owing to unfavourable circumstances, that vessel did not leave this country until two days after the time fixed for her arrival at the Cape of Good Hope. After the admirable speech of my Honourable Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. C. Wood), it is not necessary for me to trouble the House with any further particulars.

With regard to the assertion of the Noble Lord opposite, the Member for South Staffordshire, that the promotion in the navy has been conducted in "a profligate manner," I tell him that there is nothing to support him in his assertion. I am not speaking now of Admiral Fleming's appointment; that was an appointment which did not belong to the Admiralty: the Noble Lord at the head of the Government, in another House, has taken upon himself the responsibility of that appointment. But I will say, that no man in the service, from his boyhood upwards, has done more, as opportunity has offered, for the service, than Admiral Fleming; he sought service, and only wanted the opportunity of distinguishing himself against the enemies of his country. I defy the Noble Lord to show me any instance of "profligate promotion." He may look back to some promotions which were formerly made, probably, not very necessary for the good of the service; but if the Noble Lord will bring forward any case of an appointment which he can call "profligate," I will meet it with pleasure; for I will tell the Noble Lord, in the strongest language that I am capable of uttering, that there is no profligate promotion in the navy. I now hold in my hand a list of the promotion of mates that has last taken place. The first promotion is that of an individual promoted from the coast guard, on account of merit. Another is that of the nephew of my gallant and lamented friend Sir F. Maitland, in consideration, no doubt, of the services of his gallant relative. The next is that of the senior mate of the Fair Rosamond, one of our most active cruisers. The next, the mate of the Russell, on account of the character he carried with him from the Excellent, and the request of his captain, that he might be promoted. The next, the son of the late Captain Ross, of the navy. Another, the son of the late Admiral Winthrop. The next, that of Mr. William Page, promoted on account of his character, and who has often said, that he did not know how he could ever be promoted, as, unfortunately, all his friends were Tories. The two next were those of individuals who were promoted on account of the part they took in the operations against Aden. The next promotion was that of the brother-in-law of my Honourable Friend who was Secretary to the First Lord of the Admiralty. He was a junior mate; and when the Ministry resigned, and when my Noble Friend was leaving the Admiralty, as he conceived, for ever, he thought fit to mark his sense of the services of his Secretary by promoting his brother-in-law. I do not mean to say that he may not be a young man; but, young as they might be, or old as they might be, no man has been promoted who has not deserved it; and I do not blame any man for promoting his friend, if he deserve it. I think, also, after the promotions which were made in 1837 and 1838, that it is not very reasonable to talk of want of promotions. The regulations usefully introduced by Lord Melville, that only one promotion should take place in three vacancies, has been strictly adhered to, unless in cases that may have called for special promotion. I can only, in conclusion, repeat, that if the Noble Lord can point out any case of improper promotion, I will be prepared to meet it.

LORD VISCOUNT INGESTRE.—The Gallant Admiral has accused me of making use of the term "profligate promotions." I did not make use of those words. What I said was, that the promotions which had been made were by no means creditable to the Admiralty.

SIR C. ADAM.—You made use of the term twice over.

LORD INGESTRE.—I do not think the Gallant Admiral is quite correct in the way in which he interrupts me. I will not now mention names, which would be invidious; but there were several instances mentioned on a former occasion by my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Pembroke. I allude more specially to the case of Greenwich Hospital; and what I said on that point I see no reason to retract. I mean to cast no imputation on the personal or professional character of that gallant officer: I believe that officer served as much as he could. But that gallant officer has three times hoisted his flag since the peace. Last year, he commanded at Portsmouth, and he was no sooner there than he was removed to Greenwich. I always thought that the appointment to Greenwich Hospital was looked upon as a retreat for some officer disabled in action with the enemy, or who, having performed large services to his country, was found to be in straitened circumstances. With respect to what the Honourable Member for Halifax has said of the state of our naval service in relation to foreign countries, so far from wishing to say anything indicating hostility towards those countries, I felt it would be highly improper for me to do so. I only wished that, looking to the comparative strength of those services, we should not have a force unequal to them. The Honourable and Gallant Admiral has said that, last year, we commissioned eight line-of-battle ships; but I do not look upon that as an efficient force. I think we should always have a few line-of-battle ships ready to start for any part of the world, whenever their services might be called for. The Gallant Admiral has been fortunate that the force for China was not required immediately; but it might have so happened that the ships would have been wanted at a moment's notice; therefore I contend for the propriety of having ships in the neighbourhood of the ports, ready for any emergency; and because, also, of the good effect it has on seamen, generally, to see fine men-of-war off the coasts of this country. The statement I made on a former occasion, and which has been lightly called in question by the Honourable Member opposite (Mr. C. Wood), respecting the relative number and strength of French and English steamers, was perfectly correct, and was taken from the navy list of the French marine, published in January, 1840.

A great deal has been said about the manning of the ships, by the Gallant Admiral opposite,—with respect to the propriety of the course that has been taken on that point. As I understand, there has been an increase of men; and I agree with the Gallant Admiral that, so long as the guns are well manned, there can be no doubt that the ship will be well worked. With respect to her spars and masts, I am glad to think that the discussions which have taken place in the House on this subject may have had the effect of producing some improvements. These ships, we know, are a long time in fitting out; and I have known instances of their being kept, many days, waiting for some trivial stores, &c. I was, myself, kept waiting at Portsmouth ten days for a spanker boom; and this delay was occasioned by the want merely of this small and insignificant article, and to the circumstance that the yard at Portsmouth was full of work at the time. There is one point about which I wish to have some information,—namely, with respect to the seamen educated on board the Excellent. I should like to know whether any steps are taken to retain those men in the service; because, otherwise, it would be very predjucial to our national interests, if we were to educate men, and to allow them to bring their professional knowledge, afterwards, to bear against us in a foreign service. I wish to take this opportunity of making a few observations, which would come more properly under the head of another vote; but my alluding to the subject, now, may save the House the trouble of my doing so on a future occasion. The subject is one to which, considering that I cannot boast much technical knowledge, it may be presumptuous for me to discuss,—I allude to the state of the naval architecture of the country. I think, upon that subject, we have displayed a great deal of haste and passion, and a readiness to adopt crude notions; and I hold that, if we allowed those notions to be tried by the test of experience, the result would be more satisfactory. Now, I think that the disposition which I complain of was shown last year, with respect to a ship which was then built. I wish to ask whether the Gorgon was laid down with the intention of her carrying guns on her main deck? I know that when she was building, a lithograph drawing was circulated, and that she was pierced to carry those guns. I will add that, when a ship has been laid down to answer a particular purpose, if she do not fulfil that purpose, she must be considered a failure. She may be a good or a swift ship; but those objects might have been attained at a less expense. I understand that, notwithstanding all the boast that was made about the Gorgon, when she was sent out with troops and stores, her lower deck was obliged to be caulked in, and her heavy engines were obliged to be removed. But if the Gorgon answered so well, why was the principle, on which she was built, departed from, in the laying down of the Cyclops immediately after? I only allude to this point for the purpose of stating my opinion, that, instead of taking for granted the statements of individuals, shipbuilding, like every other science, should be submitted to the test of experience. I procured, last year, Returns of the experiments made with the Pique and the Inconstant; those Returns are now on the table, and show that the Inconstant has proved herself not only to be a superior ship, but a very efficient man-of-war; and yet, why is it that now the country are to have all Piques, and no Inconstants? Why have we not had some ships built on the principle of Admiral Hayes? I have got some Returns with respect to the Vanguard and the Rodney; and in these Returns the sailing qualities of the Rodney are twice as often repeated as those of the Vanguard. Now, I wish to see fair play. But, in proof of the necessity of more attention on this point, I may mention that there is no state more anxious than Russia to improve her navy; and yet Russia has not lately copied any ship from our navy. What I wish to see established in this country is a board of naval instruction, similar to that established in the year 1752, in France, by the then Minister of Marine, and which should be composed of men of science, who could give their opinions on matters to which it is impossible for the Board of Admiralty to devote due attention. It is not necessary that such a board should be a paid board; for I am sure that the men of science of this country would undertake the duties to be imposed for such purposes, in the same way as the Royal Society does. I have to apologise to the Committee for thus trespassing on its attention; but no threats, or violence of manner, on the part of the Honourable and Gallant Admiral opposite (Sir C. Adam), shall deter me from doing my duty as a Member of Parliament, in calling its attention to circumstances which may have come to my knowledge, and to which I may think it desirable that the notice of Parliament should be directed.

SIR C. ADAM. — I regret, if any warmth of manner on my part has at all been offensive to the Noble and Gallant Lord. I meant no disrespect to the Noble and Gallant Lord; but when charges are brought, which are unfounded, against myself, and my Friends, the Noble and Gallant Lord will always find me in the same disposition. In answer to the question as to the Gorgon, I beg to say that she was not intended to carry guns, in the way stated, when employed as a steamer; but as she had portholes for ventilation, and as it might be necessary to employ her as a sailing vessel, bolts had been fixed at her portholes, in order that she might, if required, carry guns between decks; and she is now a fine ship of war. It is not the fact, that her engines have been removed to make way for lighter ones. The fact is, that instead of engines of 220 horse power, engines of 300 horse power were substituted; and, so far as experience has gone, she has answered admirably. With respect to the Rodney and the Vanguard, the reason why the Rodney was more frequently mentioned was, because her sailing qualities had been more frequently tried than those of the Vanguard. So far as the Vanguard has been tried, she has been found to answer admirably; and I hope, on her passage home, she may meet some heavy gales that will put her qualities to the fullest test. When the squadron accompanied the Queen Dowager to Malta, at a time when there was a very heavy sea, an order was given to exercise great guns; the signal was answered immediately: and, so far as my judgment could be formed, nothing could be found to answer better than the Vanguard. She made some of the best passages in the worst weather. With respect to the Noble Lord's allusion to the principles of shipbuilding laid down by Admiral Hayes, I may mention that the son of that gallant officer has been promoted, in consequence of the attention paid by his father to the improvement of naval architecture; and I beg to add, that an opportunity will speedily be afforded of laying down some ships on Admiral Hayes's plan. With respect to what the Noble Lord has stated as to the charges brought against us by the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke, I think those charges have been fully answered by my Honourable Friend the Member for Halifax.

LORD VISCOUNT INGESTRE. — I am perfectly satisfied with the assurance with which the Gallant Admiral began his speech, that he meant no personal allusions to myself in anything he said. With respect to the charges made by my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Pembroke, I did not mean to say that any of the officers appointed are not able to discharge their duties. I only mentioned those appointments in contrast with other officers who had not been promoted, though their services entitled them to consideration.

SIR T. TROUBRIDGE. — I have great pleasure in answering the question which has been put (and has not yet been answered) by the Noble and Gallant Lord, with respect to the seamen gunners of the Excellent. That most valuable class now are entered for five years, with increased pay; and, with a view to keep them in the service, additional pay is given them again to enter for five years more.

SIR J. DUKE. — I have heard, with some surprise, the statement made that our ships are now inferior to what they were. On the contrary, our ships are much superior, now, to what they were during the last war. At the battle of the Nile, the largest ships we had in that action were not equal to many of the ships which we have at present. I own, I really do not see that any charge can fairly be brought of party patronage against the Admiralty, with respect to the officers; and I think that the recent promotions would, if examined individually, speak for themselves, and fully show sufficient merit in the persons promoted to explain the cause of each case of advancement, without any necessity of resorting to hypothetical imputations of partiality and favouritism. I should have liked, however, to have heard something satisfactory from the Gallant Admiral the Member for Clackmannanshire, with respect to the case of Port Mahon.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO.—There is one observation which has fallen from the Gallant Admiral opposite which will give the greatest satisfaction, I am sure, to every officer in the service, — namely, that, in the distribution of the patronage of the Admiralty, merit alone has been and will be considered. There is a subject I wish to bring under the notice of the Gallant Admiral, for the purpose of obtaining some information upon the point. On the 10th of July last, the medical superintendent of Greenwich Hospital retired; and the question I wish to ask is, whether the vacancy has been filled up? I understand that the late governor of Greenwich Hospital had, in his last illness, to send up to London for a physician, as there was not such an officer attached to the establishment. There are above 4000 persons there, including above 300 invalid cases to be daily attended to; more than 170 of which are medical, and not surgical, cases. Surely some physician ought to be appointed to such serious and responsible duty. I also wish to ask the Gallant Admiral, and the Honourable Secretary opposite, how many more of these votes they propose to take to-night? The third vote is that, I see, which relates to their own salaries; and I cannot reasonably ask them to postpone that: but, surely, the rest of the votes may, with advantage, be postponed until after the Report of the Naval and Military Commission shall have been placed in the hands of Members. I hope that no delay will arise in bringing forward the Report of that Commission, as I understand it suggests many things that will be to the advantage of both services. The public service, therefore, cannot suffer by this trifling delay; for, after being in possession of these recommendations, we shall enter upon the discussion of many important points involved in these votes with much more pleasure, and with a better chance of securing the improvement of the service. If we do not do this, the month of August will arrive; there will have been a delay in the production of this Report; Parliament will separate, and we shall go into the country without having done anything with respect to it.

SIR C. ADAM.—I hope that Report will be laid on the table ere long. As to the vacant place of physician at Greenwich, I believe there is no immediate want of medical assistance at the hospital. It could easily be supplied at any time it might be required; but the cause of the situation not being filled up is, that if the Report alluded to should recommend a decided alteration with respect to that office, it would only be creating trouble, confusion, and disappointment, to fill it up at present. As to the last illness of the late lamented Sir Thomas Hardy, of course his friends sent to London for the best advice that could be obtained. A person in the situation of that gallant admiral would not be likely to limit himself to merely local advisers. I certainly am not disposed to postpone these votes; and the difficulty suggested by the Honourable and Gallant Member may be easily got over by bringing forward, hereafter, any supplementary estimates that may be rendered necessary by any recommendations of the Report in question.

Mr. PLUMPTRE. — I wish merely to make an observation, Sir, with regard to what has fallen from the Honourable Member for Halifax, with respect to the French fleet. I do not know that the Honourable Member can have better information upon that subject than the "Flag Officer;" who, I should imagine, is at least as unlikely to have made a mistake upon any naval subject as even the Honourable Member himself. I do not complain, for my own part, that our fleet is not in the state it ought to be, so far as it is itself concerned; but that our naval force is not in the state it ought to be, as compared with the naval establishments of other countries, and France in particular.

Mr. C. WOOD. — I should be very sorry to say anything which might annoy the feelings of the Honourable Member for East Kent, or, indeed, of any other Gentleman in this House; but the "Flag Officer" states that there have been many unwise reductions made in the navy; and all that I replied was, that he had understated the amount of our steamers afloat; and that, if he had referred to the quarterly published statements of the Admiralty, he would have been enabled to have made a better statement himself.

Mr. HUME. — Before, Sir, we were led into this digression, I wished to have had an opportunity of making my usual annual objection to the vote for old stores. I wish to see it placed in a distinct and separate account. The present account, I may here add, is such as no man can, without great difficulty, understand. I do not think this is a fair way of doing the business of the country; and I hope, that, in another year, some better mode will be adopted. I wish to ask the Honourable Secretary if any alteration is contemplated in the mode of providing these supplies, and what manufactures are carried on in the naval yards at present; and whether there is any intention of obtaining the necessary articles by contract in future?

Mr. M. O'FERRALL. — All the articles required for the service of the navy are now provided by the navy itself, except biscuit, beer, flour, chocolate, and oatmeal.

The vote was then agreed to.

The next vote was, "That the sum of 122,096*l.* be granted to Her Majesty, for the salaries and contingent expenses of the Admiralty."

Question put.

Mr. HUME. — I wish to ask the Honourable Gentleman what the 4600*l.* included in this vote is allotted for?

Mr. O'FERRALL. — For the entire expense of prosecutions for the service of the Admiralty. It is my intention, shortly, to give notice of Bills to regulate the salaries of the judge of the Admiralty and his assistant officer.

SIR GEORGE CLERK. — I see the sum of 5000*l.* charged in this vote for postage, and I wish to know if it is true that it covers the whole amount of postage charged at the outports? I understand, too, that a circular has been issued as to letters to and from the public offices being written on half sheets of paper. I wish to know whether this order has been issued with respect to the Admiralty, inasmuch as it will produce, I fear, great confusion in the public departments, — confusion, indeed, that will not be compensated by any saving that may be created by such an order?

Mr. O'FERRALL. — The whole of the postage is paid beforehand, and paid by weight. With respect to the second question of the Honourable Baronet, I can only say that, a new system of postage having been established, the experiment, with regard to half sheets, has been made with a view to economy in, and to reduce the weight of, the correspondence of the public departments.

Mr. HUME. — I must say I think the Government deserve thanks for what they have done in this respect; as it is well known that the expenses of the public offices are very great, and that a great saving might be made in them all, if a due attention to economy were paid by those who preside over them. We ought to use no more paper than is absolutely necessary.

[Laughter from all sides of the House.]

It is the duty of the Admiralty, as well as of any other department, to attend to economy in this matter of paper, as in all other things. I understand that a Committee up-stairs has determined upon reducing the weight of paper used in our parliamentary printing, to an extent which will cause a saving of 30 per cent.

Mr. GOULBURN. — There is an instance on record of a gentleman stating that he had calculated that he had saved at least 5000*l.* in the course of his life, simply by abstaining from crossing his t's and dotting his i's. I suppose this experiment will be equally effective.

[Laughter.]

The vote was then agreed to.

The next vote was " That of a sum of 2980*l.* be granted to Her Majesty, for expenses connected with the registry of merchant seamen."

Question put.

Mr. AARON CHAPMAN. — I entertain very great doubt whether this office has answered the purpose for which it was established. I find, for instance, that there are 20,000 seamen more in the Returns of last year, than in those of the present. This difference appears on the face of the Returns; and, under these circumstances, and in the absence of the Right Honourable Baronet (Sir J. Graham) the Member for Pembroke, I can only say, that if something be not done before next year, with respect to the proper working of this office, I will, myself, move the repeal of the Act by which it was established.

Mr. HUME. — I agree with the Honourable Member upon this subject, and I wish to know how and why there should be such a difference between these Returns? I believe that the Admiralty could keep the register of apprenticed seamen well enough, by devoting the attention of two or three clerks to the subject; and that all the expense of this office might be saved to the country, and the work be thereby better done than it evidently now is.

Mr. O'FERRALL. — The object of this establishment, I believe, relates more to the apprentices of the naval, than those of the merchant service. On the whole, however, I have no doubt that these Returns are correct.

Mr. HUME. — I consider that, under the circumstances, the vote ought to lie over until some better explanation upon the subject shall be given to the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I do not think the vote should be postponed; but that the better plan would be, that it shall be hereafter moved, by any Honourable Member, to repeal the Act of Parliament, in case the office shall be found to have been inefficient for its intentions.

Mr. HUME. — My fear is, that if we once vote the money, we shall hear no more of the matter. The best mode of effecting the repeal of the Act would be to refuse the vote.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I think the money should not be voted until we know whether the system of registration has succeeded, or not: at the same time, I must say, that I think that such a mode of repealing an Act of Parliament would be very objectionable.

Mr. A. CHAPMAN. — What I object to is, the very imperfect mode in which the business of this office, and the intentions of the Act, appear to be conducted and carried out. It is not long since a ship — the Camden, I believe — was detained at Portsmouth by a mutiny among her crew. A part of the crew were subsequently sent to gaol; but it was found, upon inquiry at the office, that no such names as those given by these men were to be discovered upon the register. Under these circumstances, I merely throw out a hint of the course I shall certainly find it my duty to take upon this subject, in a future Session, unless the Right Honourable Baronet (Sir J. Graham) takes up the subject, himself.

Mr. ANDREW WHITE. — There can be no question that the value and efficiency of the office are directly dependent on the correctness with which its duties are conducted.

Mr. HUME. — If this board can be shown to be at all likely to effect the object for which it has been established, I can scarcely name the amount of expense to which I would not consent to go for that purpose; but such is not the case. Impressment, however, could not, in the present day, be allowed to go on as it did in former times. If we wanted to man our navy, we should adopt the plan pursued by other countries, and give a sufficient and encouraging pay.

ADMIRAL ADAM. — I am not aware that any complaints have reached the Admiralty respecting this board. As the objection, however, has been now made, the matter shall be inquired into. At the same time, I think the Honourable Member for Whitby, who has impugned the utility, and questioned the mode of business, of this office, should be prepared to fortify the opinion he has expressed by the opinions of other mercantile men.

The vote was then agreed to.

The next vote was, "That a sum of 27,433*l.* be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the expenses of the scientific departments connected with the navy."

Question put.

LORD ELIOT. — I wish to observe, Sir, before this vote is agreed to, that I last year moved for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the merits of Mr. Snow Harris's newly-invented lightning conductors. On the suggestion of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, a Commission, instead of a Committee, was appointed. That Commission has reported, but its Report has not yet been laid on the table; and as it appears that the discussion of the navy estimates will probably be concluded before that Report is presented to the House, I wish to call its attention to the subject. I believe I may assume that that Report is conclusive, as to the expediency of adopting Mr. Harris's invention, which, I understand, has been found to be a perfect safeguard to vessels against the ravages of lightning. I have been informed, that orders have lately been issued to fit out vessels with Mr. Harris's invention; and that this has been done without any communication with the inventor. Now, if such be the case, it is not, in my opinion, proper conduct. It is only fair, when an invention is adopted, to allow it to be carried into execution under the personal superintendence of the inventor. That has been done in the case of the postage scheme, and in all our improvements in naval architecture; and the same course should have been pursued with regard to Mr. Harris. I am informed, too, that some of the vessels have not been fitted according to the last plan recommended by Mr. Harris. I must repeat, that that is unfair towards the inventor; and it is most essential to the security of our mercantile and military marine, that no prejudice against what may be considered innovation, and no personal jealousy, should be allowed to operate in such cases.

SIR C. ADAM.—I can assure the Noble Lord that there is no personal jealousy whatever at the Admiralty on this subject. Captain Sir James Ross, who was in command of the Erebus on the Antarctic expedition, and who has been employed in the Commission to which the Noble Lord has referred, asked to have his ship fitted up with Mr. Harris's conductors; and I perfectly recollect saying, that, of course, that wish must be complied with. But, seeing that Captain Ross had been one of the Commissioners, I naturally concluded that he had been in communication with Mr. Harris before making that request. I have, however, since heard that Mr. Harris complained that he had not been consulted. The Foudroyant, at Plymouth, has been fitted in the same manner; and this ship has been chosen because she is undergoing considerable repair at Plymouth, near the place of Mr. Harris's residence. I am not sure that Mr. Harris has been told of what has been done; but the orders have been given in the precise terms recommended by the Commissioners. I will, however, take care that Mr. Harris shall be communicated with.

LORD ELIOT. — With regard to the Erebus, which, I understand, has been lying at Chatham, it could hardly be expected that a professional man, of limited means, should, at his own expense, without any certainty of remuneration, travel a considerable distance for the purpose of superintending the application of his own invention; and, as to the Foudroyant also, the officers of the dockyard would hardly be justified in allowing a person, without any authority from the Government, to come and superintend the fitting of a Government ship. This invention, in my opinion, richly deserves one of those rewards which are held out for scientific improvements in the service.

Mr. M. O'FERRALL. — Is it the object of the Noble Lord to have a salary given to Mr. Harris?

LORD ELIOT. — I certainly think that when a gentleman has devoted so much time and attention to a subject which is likely to be so beneficial to the navy, some allowance should be made to him at some future time.

Mr. C. WOOD. — I must confess, Sir, that I do not know how it can possibly have been detrimental to the invention of Mr. Harris, to have had his experiment tried under the superintendence of Captain Ross and another gentleman, who was also on the Commission.

Mr. HUME. — I wish to know whether there is any Report, furnished by the surveying department, as to what vessels are employed on foreign stations in that service? — how they are employed, and how the money is expended? That department would, in my opinion, be much more useful if the public were made more fully acquainted with the progress which it may be making.

MR. O'FERRALL. — On a former night, I stated the stations and surveys on which vessels are employed in the surveying service. Some of those vessels are employed on the coast of New South Wales, some on the coast of Ireland, some in the Channel, some in the Pacific, and some in the West Indies.

MR. HUME. — What I want, is a Report for public use. I do not say that the money is improperly expended, but I object that we have no account of it.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — When any surveys are made, they are advertised, and charts are published by the Admiralty. As to the vote of 1000*l.* for scientific rewards, included in this vote, I must say, I think it very advisable that some rewards should be given for improvements in the service of naval architecture. There are several persons who deserve such rewards. There is a vessel in the navy, called the Waterwitch, which is built in so superior a manner that she has quite taken the fancy of the Admiralty. She is now employed on the coast of Africa, and is so fast a sailer, that no slaver has come within sight of her which she has not captured. Cases of this sort demand rewards; and I think there can be no better occasion to name such a proposal, than when a vote of this description is before the House.

MR. O'FERRALL. — With respect to rewards for scientific purposes, I can assure the Gallant Officer, that, in the last year, there were 655*l.* 13*s.* devoted to that object, on different parts of the coast, and the foreign stations.

MR. HUME. — I hope a Report will, in another year, be laid before the public, upon this subject, by the Admiralty.

MR. AARON CHAPMAN. — I am quite ready to bear my testimony to the utility of the surveying department of the service. There is the greatest liberality, on the part of the Admiralty, in the distribution of the charts.

MR. HUME. — I would also, whilst we are on this subject, press upon the attention of the Government the advantage which would result from the use of the electric telegraph, which is a discovery of extreme importance.

LORD VISCOUNT INGESTRE. — I wish to know, with regard to the Naval College, whether any measures are likely to be taken for the instruction of the younger officers in the principles and machinery of the steam engine?

MR. O'FERRALL. — I am happy to be able to inform the Noble Lord that a small steam-ship is to be made for the very purpose of affording the young gentlemen the means of examining its construction, and of making themselves practically acquainted with all its principles.

SIR GEORGE CLERK. — Of late years, I believe, the sum paid by the students at the Naval College has been nearly sufficient to defray the expenses of the establishment. Last year, the estimate for the Naval College was 685*l.*, but it is now 1440*l.* I therefore want to know what was the number of students during the last year? It appears that the superior naval instructors and schoolmasters who are sent on board the larger vessels, to instruct the midshipmen in navigation and mathematics, amount only to twenty-two. Now that is, clearly, a very inadequate number, for there are twenty-one line-of-battle ships; and, consequently, those who are entered on board frigates have not the benefit of the superior instructors. I wish, therefore, to know whether there is any chance of the naval department being able to provide a sufficient number of persons qualified to give the requisite instruction; also, what is the number of persons at the Naval College who have passed the requisite examination, and whether they contribute any part of the expense?

MR. O'FERRALL. — A portion of this vote — namely, 50*l.* — is intended for the library of the Naval College. I have not the Return with me of the number of the students at the college. With respect to instruction afloat, I believe there are naval instructors and schoolmasters as before.

SIR C. ADAM. — The Naval College contains, at present, thirty inmates, who have passed their examination. Before the students are admitted, they are required to know something of trigonometry; and when they come to the college, they are instructed in the higher branches of nautical astronomy, natural philosophy, mechanics generally, and particularly the steam engine. The students, I am happy to say, have made great progress. When the Board of Admiralty went there last year, some of them were examined; and they passed through their examination with the greatest credit. A lieutenant's commission was held out as a reward to him who should pass the best examination. Several officers on half pay have joined the establishment, and, probably, more will do so.

The vote was then agreed to.

The next vote was, "That the sum of 122,236*l.* be granted to Her Majesty, for salaries and contingent expenses of the officers of the naval establishments at home."

Question put.

Mr. BARNARD. — I observe in this vote a sum of 213*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.* for parliamentary and parochial taxes. I had hoped, Sir, that it would be much larger; as the inhabitants of St. Paul's, Deptford, complain, in a petition which I shall have the honour to present to this House, of the great oppression which they suffer in having to pay Government land tax and Government poor rates; — for the land tax, 188*l.* per annum, being one third of the whole amount; and for the poor rates, 1500*l.* per annum, being also one third of the rates. Should they not be relieved from this grievous oppression, they will have to pay for the Government 1700*l.* per annum. Thus, Sir, as the Crown is not liable, at common law, to pay local taxation, this hardship arises; therefore the Crown, contrary to the Bill of Rights and the rights of the constitution generally, virtually possesses the power of taxing the people without the consent of Parliament. But, Sir, the power has been relaxed in several instances; — by the Admiralty, at one time, from 1836 to 1855, paying the poor rate and land tax; — in former times, by the Cinque Ports not having to find vessels of war, which they once did, but by the expense being paid by the nation, as at present; — by the Board of Woods and Forests, in the case of land purchased of Lord Gage, in the forest of Dean, where the right of not paying the taxes was endeavoured to be enforced; but it was found to be so utterly desolating, that it was given up by the Crown, by the Board of Woods and Forests allowing themselves to be assessed.

Mr. O'FERRALL. — I can only, on the present occasion, repeat the answer that was given by the Honourable Member for Halifax, last year, to the same question. I admit the grievance; but it is not in the power of the Board of Admiralty to remove it. At the same time, I presume that it is, of course, open to the Honourable Member for Greenwich to bring forward a measure in reference to it, if he thinks proper.

Mr. BARNARD. — My answer to the observation of the Honourable Secretary is, that I think that the Admiralty has the power of remedying this evil. The observation of the Honourable Secretary is not what I call an answer, but a put-off.

[Laughter.]

It is in the power of the Admiralty either to relax the power, or to bring in a Bill on the subject.

Mr. O'FERRALL. — I can only repeat, that I do not deny that this is a hard case upon the Honourable Gentleman's constituents; but he must very well know that it is not a question with which the Admiralty can deal. The Honourable Gentleman must make his appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. BARNARD. — I had, last year, a sort of half promise of support from the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chanceller of the Exchequer upon this subject. I do not see him here now; but, if he be, I wish he would confirm his promise on the present occasion. Without some aid, I cannot, myself, introduce a Bill upon the subject.

Mr. WOLVERLEY ATTWOOD. — I must say, that I consider that the answer of the Honourable Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty has been justly described by my Honourable Colleague as a put-off. I consider that term to have been well applied to it, because the Honourable Secretary, while he acknowledges that this case is one of peculiar hardship, says, in the same breath, that it does not rest with the Admiralty to redress the grievance. I hope that my Honourable Colleague will bring this question formally before the House, and that the Honourable Secretary, who admits the hardship of the case, will then give him his support. If this be not done, I pledge myself to bring some proposition on the subject before the House. This, Sir, is not a local question, affecting merely local interests; but a question of great and very general importance. It is, in short, this,—that the Government, having thought fit to take possession of a large portion of valuable property in Deptford, — property on which a large number of labourers might be employed, — did employ a certain number of men there, for some time, but subsequently abandoned it, leaving those men and their families a burden upon the poor rates of the parish to the amount of no less a sum than 1500*l*. This is, shortly, the grievance we complain of. I am clearly of opinion that no one particular district ought to be taxed for the benefit of the public at large. The Honourable Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty defends the conduct of that board on the ground that they are acting on a general principle; but if that be the case, I submit to the House whether it is not highly expedient that such principle should be abandoned? But there is another subject connected with this vote, to which I wish to call the attention of the Committee, and that is, the dockyard at Deptford, for the maintenance of which establishment a sum is annually voted. I agree with my Honourable Colleague that there is no active and efficient establishment at Deptford, and that nothing is done, at that place, with respect to the building and repairing of ships. If that be the case, it may be asked, why keep open a dockyard, at Deptford, which can answer no useful purpose? I am quite aware that the answer will be, — "It is merely a skeleton establishment, and may be brought into full activity whenever circumstances require it." But I contend, that an establishment ought not to be kept up which is not likely to be applied to any good or useful purpose. The inhabitants of Deptford loudly complain of the existence of the dockyard, in its present state; because the most valuable property in the town — that which has a river frontage — is comparatively useless. The Admiralty say they can get their work more advantageously performed in other quarters; but I am not at all prepared to admit the correctness of that assertion. My opinion is, that the work of the country will be performed more economically under the superintendence of the parties who are principally interested in it. If it be necessary to continue the dockyard, in order that it may be useful in case war should arise, I think it would be only fair to give it a portion of employment at the present time. I trust the Admiralty will either use the dockyard at Deptford, or abolish it altogether, and appropriate the proceeds to the public service. It is not my intention to trespass further on the time of the Committee; but I may state that, on some future occasion, I propose to bring the subject fully under the consideration of the House.

Mr. C. WOOD — Sir, I think the Honourable Secretary to the Admiralty has not been fairly dealt with on this occasion. The question of exemption from Government taxes is not peculiar to Deptford, but is applicable to all the public establishments; and it is impossible for the Admiralty to remedy that, in this particular, which rests on a general principle. The Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down has talked of the hardship inflicted on Deptford by this establishment, and of the argument used by the Admiralty on this subject; but, I confess, that I never heard of them before. With respect to the dockyard at Deptford, I may state to the Committee, that it has been lately used as a store yard, and that the expenditure upon it is nearly 2600*l*. a-year; whereas, two or three years ago, scarcely anything was laid out on it.

Mr. HUME. — I think the Committee ought to have some explanation with respect to the exemption of the dockyards from the payment of taxes; for I find Deptford charged 213*l*., Woolwich 540*l*., Chatham 650*l*., and Portsmouth 700*l*. I do not think the Government ought to shelter itself under any technicality to avoid their fair share of the taxes.

Mr. W. ATTWOOD. — The Honourable Member for Halifax has stated that I have brought forward arguments which are not sanctioned by the Admiralty. I think such an assertion would have come with a better grace from the Honourable Secretary to the Admiralty. I do not think they will disavow these arguments; for I am not aware of any other on which they can defend their present course of proceeding with respect to the dockyard at Deptford.

SIR C. ADAM. — The Honourable Gentleman is mistaken in supposing that the dockyard at Deptford is not used for beneficial and useful purposes. All the sales for foreign supplies are made there; the stores are all received there; and, in last year's estimate, a sum was voted for a rope manufactory, which is now in the course of erection. Formerly, Deptford was a place where ships were built; now it is used for the benefit of the public service in a different manner.

Mr. W. ATTWOOD. — The amount of the estimate for the dockyard at Deptford speaks for itself, and shows that it is not in a state of activity. The amount of the vote is 2500*l.*; whilst the votes for Woolwich, Chatham, and Sheerness, respectively, are 10,700*l.*, 16,000*l.*, and 10,000*l.* That sales have been transferred to Deptford, I do not deny; but that there is any proportionate employment, I think the Gallant Admiral will not maintain.

SIR C. ADAM. — At all events, the vote is 2500*l.* more than was expended two years ago.

Mr. BARNARD. — Sir, I believe the Admiralty have power to mitigate the evil, if not to do away with it altogether.

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 21,010*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the salaries of the officers and the contingent expenses of Her Majesty's naval establishments abroad, to the 31st day of March, 1841."

Vote put, and agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 528,723*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the wages of artificers, labourers, and others employed in Her Majesty's naval establishments at home, to the 31st day of March, 1841."

On the vote being put, —

LORD VISCOUNT INGESTRE said: — I wish to ascertain whether the system of classification is to be continued, or do the Government intend to revert to the old system of task and job?

Mr. MORE O'FERRALL. — I am not aware of any such intention. The question has been brought under the consideration of the Admiralty; and the present system, under which the shipwrights are chosen by lot, has been found to work extremely well.

Mr. BARNARD. — I had hoped that this increase in the grant of 60,000*l.* had been for the purpose of giving additional pay to the shipwrights employed in Her Majesty's yards, a body of men in whose welfare I feel much interest. But I have heard from them that their pay remains the same. And, here, I beg to remark, that I feel the delicacy of my situation; as I may be supposed to interfere between the employers and the employed. But first, Sir, as to classification, the Honourable Secretary for the Admiralty has just stated that the shipwrights are chosen by lot. It is not the manner of their being chosen, of which the shipwrights complain; but that men of equal ability, and able to perform the same work, are working alongside of each other, one at 4*s.*, and the other at 4*s.* 6*d.* per day. The Gallant Admiral below me has said that he should have no doubt that if a certain ship shall meet with heavy gales of wind, she will be found to possess all the necessary good qualities of a ship. I think, Sir, that proper encouragement should be given to the shipwrights, or else you will have boxmakers instead of shipwrights; and the ships will not answer the expectations formed of them. The comparison of the wages of the shipwrights in Her Majesty's dockyards, with those employed in merchants' yards, should be made by comparing constant men with constant men, and not by introducing that pernicious element into the calculation, the lost time of the men in the merchants' yards. Of this I complain, as being most unfair. In the merchants' yards, they have constant men; and it is with these the comparison should be made, as the men are constantly wanted in Her Majesty's yards, and not with the wages of men who are only partially employed. I had hoped, Sir, that the Honourable Member for Halifax would have introduced the system of job work into Her Majesty's yards.

[Laughter.]

I mean the system of "job" work connected with the business of a shipwright; and, although I am not here to defend the jobbing system set aside by the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke, yet I know that a good system of job work may be introduced, by taking the ship to pieces at a certain price per ton, separating the main portions of the work; such as putting the ship on her floor riband, the frames up, the ship in frame, the wales and bottom worked down, and so on; and by having proper officers to see the work well performed. Thus the men's wages might be raised, either by setting the job work in proportion with the present rate of day wages; when, on the increase of pay, there would be a proportionate increase of work done, or in comparison with a proper rate of day wages. I hope the other grievances of which the shipwrights complain will be redressed, and that working four and a half hours a-day, they may be allowed some refreshment; for I am sure no Gentleman in this House would like to perform the hard work they do without some. I trust the classification will be done away with.

Mr. MORE O'FERRALL.—I do not think that the House is at present disposed to go into a discussion on the subject of classification; but I cannot allow the remarks of the Honourable Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnard) to pass without an answer. The Honourable Member says, that the pay of the shipwrights in the Government yard is exceedingly low, as compared with the wages paid in private yards. I wish to state to the House, that the pay of the shipwrights was not fixed on any arbitrary principle, but on a full consideration of the rate paid in the private yards. The shipwrights in the Government yards have the advantage of constant employment; whilst, in other yards, they are not employed more than two thirds of the year. The men in the public yards have also the advantage of medical attendance in case of sickness, and an allowance during their illness, together with the privilege of entering their children as apprentices. When all these advantages are taken into account, I think that the men are better off in the public yards, at 4*s*. a-day with constant employment, than in the private yards, with only casual employment, at 7*s*. per day.

SIR GEORGE GREY.—I believe that great dissatisfaction exists in the dockyard at Devonport, with respect to classification. I know that the subject has been fully considered by the Admiralty, and I have no doubt that they have a sincere desire to do justice to the men. The great cause of the dissatisfaction is, that the first class is not large enough to comprise all the men of equal merit and equal capacity; but I consider the question to be entirely one of wages. I am not prepared to say that the Admiralty are wrong; but I trust they will give their best attention to the matter, and devise some means of allaying the dissatisfaction which at present exists.

SIR GEORGE CLERK.—Sir, it cannot be denied, that, whenever an attempt has been made to put men into different classes, it has always given great dissatisfaction. But there is another objection to the system at present adopted in the dockyards, and that is, that whilst you are giving the men 4*s*. a-day, you are not obtaining the same quantity of work for that sum as under the old system of task work, when every man was paid according to the value of his labour. I believe, that in all private yards, the shipwrights are employed on task work, which holds out an inducement to them to exert themselves to the utmost, and which produces no dissatisfaction. When the work in our dockyards was performed, under the task work system, 6000 artificers were sufficient; but now, 8400 are required, at an expense of 560,000*l*., and I very much doubt whether the same quantity of work is done, although we have an increased number of hands. I trust that the Admiralty will seriously consider the propriety of reverting to the old system, which has been perfectly successful in every merchant yard in this country, and in every naval yard throughout Europe.

Mr. W. ATTWOOD.—The Honourable Member for Devonport seems to be of opinion, that the Admiralty have fully considered this subject; but I think, if he will direct his attention to it, he will come to a different conclusion from that at which the Admiralty have arrived. The Committee will recollect, that, during the last Session, my Honourable Colleague and myself submitted several statements to the House in direct contradiction of the ground now taken by the Admiralty. We proved that the wages in the dockyards were so much below the average wages which shipwrights were capable of earning, that the House seemed to be of opinion that the rate of wages should be increased; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer intimated, that the question should receive the full consideration of the Government; thereby conveying the impression, that it was intended to improve the condition of the artificers in the dockyards. The statements then gone into were intended to show the amount earned by artificers in the country, and in the public yards, and to prove that the men in the merchants' yards, although idle one third of their time, could earn as much, during two thirds of the year, as the men in the public yards could earn in the whole twelve months; and the conclusion at which we arrived was, that employment in the private yards was the most advantageous for the men. I am convinced, that if you wish to secure the services of the best workmen, you must give them a sufficient remuneration; and I leave it to Honourable Members to decide, whether, under the present system, we are likely to procure men of competent skill. I admit that there are many artificers in the yards of great ability, but they are men who have been employed there a considerable number of years, and who do not wish to leave the locality. Had I not been prevented by indisposition from attending the House, I should have given notice of a motion on the subject; but, not having done so, I am precluded from calling the attention of the House to it in a satisfactory manner. I trust, however, that Honourable Members will seriously consider the case of the men employed in the dockyards, and endeavour to remedy the evil which is at present so justly complained of.

Mr. C. WOOD. — I do not exactly understand what impression the Honourable Member intends to convey, by referring to the assurance given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer last year. I wish to state to the Honourable Member, that the assurance then given was, that the superannuation allowance, which had been taken away in 1832, should be immediately restored; and, within a month of that time, an Order in Council was passed for that purpose. The assurance was not only fulfilled, but the order was made ex post facto, so as to go back to the time when the superannuation had ceased. The Committee will therefore see that here is not the slightest foundation for charging the Government with not having ulfilled the promise then made. With espect to the system of classification, I eg to remark, that the change was in-roduced by the Right Honourable Ba-onet the Member for Pembroke, when rst Lord of the Admiralty; and I have is authority for stating, that the rate of ages was fixed at the average amount eceived by shipwrights throughout the ountry, including, I admit, their lost me; which, the Honourable Gentleman ys, ought not to be included. I may ate, further, that a similar investigation as made in 1836, and the result was, at it appeared that the average earnings the King's yards equalled those in the erchants' yards. There are many men ho will earn more money in the private an in the public yards; but there are any others who earn less; and there-re, in order to affix a uniform rate, the st plan is, to take the average amount. entertain some doubts as to the system classification; but I contend that the option of the day system has prevented great waste of the public stores. I mit that there is some ground for dis-tisfaction; but the great complaints ve come only from one or two yards; and the deputations have admitted, with one or two exceptions, that if the second class received an adequate remuneration, they would rather allow the first class to remain open. So that, after all, it is a mere question of wages. And then comes the question, whether we ought to pay more? The practical test on that point is, have we any difficulty in obtaining shipwrights? If not, why should we pay men more than is necessary to induce them to enter the public yards? I do not think there is at present any difficulty in procuring men; and therefore I cannot see the necessity for raising the amount of wages.

Mr. W. ATTWOOD. — It is quite true that the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred particularly to the superannuation allowance; but he did not confine himself to that; and he was told that some more beneficial measure ought to be adopted. There is no doubt that you can secure a supply of men at 4*s.* per day; but the question is, whether they are good shipwrights; and on that question, we are completely at issue. With respect to the system of classification, I do not think that any system could be adopted more obnoxious to the men. I believe, that if you were to offer them the option of working part at 5*s.* and part at 4*s.* 6*d.* per day, they would rather receive the smaller amount than be subject to the invidious distinction between them which is now made. It has been stated, that the system was adopted in former times; but I believe that the parties principally instrumental in bringing forward the system have seen great reason to doubt the propriety of continuing it.

Mr. CORRY. — I rejoice to find that the number of artificers employed in the naval yards is at length about to be augmented; and when I consider the present condition of the fleet, I think that a still further augmentation of their number will hereafter be found indispensable. It was stated by my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Pembroke, when he was at the head of the Admiralty, that our force of line-of-battle ships was less than it had been at any period since the Revolution; and he referred to the year 1688; at which period the number of ships in commission and in ordinary was 123, — 45 more than, according to Sir John Barrow's tables, we possessed last year: and I am at a loss to understand why, with an increased and increasing mercantile marine, at once requiring additional protection, and furnishing additional means of affording it, — while other nations are sparing no expense to render their fleets more and more formidable, — so great a reduction should have been made in the number of line-of-battle ships belonging to this country. This diminution is, in a great measure, to be ascribed to the abandonment of the system of launching, year by year, three ships of the line, in order to keep up the required number of ships. If that system had been adhered to during the six years which have elapsed since my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Pembroke relinquished office, 18 ships of the line would have been launched. But what is the fact? Only 4 ships have been launched; and, in consequence of this, the force of line-of-battle ships is 14 less, at this moment, than it would have been if the present Government had followed up the former system. But, notwithstanding that the force of line-of-battle ships is thus reduced, it has been stated by the Noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty, in another place, as a triumphant answer to those who talk of the want of new ships, that he could, if necessary, send to sea 40 sail of the line, in addition to the 20 already in commission. With respect to this assertion, I wish to observe, that we should form a very erroneous estimate of the strength of our line-of-battle, if we were to consider it with reference to the number, alone, of the ships of which it is composed: the force of each ship, compared with that of ships in other navies, ought also to be taken into consideration. The total number of ships of the line, in commission and in ordinary (exclusive of the old 72-gun ships), is only 40: 20, therefore, at least, of the 60 ships which the Noble Lord said he had at his disposal, must be 72-gun ships, — a class as inferior to the line-of-battle ships of the same rating, of the present day, as the old 64-gun ships, at the beginning of the last war, were to the 74-gun ships of that period. I will not suppose any limit to what may be accomplished by British sailors; but I do say, that one of these ships would have to contend against fearful odds, alongside the smallest line-of-battle ship in the French or American navy. To show the opinion entertained by naval officers on this point, I will, with the permission of the Committee, read a short extract from a letter from an officer of high reputation, at present serving in the Mediterranean fleet. The date of the letter is December 14. 1839, at which period the English and French fleets were at anchor together off Vourla: —

> There is much talk here about the small ships lately sent to the Mediterranean, and what chance have such cribs as the seventy-two's — such as Benbow, Belleisle, Edinburgh, Hastings, &c. — against the French ships, the smallest mounting 86 guns, with 750 men; — the Hercule, the Jena, &c., 100 guns, with 900 men? Should such an event occur as a collision with the French, to say the least of it, they are most fearful odds. Englishmen will do all that may become men; but I trust the eyes of our Government may be opened before we shall have to encounter such a disparity as 100 guns and 900 men against 72 guns and 550 men.

I will venture to say this is the universal opinion of naval officers, with respect to these inferior ships; and, indeed, it has been admitted, even by the Admiralty, that they are not considered effective ships of the line. My Honourable Friend the Member for Halifax stated, last year, that they were wearing them out in peace, reserving the more powerful ships for the exigencies of war; and the Noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty stated, that if there was the slightest prospect of a rupture with France, the 72-gun ships attached to the Mediterranean fleet would instantly be replaced by larger ships from home. But the Gallant Admiral the Member for Clackmannan went still further; for he declared that, in the event of war, the 72-gun ships were to supply the want of heavy frigates, — a class of ships of war in which we are indeed most lamentably deficient. Now, if it be the intention of the Admiralty thus to employ these ships, they have no right to consider them as forming a part of the line-of-battle; and as 20 of them at least must be deducted, there will then remain no more than 40 effective ships of the line at their disposal, in the event of any sudden emergency that may arise. But admitting, for argument's sake, that they have 60 effective ships of the line at their disposal, I ask, at what former period of our history — for the last century, at least — have 60 ships been considered a sufficient force? It was stated by Sir Byam Martin, in his evidence before the Finance Committee, that, in 1793, we had 91 sail of the line; and that these were found inadequate to the early and growing wants of the Government in the formation of squadrons for the various and distant objects of protection and enterprise they had in view: and to such an extent was this inadequacy felt, that in the year 1801, just before the short peace, there were — as I find stated in a paper laid before Parliament in [illegible], — 122 ships of the line actually in commission, exclusive of ships doing harbour duty. Sir George Cockburn, also, in his evidence before the Finance Committee, pointed out the necessity of our maintaining a large fleet. He said, —

> The great difficulty England has, and her great necessity for having a large navy is, that she has colonies in every part of the world; and that we are obliged, in case of war, to send a force to every part of the world where we have commerce, which is in every part of the world.

And he added, that, in consequence of this necessity, the navy of England should be at least double that of any other nation. But we are told that, admitting our present force to be too small for the exigencies of war, there is no necessity to maintain as large a number of ships at a time of profound peace, as this is called; and my Honourable Friend the Member for Halifax stated, last year, that the number of ships had been diminishing since the peace; that they, like everything else, had been coming to what was considered a peace establishment. Now, I must say, that I think the system of making any considerable reduction of the number of ships in ordinary, during peace, a very mistaken policy. One of its unavoidable consequences must be, that our commerce, our colonies, and even our own shores, will be left without sufficient protection, for a year, at least, at the commencement of a war; and it can hardly be argued that the proper time to think of building ships is when you want to send them to sea with the utmost expedition. I think this view of the question goes far to prove that the system of reducing the number of ships in ordinary to a peace establishment is not a wise one; and I have the strongest grounds for saying that it is also at variance with former practice. Sir Byam Martin, whose authority no one will question, stated, —

> That at all former periods of peace, the efforts of England were unremitted in bringing the navy into a formidable state, particularly between 1783 and 1793.

I have endeavoured to ascertain to what extent the efforts of England had then been carried; and I am informed, by a paper which was laid before Parliament in 1805, that, in that interval of peace of ten years' duration, from the conclusion of the American till the beginning of the last war, 42 sail of the line and 45 frigates were launched. I have not been able to ascertain what number of ships of the line were launched during the twelve years of peace which preceded the American war; but the fact that the force of line-of-battle ships belonging to England at the commencement of that war was 123 (upwards of 45 more than we have now), is conclusive evidence that the system of reducing the number of ships in ordinary to a peace establishment was not then the practice. The evidence that this system is inconsistent even with economy is equally conclusive. Its inevitable result must be the necessity of having recourse to merchant builders in the event of war, — a necessity from which, during the last war, the finances of this country suffered most severely. Sir Byam Martin traced to this source "the alarming decay of ships during the war, from the use of unseasoned timber; and the consequent waste of millions of money." He traced, also, to the use of unseasoned timber a great increase of sickness among the crews, — a consideration, I presume, of some importance. Sir Byam Martin went on to say, —

> I may therefore say, with propriety, that the period of peace is the proper time to provide such an ample stock of line-of-battle ships as may prevent the risk of again falling into the hands of merchant builders.

The evidence of Sir John Barrow, also, before the same Committee, was to the same effect. He said that —

> In the year 1805, when there were no hopes of sending a sufficient fleet to sea, the late Lord Melville ordered a contract to be made with the merchant builders for forty 74-gun ships. These ships were contracted for by the Navy Board at 34*l.* a ton, the common price then being about 24*l.*; but, in consequence of the necessity of the state, the contractors, as usual, took the advantage, and the Admiralty could not get them for less.

This statement is verified by a paper laid before Parliament in 1805, being an estimate of the comparative cost of building a 74-gun ship in Deptford yard and in a merchant's yard, — from which it appeared that the estimate in the King's yard was 43,359*l.*; in the merchant's yard 62,430*l.*, — the difference being, for each ship, 19,071*l.* The result of all this was, that there occurred, in the navy estimates for the year 1807, the following item: — "For building ships in merchants' yards, and other extra expenses, 2,134,903*l.*" I think it impossible to have stronger evidence than this to prove that the system of reducing too low the number of our ships will eventually prove inconsistent even with economy; and if there be any Honourable Members so dead to every nobler feeling, and so regardless of every higher consideration, as to consider this a question of pounds, shillings, and pence, they may depend upon it that we can commit no one act more calculated to involve us in hostilities than that of allowing our naval strength to be reduced so low as to inspire other nations with the belief that we are no longer in a condition to vindicate our naval supremacy; and I need not add, that, if such should be the result of our parsimony, a war of even one year's duration will cost us more than the expense of maintaining the fleet in a state of efficiency to the end of the present century. I have stated that, in my humble opinion, we have been too remiss in building ships of the line; but I think we have been still more so in respect to frigates. We have, indeed, a long list of this description of ships of war; but, on examination, it will be found that it chiefly consists of comparatively small vessels; and that, in building frigates of the larger classes, we are by no means keeping pace with the progress of other nations. It is stated, in Sir John Barrow's tables, published last year, that, of frigates of the first and second classes, mounting fifty guns and upwards, actually built, America had 15, France 25, England only 19; America was building 18, France 17, England 2. In short, France and America had 40 frigates, mounting fifty guns and upwards, whilst England had only 19. They were building 35; England, 2. And if we continue thus indifferent to what is passing around us till these preparations shall be completed, France and America will have 75 of these heavy frigates, while England will have but 21 to oppose (in the unfortunate event of a war with these countries) to that overwhelming force. The Gallant Admiral opposite has, indeed, told us that this service is to be allotted to the 72-gun ships; but, not to mention other objections to this expedient (of which there are many), the 72-gun ships are all old ships, nearly worn out, whose services cannot, therefore, much longer be available; and I therefore think there is an urgent necessity for increasing the number of frigates of the larger classes. No one can be more averse than I am to an inconsiderate and wasteful expenditure of public money; and I do not now ask for naval establishments on a scale of unnecessary or extraordinary magnitude; but I do think that it is nothing short of madness that we, whose strength and security is our fleet, should tamper with its efficiency, from motives of misplaced economy; and I earnestly trust that they who are responsible for the condition of the navy are about to adopt the advice given them last year by my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Tamworth, and to take such measures as will enable the naval force of this country to advance in a manner corresponding with that of other nations.

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 28,330*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to pay the wages of artificers, labourers, and others employed in Her Majesty's naval establishments abroad, to the 31st day of March, 1841.

"That a sum, not exceeding 1,038,666*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the expense of naval stores for the building, repair, and outfit of the fleet, the purchase of steam machinery, and for other purposes connected therewith, to the 31st day of March, 1841.

"That a sum, not exceeding 193,174*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the charge of new works, improvements, and repairs in the naval yards, to the 31st day of March, 1841.

"That a sum, not exceeding 17,669*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the charge of medicines and medical stores, to the 31st day of March, 1841."

Votes severally agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 110,130*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the charge of divers naval miscellaneous services, to the 31st day of March, 1841."

On the vote being put, —

Mr. HUME said: — Sir, I wish to ask whether the contracts relative to the West India packets have been signed?

Mr. M. O'FERRALL. — The contract for the conveyance of the mails to Halifax has been signed, but that to which the Honourable Member alludes has not been signed.

Mr. HUME. — I should be sorry to hear of the contract being signed without some further inquiry.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Perhaps the Honourable Member will give notice of a motion on the subject.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, I really think the Government ought to appoint a Committee, and receive all the evidence which may be offered. We ought not to involve ourselves in a contract of this kind for so many years, whilst we are in ignorance of what may be about to take place in the progress of steam navigation.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — If the Honourable Member will undertake to bring the subject before the House, the contract shall be suspended for the present.

Mr. C. WOOD. — Sir, the subject to which the Honourable Member for Kilkenny alludes has received the most deliberate consideration; and I believe every possible source of information has been resorted to. I can only say, that no offer was made by any other individuals, either for the whole or any part of the contract. The Halifax contract was put up for competition; but the terms on which we obtained it by private contract were infinitely more favourable; and I believe it was a fair bargain for the country. I recollect the Honourable Member stating that 100,000*l.* had been offered to the parties to transfer the contract now in contemplation. That certainly is not the case. The parties have only just been able to enter into the necessary engagements, because they were unable, until within the last few days, to induce parties to take the remainder of their shares, — a proof that the bargain is not very disadvantageous to the public. I trust the Honourable Gentleman will not delay the contract by inquiry; for no further information can be obtained.

Mr. WARBURTON. — Sir, I hope my Honourable Friend the Member for Kilkenny will bring forward a motion on this subject; for I think the Government ought not to enter into a contract on this subject, without laying the grounds of it before Parliament.

Mr. HUME. — I understand that the lines pointed out for the packets are not likely to be profitable; and I am very desirous that further inquiry should be made before the country is saddled with an expense of 200,000*l.* for the conveyance of mails.

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 758,657*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charge of half pay to officers of the navy and Royal marines, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1841."

On the vote being put,

Mr. GISBORNE said: — As we have now got through the votes for the effective department of the navy, I hope there will be no objection to your reporting progress; because I wish to make some observations with respect to the non-effective service, which I should be very unwilling to do at this late hour, and in the present state of the House. I believe that the reductions, which have hitherto taken place, have been very unsatisfactory to the country at large; and I wish to have the opportunity of giving full expression to my opinion on the subject. Unless I have some assurance that I shall be able to do so on bringing up the Report, I shall certainly move that you report progress.

Mr. M. O'FERRALL. — I trust the Honourable Member will not oppose the remaining votes. I will undertake to bring up the Report at such an early hour as to afford every facility to the Honourable Member for any remarks which he may think proper to make.

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 512,355*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charge of military pensions and allowances, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1841."

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 187,263*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charge of civil pensions and allowances, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1841."

On the vote being put, —

Mr. HUME said: — I am sorry to complain that the reduction made under this head, after so many years of peace, is very trifling; and I am convinced, that so long as this department has the power of granting pensions, we shall have no remedy. The amount paid in pensions is enormous; and it will be necessary to bring the matter fully before the House. For my own part, I think it would be better to do away with these pensions altogether. There is no limit to the naval establishment; and the Admiralty have the power of creating any amount of pensions which they please. I must also complain, that the marines are treated differently from the navy; for whilst not one officer in fifty in the marines is promoted, in the navy, promotion is carried to almost as great an extent as it was during the war. I intend shortly to move for a Return of all pensions, civil and military, with which the people of England are burdened; and the amount will really astonish the country. I do not blame the Government, who are holding back; but I do blame Honourable Gentlemen on the opposite side, who are calling for new line-of-battle ships. Amongst the supporters of an increased naval armament I find the Honourable Member for East Kent (Mr. Plumptre), who ought to be one of the last men to urge the Government to make large preparations for war. I think the Honourable Member must have forgotten the opinions of those with whom he has been so long associated. I belong to a society of the friends of peace; but the Honourable Member seems to belong to those who are partial to war. The Government ought to consider that those who are now urging them to increased expenses, will be the last men to support them when new taxes are proposed to meet these expenses.

Mr. PLUMPTRE. — I trust that I am not altogether unmindful of the precepts to which the Honourable Gentleman alludes; but I think the best way to maintain peace is to be better prepared for war than this country is at present.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — I wish to call the attention of the House to an order of the Admiralty, which affects the mates in the navy. It directs that, in future, the names of all mates who shall remain out of the service for more than one year, without applying for an appointment, shall be removed from the official register, and they shall be considered as having relinquished the naval service, unless the board shall be satisfied that the omission has proceeded from unavoidable causes. I think this a discretionary power which is extremely detrimental to the service. The mates cannot exist on what you give them; and they go abroad in private vessels, and sometimes are unable to apply, in consequence of their absence. If a mate go out of the country, he ought to have the privilege of making an application on his return.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I think this arrangement is for the advantage of the parties concerned; as it tends to retain them in the service, and prevents them from forfeiting their chance of future promotion. Mates and midshipmen, under these circumstances, have not much difficulty in getting a ship. It is quite true that midshipmen's pay is "nothing at all, and find yourself;" but this is one of the long-established inconveniences of the service.

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 174,374*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to pay the freight of ships and transports, and other charges; for the victualling and conveyance of troops and stores, on account of the army and ordnance departments, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1841.

"That a sum, not exceeding 68,841*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the expense of conveying convicts to New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, which will come in the course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1841."

Votes agreed to.

SIR C. ADAM. — Sir, I wish to set myself right with the Honourable Member for Kilkenny as to the monthly allowances to the seamen. I stated, on a former night, that the allowance was 4*s.* per month; but, in some cases, it is as high as 16*s.* per month. I hope, therefore, it will be perfectly satisfactory to the Honourable Member to know that the amount cannot be less than 4*s.*, and may be 16*s.*

Mr. HUME. — I wish to have some regular settlement with the seamen every six or twelve months. You are now treating them like children.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — Sir, before you leave the chair, I wish, first, to ask the Noble Lord opposite whether he will give the House clearly to understand that the Report of the Military and Naval Commission will be laid upon the table in the course of a fortnight?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I cannot say when it will be ready, as I have nothing to do with the Commission; but I have no doubt that it will be laid on the table as soon as possible.

The House then resumed; resolutions to be reported this day; Committee to sit again on Wednesday.

SUPPLY.

Report (28th February) deferred till this day.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Committee deferred till Wednesday.

INLAND WAREHOUSING BILL.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — Sir, as the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge, who has given notive of a motion to refer the Inland Warehousing Bill to a Select Committee, is not present, I will not now propose the second reading. I am willing to refer the Bill to a Committee; but I think the more convenient course would have been, to ascertain the sense of the House, in the first instance, on the principle of the measure. I hope that no time will be lost in moving for and naming the Committee, as it is desirable that the subject should be brought under the consideration of the House as speedily as possible. I trust, therefore, that some Honourable Member will move for the Select Committee at once.

SIR GEORGE CLERK. — It was the intention of my Right Honourable Friend to move for the appointment of a Committee on the second reading, because he was desirous that some inquiry should take place, before the House affirms the principle of the Bill.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — Sir, if there is no objection, I will now move that the Committee be appointed. I am quite sure that the Right Honourable Gentleman does not mean to interpose the Committee for the purpose of delay; and if he considers that the subject will be more thoroughly investigated by a Committee upstairs, than in Committee of the whole House, I have no objection to the inquiry. I therefore move that a Select Committee be appointed "to consider the practicability and expediency of extending to inland towns the privilege of warehousing goods, and the regulations and restrictions with which such a measure, if practicable, should be accompanied, in order to give effectual security to the revenue, and to afford equal advantage to the trading interests in different parts of the country."

Agreed to; Committee to be nominated this day.

SEWERS.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. — In moving for leave to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the laws relating to sewers in England and Wales, I will merely observe, that its provisions are very nearly the same as those introduced in the Bill of last year, which was referred to a Select Committee, printed, and circulated throughout the country.

Mr. HODGES. — Sir, I do not mean to oppose the motion; but I trust the Honourable Member will give ample time for a full consideration of the subject.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. — I have no particular desire to press the measure forward. I intend to adopt the course pursued last year, to move that the Bill be printed, and to refer it to the same Committee; so that there will be the fullest possible opportunity for examination.

Motion agreed to; Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Christopher and Lord Worsley. Subsequently presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Monday, 16th March, and to be printed.

SETTLED ESTATES DRAINAGE.

On the motion of Mr. Pusey, Bill "to enable the Owners of settled Estates to defray the Expense of draining the same, by way of Mortgage," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Pusey and Mr. Handley. — Bill subsequently presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Wednesday, 11th March, and to be printed.

APPOINTMENTS (PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS).

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — Sir, pursuant to the notice which I have given, I beg to move for a Return "of all the appointments, exceeding in value the sum of 200*l.* per annum, that have been made in the various public departments, including the household appointments, with the names and dates of such appointments; together with the several salaries and allowances granted to, or received by, each, from the 1st day of January, 1830, to the present period."

An Honourable Member. — Sir, I second the motion.

Question put.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I certainly have no objection to the Returns, although a considerable time will be requisite for their production; but as the intention of the Gallant Officer is to make some attack on the Government, I think the fair way would be, to have ten years on each side; and that it would be better to order the Returns from 1820.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I have no hesitation in saying, that my object is to procure information, for the purpose of making an attack upon the Government. The Right Honourable Gentleman objects to the Return, because it will be attended with considerable trouble; and yet he proposes to extend the period embraced by it, from ten to twenty years. The fact is, that the Right Honourable Gentleman flinches from inquiry; but if he intends to oppose the Return, I will take the sense of the House upon it. I wish the country to know into what sort of hands the official patronage of the Government has fallen; and if the Government will not give me the Return, I am quite ready to pay for it out of my own pocket. If the Right Honourable Gentleman will not grant me the Return, in the terms in which I ask it, I will take the opportunity of moving for it on the first motion for going into Committee of Supply. "Let the galled jade wince, my withers are unwrung."

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Sir, my objection is, that the Return will not show what the Honourable and Gallant Gentleman requires. If we are to have a Return, I beg to move that it be made out from 1820.

Return, from 1820, as amended, ordered.

EAST INDIA PRODUCE.

On the motion of SIR R. JENKINS, Committee nominated:— Sir Richard Jenkins, Sir George Grey, Mr. Hogg, Sir James Graham, Mr. Crawford, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Irving, Mr. Mark Philips, Mr. Goulburn, Lord Viscount Sandon, Lord Seymour, Mr. Clay, Mr. John Elliot, Mr. Brocklehurst, and Mr. Ewart. — Power to send for persons, papers, and records; five to be the quorum.

ORDNANCE STORES.

Order (27th February) for Return relative thereto, read, and discharged.

Adjourned at half after twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS, Martis, 3° die Martii, 1840.

APPEALS.

Tennant and Company v. Forth and Clyde Canal Navigation Company.—Considered, and interlocutors affirmed.

Countess of Dalhousie v. M'Dowall.—Further heard, and adjourned to Thursday next.

CHARD CANAL BILL.

Read a third time, and passed.

TRUSTEES OF STANLEY'S CHARITY.

Petition of, for a Bill.—Read, and referred to two English judges.

PROMOLI'S NATURALISATION BILL.—HAUSBURG'S NATURALISATION BILL.

Reported, without amendment, and Bills to be ingrossed.

VAGRANTS' REMOVAL BILL.

Read a second time, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

BEAUMONT BARONY.

Committee for Privileges to meet on Thursday, the 19th instant.

WOLVERHAMPTON CHAPEL BILL.

Read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

WARR'S DIVORCE BILL.

Second reading (which stands appointed for Friday, the 13th instant) put off to Monday, the 16th instant; and the Lords summoned.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT ACT.

The Duke of Devonshire presented a petition against any alteration in the principles of the law,—of guardians of the Belper union.—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The Earl of Kinnoul presented petitions against alteration of the law of patronage,—of landed proprietors, justices of the peace, and others of Blairgourie: of heritors, schoolmasters, elders, and others of Oyne: of heritors, elders, and others of chapel of Garioch: and of licentiates of the Church of Scotland, and students of divinity resident within the bounds of the presbytery of Alford.—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The Duke of Richmond presented petitions in favour of the principle of non-intrusion,—of the reverend the presbytery of Dunfermline: of the presbytery of Greenock: of ministers, elders, and others of Aberdeen: of ministers and elders of the presbytery of Irvine: and of inhabitants of Nigg; Fittercairn; Kinnettles; Strachan; Drumonk; Marykirk; Lundie; Botriphnie; Garvock; Birse; Oyne; Stracathrone; Ellon; and Udny.—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FROST, WILLIAMS, AND JONES.

Lord Lyndhurst presented a petition of inhabitants of Saint Pancras, praying that this House will present an Address to Her Majesty, for the pardon of said convicts.—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

UNION WORKHOUSES.

The Marquess of Lansdowne presented petitions for alteration of the law respecting the rating of,—of owners of property and ratepayers in the Droxford union; and of guardians of the Devizes union. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CORN LAWS.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — My Lords, I hold in my hand petitions against any alteration in the present corn laws, from the several owners and occupiers of land in Earnley, West Itchenor, Middleton, Westhampnett, East Lavant, Boxgrove, Barnham, Binderton, Aldingbourne, Apledram, West Stoke, Westwittering, Newfishbourne, Upwaltham, Eastergate, and Eastdean. I need not say that I cordially agree in the prayer of the petition; and I hope that the farmers of this country will lose no time in forwarding to both Houses of Parliament petitions embracing the same opinions on the subject; for they must be aware that persons are going through the country lecturing on this question, and getting persons to sign petitions, who, in reality, know very little about what they are signing. I trust, therefore, that the farmers will immediately do as they did last Session, — humbly petition both Houses of Parliament not to accede to the wishes of those who are desirous of repealing the corn laws. That would be the wise and proper course for them to pursue; and I am confident that, if they adopt it, their efforts will produce the same successful result which attended them last year.

Severally read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

The EARL of GALLOWAY. — My Lords, I rise to present a petition from the Protestant Association of Edinburgh; and as it is very short, and the subject is of importance, I beg leave to read it. The petitioners pray for an inquiry into the nature and tendency of the books used as class books at Maynooth College; and set forth that, if those books are such as they have been described to be, it is inconsistent with the duty of a Christian Government any longer to supply funds for the support of that college; and that they consider the existence of such an institution to be a vile blot on the national institutions. My Lords, in laying this petition before your Lordships, I do not pretend to be acquainted with the books in use at the college of Maynooth; but I have no hesitation in asserting that, if the books are of such a nature as is stated in this petition, it is a subject that ought, at once, to be dealt with by Parliament. In presenting this petition, I beg it to be observed that I entertain no hostile feelings towards the Roman Catholic body. Indeed, I was one of those who, from the very first, entertained a conscientious opinion in their favour; and in the other House I have voted in favour of what was called Catholic emancipation, — a measure which, I am sorry to say, has not produced those happy results that were anticipated from it by the many Protestants who supported it. Of this, however, I have no doubt, that a Roman Catholic college, established for purely Roman Catholic purposes, is inconsistent with the security and safety of a Protestant state. I am aware that the first endowment of such a college took place under a Tory Government; I do not, therefore, cast any blame on the Noble Viscount. I think, however, it has now become our duty to discontinue the grant, seeing that its continuance is inconsistent with the public safety. Extracts from the books to which I have alluded were read at an influential meeting which was held in this city some time ago; and they were found to agree with the allegations contained in the petition. The subject-matter of the petition is, therefore, a proper subject for serious inquiry. About a month ago, a Right Reverend Prelate moved —

> That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to command that inquiries be made into the diffusion of blasphemous and immoral publications, and especially into the tenets and proceedings of a society under the name of Socialists, which has been represented in petitions to this House to be a society the object of which is, by the dissemination of doctrines subversive of morality and religion, to destroy the existing laws and institutions of this realm.

To that Address Her Majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer: —

> I will give directions that inquiry be made into the important matters which form the subject of your Address; and you may rely upon my determination to discourage all doctrines and practices dangerous to morality and religion.

Now, I found my appeal for inquiry in this case on the Address which I have read, and the gracious answer in reply to it. I hope that an inquiry will be instituted on this subject, in order that no further public grant shall be continued for the support of this college, if, as has been described, and as I believe to be the fact, books are used in it which promulgate doctrines dangerous to morality and the welfare of society.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the table.

KEW BOTANIC GARDENS.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — My Lords, I wish to ask the Noble Viscount opposite a question, on a subject which, although of no political importance, is, in my opinion, intimately connected with the dignity of the Crown. It is relative to a subject which is, in some degree, if not directly, connected with the situation which the Noble Viscount opposite (Lord Duncannon) holds. I allude to the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew. I have heard many reports, with respect to the intention of the Government to abandon and destroy that fine establishment. I should have given little or no credit to those reports, if I had not been informed that an offer was made to a horticultural society of this city to give up to them the plants in the gardens, on certain conditions. That society is very well known for their anxiety to forward horticultural pursuits; but they have, nevertheless, declined the offer. They have refused to become parties to a transaction which had for its object the destruction of those gardens. My Lords, I consider the Botanic Gardens at Kew to be maintained by the public as a part of the state and dignity of the Crown, which ought by no means to be alienated from it. I know not what expense this establishment may entail on the Civil List; but I should be happy to see assistance given by the country, if necessary, in support of an object of this description. I have received communications from various scientific institutions on this subject, proving it to be one of general interest. It may be, perhaps, considered presumptuous in me to offer advice; but if I were consulted, so far from desiring to destroy this establishment, I should think that Her Majesty could not favour a better object than the protection, encouragement, and cultivation of that delightful science with which those gardens are connected. I now ask the Noble Viscount who is at the head of the department of Woods and Forests, whether any such intention as that to which I have alluded at present exists? or whether the tacit reproof administered by the Horticultural Society, to whom the offer was made, has induced the Government to forego their original intention?

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON. — I beg to inform the Noble Earl that the Botanic Gardens at Kew are not under the control of my department. But I can assure the Noble Earl, that there is, not only not the least intention, now, to break up those gardens, but there never has been any such intention. Indeed, the attempt would be next to impossible; for a great many of the plants could not be removed without insuring their destruction.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — I have no wish to allege anything against the Noble Viscount's department, which I believe to be the best managed under the Government; though, perhaps, that is not saying a great deal in its favour. The Noble Viscount has informed your Lordships that these gardens do not come within the range of his department. It therefore may be supposed that the Noble Viscount is not aware of all the circumstances of the case. Now, I can assure the Noble Viscount that an offer of the plants was made to the Horticultural Society of London; that that society has refused the offer so made, thinking it would be injurious to the public interests that the establishment should be so broken up. The Noble Viscount has asserted that the plants could not be removed without great danger. That may be the case with a few; but the great portion could be transferred to any other garden with ease. There cannot be a doubt that the offer of the plants was made to other societies on certain conditions, — such, for instance, as that the public should be admitted freely to the gardens one day in the week, or something of that sort. I am, however, most happy to find that the project has been abandoned.

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON. — Although the care of the gardens is not in my department, I have the authority of the Lord Steward for stating that no intention of breaking up the gardens now exists, or has existed.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (ENGLAND).

The MARQUESS of SALISBURY.— During the last Session, I had occasion to present a petition to the House on the subject of compensation to be granted to the late town clerk of Sandwich; but, since that time, it appears that no steps have been taken in the matter. I wish to be informed by the Noble Viscount opposite what determination the Government has come to?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I beg to inform the Noble Marquess that the subject is still under consideration.

EXCHEQUER PAPERS.

LORD REDESDALE. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord at the head of the Exchequer department, whether any means have been adopted for the preservation of the important documents connected with that department? I have been informed that an enormous destruction of Exchequer papers has lately taken place.

LORD MONTEAGLE. — I can assure the Noble Lord that the documents which have been lately destroyed were, for the most part, duplicates of documents connected with ancient proceedings in the Exchequer. They were not destroyed until there had been a full inquiry and due deliberation upon the subject. Two gentlemen, competent to the task, were appointed to make the inquiry. They have reported on the subject; and if the House require it, there will be no objection to furnishing the Report.

LORD REDESDALE. — I do not think that even the ancient documents of the Exchequer should have been destroyed by so summary a process. If an investigation were necessary, it should have been intrusted to the authorities at the British Museum, instead of giving to two individuals an unlimited power of destruction.

HORSE RACING ACTS (IN PART) REPEAL BILL.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — My Lords, I have to request your Lordships to permit the first reading of a Bill which has been rendered necessary by certain late transactions of a vexatious character. An Act was passed in 1740, which prohibited any person from running more than one horse in a race, or from running any horse otherwise than in his own name. That Act, up to the present time, has never been carried into effect. Neither, indeed, could it be; because, if a person had bought a horse under an engagement, it must run under that engagement, as a matter of course. Yet, according to this statute, the horse so running would be forfeited, and the owner would become liable to a penalty. The Act was hardly known, indeed, until some very clever solicitor lately ferretted it out, and served notice of action upon six gentlemen under its provisions. Now, according to this law, the member for a borough or county subscribing 10*l.* or 20*l.* to the races held there is liable to a penalty, or any number of gentlemen entering for a sweepstakes. His late Majesty, who kept racehorses for the purpose of encouraging an amusement which all could enjoy, and of maintaining the breed of horses, frequently ran three horses in one race, and that in the name of the Master of the Horse. His Majesty, by doing so, was liable, under this Act, to one of the penalties and the forfeiture of the horses; and the Earl of Albemarle to another penalty. My Lords, the Act has clearly fallen into desuetude, and therefore I call on your Lordships to repeal so much of it as can be made an instrument for litigation; else it will be made use of to extort money from persons who are perfectly ignorant of its existence. The Bill which I have now the honour to introduce will go to repeal that part of the 13th of George II. which contains the enactments to which I have referred. I have adopted the precedents afforded by a Bill brought into Parliament by Sir W. Follett some time ago, and another introduced last year by the Attorney General,— the one relating to pluralities, the other concerning newspapers; so that, in the case of actions already instituted, the party prosecuting may get his costs, but not recover the penalties. I trust I have given sufficient explanation of the objects of the Bill to induce your Lordships to allow it to be read a first time.

Bill read a first time, to be read a second time on Thursday, and the Lords summoned.

PAPERS, &c.

On the motion of the DUKE of RICHMOND,— Return of the number of stage coaches which have, during the last three years, been permitted to pass on turnpike roads free of tolls, in consequence of carrying letters.

GAOLS.

Annual Reports respecting.—Delivered (pursuant to Act), and ordered to lie on the table.

Railways. — Petitions for free competition, — from Wolverhampton; and Birmingham. — Referred to the Select Committee on Railway Communication.

EDINBURGH GAS BILL.

Mr. KELLY. — I move, Sir, "That it be an instruction to the Committee on the Edinburgh Gas Bill to receive and entertain the petition of William Henry Miller, Esquire."

Mr. GREENE. — I feel it my duty to resist this motion. The petitioner complains that, not having been aware of the proceedings in this case, he only arrived in London yesterday, when he found the Bill before the Committee. Now, inasmuch as the House has directed that certain notices should be given in the cases of "all" private Bills, for the information of all parties concerned; and inasmuch as that rule has been complied with in this instance, I do not think the House can listen to an application of this kind, made, not to say at the last moment, but when the Bill is actually before the Committee. If such applications be attended to, in contravention of the resolutions of the House, much inconvenience, I am convinced, will be the result. It is of great importance that the parties to Private Bills should be informed, some days beforehand, whether the Bill is to be opposed or not; and ample opportunity is afforded to all persons interested to come forward in time. It may very well answer their purpose to keep back until the last moment; but I do not think the practice should be sanctioned, merely on the ground that they were at a distant part of the country, and could not be in town sooner.

SIR GEORGE CLERK. — I think, Sir, that this is a case which calls for the interference of the House. The petitioner is a gentleman who has property in the immediate vicinity of Edinburgh, which will be seriously affected by this Bill. He was residing in the south of England at the time he received notice, from his agent, of the particular clause which so affects his property. He came to town, immediately, upon the receipt of that notice, to defend his rights. He only arrived this morning; but he then found that the Committee had assembled yesterday, and that if the House adhered to the rule which was made at the beginning of last month, he would be absolutely precluded from appearing before them on his own behalf. The objectionable clause confers a power upon a certain gas company to turn a quantity of deleterious matter into a stream which flows through his property; which power he wishes to be withdrawn from the Bill. He will offer no opposition to the Bill on any other ground; and he has reason to believe that the supporters of the Bill will not very strenuously oppose the alteration he wishes to be made in that clause, and which a few words will effect. Under these circumstances, as that provision will materially prejudice his property, while it will be of very slight consequence to the gas company, I do hope the motion will be agreed to.

Mr. FINCH. — I do not think sufficient grounds have been stated to induce the House to consent to this motion. The clause of which the petitioner complains has actually passed the Committee; and if, as stated by the Honourable Baronet, a few words will remedy the objection to that clause, surely it would be better to propose that alteration when the Report shall be before the House, than to call upon the House now to infringe the resolution it passed at the commencement of the Session.

Mr. ESTCOURT. — According to the Standing Orders, no petition shall be received unless it be presented three clear days before the Committee meets; but if anything arise during the progress of the Committee, then a petition may be presented and accepted by the House, and referred to the Committee. What is the case here? The Standing Orders have been complied with; the notices have been given; everything has been done; — and then the petitioner says that, indeed, he was in a distant part of the country. That is an excuse which can be set up upon almost every occasion. Persons may say they were in France or elsewhere, and could not get the necessary information in time to be here to attend to their interests. But, if a man has property in Edinburgh of any value, it is too much to suppose that he should not have, in that city, some person or other to supply him with all needful information. All the usual notices previous to the introduction of the Bill were given, as we of the Committee know; and it was the duty of the petitioner to have so arranged with his agent, that he would have received his notice in time, and not now to apply to the House to dispense with the Standing Orders, which were made for the protection of property, in a case where there would appear to have been gross negligence on the part of his agent. Besides, as has already been suggested, the petitioner is not without a remedy; and can, at a future stage of the Bill, apply to have the clause altered to which he objects.

Mr. KELLY. — After what has fallen from the Honourable Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee, and also from the Honourable Member for Lancaster, I shall not press the motion any further.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE.

Resolutions reported: —

1. That, in the case of the Ochil (Clackmannanshire) roads petition, the parties be permitted to proceed with their Bill, on forthwith giving the notices required by the Standing Orders; and that the Committee on the Bill do examine, in the first place, how far such order has been complied with, and do report the same to the House on the Report of the Bill.

2. That, in the case of the West Stirlingshire roads petition, the Standing Orders ought not to be dispensed with.

First resolution agreed to. — Report to lie on the table.

Ochil (Clackmannanshire) Roads. — Report from Select Committee on Standing Orders (this day), read. — Leave granted that notices be forthwith published, in three successive weeks, in some one and the same newspaper of the county of Fife. — Bill ordered to be brought in by ADMIRAL SIR CHARLES ADAM and LORD DALMENY.

Ordered, that the Committee on the Bill do examine, in the first place, how far the order for giving the said notices shall have been complied with, and do report the same to the House on the Report of the Bill.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

Leave to Committee to sit this day till five of the clock, during the sitting of the House.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

NEW WRIT FOR LEWES.

In the room of Sir Charles Blunt, Baronet, deceased.

MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS.

The following petitions were severally presented, and ordered to lie on the table; namely, —

Church Patronage (Scotland), — For alteration of the law, — from Airdrie (two petitions); Resolis; Prestonkirk; Tain; Renfield Church, Glasgow; Rosemarkie; Cummertrees; Girvan; Wellpark; Farnell; Arbroath; Brechin (three petitions); Menmuir; Heriot; and Craig.

Corn Laws, — By LORD ELIOT, COLONEL ANSON, MR. Similar Return for every gaol and house of correction in each city and borough in England and Wales.

PRINTED PAPERS — MR. SHERIFF EVANS.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — Sir, before the House proceeds to the regular business of the evening, I feel bound to state a circumstance, its attention to which admits of no delay, and which, I hope, will receive the indulgent consideration of the House. This morning I received a visit from a Mr. Freeman, who, as I have since understood, is a medical gentleman of the highest respectability, living at No. 21. Spring Gardens. Mr. Freeman stated to me, that he was in professional attendance upon Mr. Sheriff Evans; that that gentleman is suffering under a complaint of the liver; that he has been used to an active life; and that when he undertook the duties of sheriff he could not have foreseen that he should have been subjected to so much confinement. Mr. Freeman went on to say, that, in his opinion, further confinement would not be dangerous merely to the health of the sheriff, but even to his life. He stated expressly, that he considered the life of Mr. Sheriff Evans would be endangered by further confinement. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion, looking to the determination at which the House arrived in the case of Mr. Sheriff Wheelton, that if the facts of the case are proved to be as I have now stated them to be, the decision of the House can hardly be different. I therefore requested Mr. Freeman to be in attendance at the House at five o'clock, for the purpose of being examined; so that if anything which I have now stated be exaggerated or erroneous, it may be set right; and again, if it prove correct, — that the statement made may rest on the professional authority of a medical man. Having mentioned these circumstances, I shall leave the case in the hands of the House, fully trusting to the decision of an assembly of British gentlemen, and being satisfied, that whatever may be the course which the majority of the House shall think it proper to pursue in defence of its own privileges, and whatever I and others may think of the propriety of that course, an assembly of British gentlemen will not be insensible to the claims of sickness and the feelings of humanity. If there be no objection, I will move that Mr. Freeman, the medical attendant of Mr. Sheriff Evans, be called to the bar, in order to his being examined as to the state of Mr. Sheriff Evans.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I hope the Noble Lord will not make the motion now, but give notice of it for to-morrow. I think that in the last case the House was taken by surprise. I am sure we all feel exceedingly sorry, individually, for the inconvenience to which the sheriffs have been subjected in enforcing the privileges of the House. But take any other case. What has been the treatment of the two individuals who are now confined in Warwick gaol? It is proved, by the correspondence which has been laid before the House, that the health of those individuals is most seriously endangered by their confinement. Yet, what has been the course pursued by the Government in their case? Why, their friends were told that the surgeon of the gaol was the person appointed to inquire into the health of the prisoners; and it was not until after long and continued representations of the bad state of their health, that the medical adviser who was accustomed to visit them was allowed, as a matter of great indulgence, to have access to them. I therefore call the attention of the House to the difference between the treatment of ordinary prisoners and the mode in which it is now proposed, in the most summary manner, to dispose of the representations of parties who are the medical attendants of persons, confined, for setting at defiance the privileges of the House of Commons. I hope, therefore, that the Noble Lord will give notice of his motion, so that Honourable Gentlemen may have time to consider what course it is befitting the House to pursue. I do not think it fair that the present motion should be brought on without previous notice. The Noble Lord has not even ventured to say that there is any immediate danger of the life, or even health, of Mr. Sheriff Evans; so that he has made out no case for pressing his motion now.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — The Honourable Gentleman who has just spoken has correctly represented the usual course of proceeding with respect to persons convicted and confined in prisons. The usual course is, that if a representation be made that the life of a prisoner is in danger, the representation is referred to the surgeon of the gaol; and if a representation be then made, by the surgeon of the gaol, that the prisoner's life is really endangered, there is no case which I have known in which a remission of the sentence has not been allowed. With respect to Mr. Sheriff Evans, however, we have not any medical officer connected with the House whom we can employ to ascertain the state of his health. The House must take either one or the other of two courses, and I will consent to the adoption of either. The House must either act upon the suggestion of the Honourable Member for Bridport, and examine the medical person in question at the bar to-morrow; or, what, I think, is, for some reasons, the preferable course, allow that gentleman to be now examined, and his examination taken down, so that in case of its appearing that the illness of Mr. Sheriff Evans arises, as stated, from a liver complaint, and, therefore, that there is no immediate danger to be apprehended, the evidence shall then be printed, and taken into consideration to-morrow. The lapse of twenty-four hours cannot, if such be the illness of Mr. Sheriff Evans, make any great difference

Mr. O'CONNELL. — It must be recollected, that this gentleman can himself obtain his liberation at any moment; and it would be no disparagement to him to submit to the authority of the House. I think that, such being the state of the case, the present plea, in the shape in which it is brought before the House, is perfectly ludicrous. A man like Vincent, if he could obtain his liberty in the same way, would not hesitate to do so, by the acknowledgment of his offence; but this gentleman need make no such acknowledgment! Let the House be good enough to recollect, that one of the last proceedings of the sheriffs was a perfectly voluntary one against the privileges of the House. There was an attachment in the hands of the coroner, which was not returnable until the 19th of April. It ordered the sheriffs to pay the money in their hands over to Stockdale; and, notwithstanding that they might have waited till the 19th of April, they volunteered paying the money to Stockdale at once, apparently to put an argument into the mouths of their advocates in this House, that having paid the money once, they ought not to be asked to do it again. The only way the House has of enforcing its privileges is by imprisonment. If it is to be got rid of on the allegation of ill health, by any person who still continues his contempt towards the House, while he knows that his liberation upon submission will be instantaneous, — how, I ask, are those privileges to be maintained? It is not the House that now detains the sheriff, but his own wilfulness. At the present moment, he does not even come forward with a petition. There is no application from him. He does not come forward stating any scruple of conscience, and, at the same time, representing his ill health, and leaving his case in the hands of the House. If I rightly understood the Noble Lord, he is not even authorised by Mr. Sheriff Evans to make the communication which he has made? The application comes from a third party, who volunteers the statement. I respectfully submit to the House, that their power of maintaining their privileges is a mockery, if they suffer it to be frittered away in this manner.

LORD MAHON. — I am sorry that the plea which I have put forward, in case of sickness, should appear "ludicrous" to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman; but I will venture to say, that it appears so to no other man in the House but that Honourable and Learned Member.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I submit, that the expression of the Noble Lord is not in order. It is, at least, exceedingly uncivil.

LORD MAHON. — I understood the Honourable and Learned Member twice to make use of the word "ludicrous," and apply it to the proceeding before the House. I now repeat, and you, Sir, will correct me, if I am out of order, that I believe such an application appears "ludicrous" to no other Member of the House but the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin. With respect to the request made by the Honourable Member for Bridport, I cannot consent to any postponement of this question. I feel it my duty to persist in the motion, that we shall now receive information, at the bar, touching the health of Mr. Sheriff Evans. As to the observations made by the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, I submit, that both the Noble Lord and the House will be in a better situation to judge of the propriety of printing the evidence, and taking it into consideration, to-morrow, when they shall have heard a professional statement respecting the health of the sheriff.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I beg leave to say, in explanation, that the Noble Lord has totally misstated my application of the word "ludicrous." It occurred to me, that the proposal of the Noble Lord was ludicrous, inasmuch as, here, a third person comes forward to make a representation of the sickness of an individual, that individual having it in his power to make that statement himself. I will add, that I think the manner in which the proposal was made was just as ludicrous as the matter; and I am not surprised at it, for it is well known that a more ludicrous individual than the Noble Lord is not in this House.

[Cries of "Chair, chair!"]

Mr. WARBURTON. — I move, as an amendment on the Noble Lord's motion, that the debate be adjourned till to-morrow.

SIR M. WOOD. — Sir, to my knowledge, Mr. Freeman, Sheriff Evans's medical attendant, has visited him regularly for the last ten days; and I am most anxious that some proposition should be made to the House. I believe that the resolution passed for the relief of the other sheriff is one for which the most substantial grounds existed; for that gentleman has since been extremely ill, and unable to attend to his duties. I know that Mr. Sheriff Evans has been very ill, and that for the last few days he has got considerably worse. He does not wish to buy his freedom upon the payment of 640*l.*; and I hope the House does not mean to sell it for that sum. The sheriff thinks himself justified in all he has done, and will not bend to the House. He does not come forward to ask relief, because he does not choose to incur the same charges that have been made against the other sheriff. He has already told the House, when undergoing an examination at the bar, that if, in the execution of his duty, he had done anything to offend the House, he deeply deplored it. What does the House want of him more? Do you want him to go down on his knees? If you do, I hope and trust the sheriff never will do so. Instead of being anxious to pay the money, and oppose the wish of this House, he retained it as long as he possibly could. The coroner sent the sheriff a notice that he had orders to attach him; but why did he not go and serve the notice himself? Why, because he was afraid to do so,—he was afraid of being placed in the same situation. It is proposed to let this inquiry stand over until to-morrow. Why this delay? According to the statement of the Noble Lord, it appears that Mr. Sheriff Evans is dangerously ill; or, at least, may become so, from further confinement; and I know that his medical attendant feels great anxiety on the subject. I hope the House will therefore agree to the Noble Lord's motion.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL.—I think it very unwise, on this occasion, to enter into the merits of the question of publication; and I cannot believe that the Honourable Baronet who has just sat down was authorised by the sheriff to make the statement, that he will not bend to the authority of the House. It cannot be denied that the sheriff, notwithstanding the course which he thought it his duty to pursue, has deported himself respectfully towards the House; and therefore, I presume, it is not too much to say, that he ought to be treated with respect. The question now is, not whether the sheriff has done right or wrong, but whether the state of his health is such as to call for the interference of the House? That point can best be ascertained by examining the medical gentleman who is in attendance; and we can afterwards decide whether the further consideration of the case ought to be postponed till to-morrow. I regret to say, that the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin has used language towards my Noble Friend which I am almost ashamed to repeat. He says that the Noble Lord "is the most ludicrous man in the House." Now, I venture to tell the Honourable and Learned Member that such an observation ought never to have escaped his lips; and I think the Honourable and Learned Member can scarcely feel satisfied in his own mind that he has acted with that courtesy which is due from one Honourable Member to another. I beg to call upon that Honourable and Learned Member to give such an explanation as must be dictated by justice and his own good sense.

MR. HUME.—I am sorry that any angry words should have passed on this occasion. But the fact is, that the Noble Lord charged my Honourable and Learned Friend with insensibility; and I think his answer only a fair retort. All that my Honourable and Learned Friend meant was, that it would be too much to call upon the House to liberate the sheriff in consequence of a fit of sickness, unless it should be proved that his life would be endangered by longer detention. But, after what has been done to affect the privileges of the House, and particularly after the observations of the Honourable Baronet (Sir M. Wood), who has declared that the sheriff will defy the House in its attempts to maintain its privileges, I think the sheriff ought to approach the House by petition; and that we should not act on the statement of an Honourable Member who has not seen him. If a petition be presented, I am confident that every Honourable Member will give it his best consideration.

SIR R. PEEL.—I am clearly of opinion, Sir, that the House should keep perfectly clear and distinct the consideration of the particular ground upon which the present proposal is made, and the general question. Some Honourable Gentlemen may think that the sheriff has sufficiently expiated his offence against the House, and that he is now entitled to his discharge. But let that question be brought distinctly forward; because nothing could be more discreditable than for the House to seek to get out of its present difficulty by pretending to release the sheriff on the score of indisposition. I would infinitely rather propose the discharge of the sheriff on the ground of his having undergone sufficient punishment; but I would not refuse to release him on the ground of illness, if I were perfectly satisfied that his life is endangered by confinement. The question now is, shall the House proceed to examine the medical attendant to-night, or wait till to-morrow? My Noble Friend has stated that, from the communications made to him by the medical adviser of the sheriff, he has reason to believe that not only the health, but the life, of that gentleman is in danger. I think it would be better to examine the surgeon, now, than to wait till to-morrow. When we have heard the evidence, we can then determine whether we ought to release the sheriff now, or whether there are sufficient grounds for the postponement of the subject to another day. In consenting to the immediate examination of the surgeon, I wish it to be understood as giving no opinion as to what course ought to be pursued after that examination. I do not mean to commit myself in the slightest degree, as to the course I shall subsequently take. At the same time, I must say, that while the House is bound to administer justice equitably and fairly, we ought not to go further than the justice of the case demands.

SIR M. WOOD.—I did not mean the House to infer that the sheriff was acting in defiance of its commands; and I beg to state that I have had no communication with the sheriff on the subject of the present application, nor was I aware that any proposition was about to be submitted to the House.

Mr. WARBURTON.—I cannot but think that the course which I pointed out is the most advisable one for the House to pursue. I beg to disclaim, for myself, any power to examine the medical attendant; and I believe there are few Members in the House who are capable of examining a medical witness, so as to ascertain from him whether the sheriff be really in a dangerous state, or not. The Honourable Member for Finsbury, the coroner for Middlesex, is not present; and, as he is the individual most competent to conduct the examination, I think it ought to be postponed until to-morrow, when the witness may be ordered to attend. It is not, however, my intention to trouble the House by dividing.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn; original question put, and agreed to.

The SPEAKER directed that Mr. Freeman be called in.

Mr. Freeman called in, and examined.

The SPEAKER.—What is your name?—Joseph Freeman.

Are you the medical attendant of Mr. Sheriff Evans?—I am.

Have you seen him professionally lately?—I have.

When did you see him last?—This morning.

What is the present state of his health?—It is very bad.

Do you consider that his life is in danger from further confinement by order of this House?—I have no doubt that it will be; he is suffering from a liver complaint.

Has he been long suffering from this complaint?—For several years.

Do you know whether he has been accustomed to an active life?—Very much so.

Mr. O'CONNELL.—What is your rank in the profession; are you a physician?—I am a surgeon.

How long have you been in attendance upon Mr. Sheriff Evans?—For seven or eight years.

Have you been in constant attendance upon him during that period?—Almost constant.

Has he been equally ill all the time?—No, he has had intervals free from illness.

What was the length of those intervals?—I cannot exactly say.

Was he more frequently ill than well?—No, more frequently well than ill.

When were you last treating him as your patient,—how long before his commitment was it that you were last in attendance upon him?—Within the last two or three months I had occasion to see him frequently.

Have you prescribed for him?—I have.

State as nearly as you can how long before his arrest you last attended him as a patient?—He was not well when he came into confinement; he had, a very short time before that, a very severe fit of the gout.

How long before his confinement had he that fit of the gout?—I think it was about a month, as near as I can recollect.

Do you say that with any degree of positiveness?—No, I do not.

Do you think he was well a month before he was arrested?—It was about a month when I had occasion to prescribe for him for the gout.

How long did you prescribe for him?—During the continuance of the fit.

How long did that fit last?—I cannot recollect.

Can you come within a week? — His fits of gout generally lasted from a week to a fortnight.

Was the last fit longer or shorter than the ordinary? — That I do not recollect.

Can you recollect about how long the last fit was; how long it endured? — It was some days; I cannot exactly recollect the number of days.

Can you come at all near the period; can you approach it? — I really cannot say, as to the days, to a day or two days, or three days.

Do you keep a journal? — No, not of such cases.

Do you keep a fee-book? — No, I do not.

How often did you prescribe for him the last time? — I prescribed daily for him during the fit of the gout.

Are you in any other branch of the profession besides being a surgeon? — Yes.

What is the other branch? — An apothecary.

Are you not able to state how often you prescribed for him? — I said I prescribed daily during the fit of the gout.

Can you state how long you prescribed daily for him? — No, I cannot.

Can you give any species of calculation, or guess at it? — I have stated, as nearly as I can recollect, that his fits lasted from a week to a fortnight, sometimes longer, and sometimes shorter.

How soon after he was in confinement were you called in to attend him? — I think about three days.

Do you mean three days ago, or three days after he was arrested? — Three days from the time of his arrest.

Have you been prescribing for him ever since? — I have.

What disease have you prescribed for? — The liver complaint.

No gout? — He has had no gout, only threatenings of it, since he has been there.

Is he growing worse or better under your care? — He is growing worse under his confinement.

There is no immediate danger of him? — I cannot say that there is; but his life would be endangered if he were to remain longer under restraint.

Mr. BUSFIELD. — Do you think there is any disease of the liver, or only disorder? — There is disease of the liver; he has an enlargement of the liver; he has several times had jaundice.

Has the liver been enlarged since his confinement? — No, it is of long standing.

Is there any induration? — It is larger than it ought to be; larger than is natural.

Is there any induration? — I am of opinion there is.

Have you ascertained it by feeling the liver? — I have.

Mr. WARBURTON. — Has Mr. Sheriff Evans been subjected to the dietary of an invalid since his confinement? — I believe Mr. Sheriff Evans's diet has been very moderate since he has been here; dining early, and eating but little.

Is it such a dietary as an invalid labouring under the complaint to which you have stated Mr. Sheriff Evans is liable would be subjected, if under your treatment? — Yes.

SIR R. PEEL. — Has any other medical man been called in since his confinement? — No.

You have not felt it necessary to recommend his resorting to the advice of any other medical man? — No, I have not.

Mr. ELLIOT. — Is there any active inflammation going on in the liver of Mr. Sheriff Evans? — There is chronic inflammation going on.

There is no active inflammation? — No.

Do you apprehend that there is any immediate danger? — Not any immediate.

What is the benefit which Mr. Sheriff Evans would derive from his release? — Air and exercise.

Do you think, then, if Mr. Sheriff Evans were allowed to take air and exercise, and return to the House of Commons, it would have the same effect? — I think not; for his mind is suffering greatly, and that is acting on his body.

Is Mr. Sheriff Evans allowed to drink any wine or beer, or any beverage of that description? — He only takes one or two glasses of wine; but he has drunk none lately, certainly not any.

How lately has he been confined to his bed? — He has not been confined to his bed at all; it is not necessary.

SIR R. INGLIS. — Is Mr. Sheriff Evans aware of your having been summoned here to-day? — I am not aware that he is.

There has been no communication between you and Mr. Sheriff Evans on the subject of your examination? — There has been none.

Mr. KEMBLE. — Were you, of your own free accord, from your own observation on the state of Mr. Sheriff Evans's health, induced, without any concurrence or communication with him, to make a communication as to the state of his health to Lord Mahon? — I was.

Mr. GLADSTONE. — Are you prepared to state that the danger to Mr. Evans's life, whatever it may be, will be increased by every day's additional confinement? — I am.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Do not you think that, as regards the injury to Mr. Sheriff Evans's health by further confinement, it might be advisable to call in a physician to advise upon the case? — I can have no objection to such a step.

LORD STANLEY. — What means has Mr. Sheriff Evans of having either air or exercise at present? — I believe he walks for an hour every day in the cloisters.

Has he availed himself to the utmost that he might have done of the permission which he has to take air and exercise? — That I cannot say; these easterly winds have been rather unfavourable to him.

Mr. ELLIOT. — Have you desired him to take as much air and exercise as he can do under the permission of the House? — I have.

Have you ascertained that he has done so? — I have heard that he has done so.

He has taken as much air and exercise as he could do? — Certainly not as much as he can. I think I have understood that Mr. Sheriff Evans has walked out for an hour.

Is that sufficient? — During this weather it is.

If he was out of confinement at this moment, he could not, with benefit to his health, walk any longer than an hour? — No, I think not; the weather is against him.

Mr. HUMPHERY. — Have you consulted with his family with respect to his complaint? — I have been in daily communication with them about it.

Have you informed his family of this liver complaint which you speak of? — They all know it.

Have you consulted with them with respect to calling in further advice? — No, I have not.

You say that Mr. Sheriff Evans is suffering from a chronic inflammation of the liver; how long ago would you say that chronic inflammation first began to show itself? — I cannot say how long; I have detected it in the last two years.

Mr. GISBORNE. — Have you come before the House to make this representation at your own suggestion, or have you consulted with other persons upon the subject? — At my own suggestion.

The witness was directed to withdraw.

Mr. HUMPHERY. — I wish to inform the House that I saw Mr. Sheriff Evans about the time his medical adviser was called in; and when I informed him that that gentleman was before the House, he was perfectly astonished, for he knew nothing whatever of the fact.

Mr. KELLY. — I have seen Mr. Sheriff Evans frequently, during his confinement; and, so far as the observation of a non-medical man may form a judgment, I must say, that he appears to me to have been suffering severely in health, during the last two or three weeks. He has appeared to me to be worse and worse at each successive interview; and, although the sheriff certainly did not contemplate that his observations would be repeated in this House, I must say, that he has complained that his health has been seriously injured from his confinement.

The SPEAKER. — Does the Noble Lord make any motion?

LORD MAHON. — In compliance with the suggestion of the Noble Lord, I beg to move that the evidence be printed with the Votes, and taken into consideration to-morrow.

An Honourable Member. — Sir, I rise to second the motion.

On the question being put, —

Mr. HUME said: — I would ask the House whether the evidence which has been given be really worth printing? I think that a more flimsy case, and one more unfair towards the sheriff, could not be made out. So far from printing the evidence, I think we ought to allow it to sleep amongst the long-forgotten manuscripts of the House.

Mr. HUMPHERY. — I hope, if it be printed, that we shall, to-morrow, have some medical man of eminence examined on the subject.

Agreed to. Evidence to be taken into consideration to-morrow, and to be printed.

INLAND WAREHOUSING BILL.

Mr. GOULBURN. — Seeing the Right Honourable Gentlemen the President of the Board of Trade in his place, I wish to ask him a question respecting a proceeding which took place, last night, at a late hour, and on which, for the sake of the public and the persons particularly interested, I think the Right Honourable Gentleman should offer some explanation. I allude to what was done with respect to the Inland Warehousing Bill. It will be in the recollection of the House that I had given notice of a motion for a Committee to take the whole question into their consideration. I remained in the House, last night, until ten o'clock, and then retired, understanding that no further proceeding would then be taken. I was, therefore, not a little surprised, this morning, to find, by the Votes, that the motion of which I had given notice had been made by some other Member, and that the names of the Committee were also printed. I need scarcely observe, that a more irregular proceeding could not have occurred. It is obvious that the most serious inconvenience will ensue if a notice of motion given by a Member at one side of the House be taken up by Members at the other, and Committees, of which he expected to have the nomination, according to the usual course of business, are to be taken out of his hands, and appointed in his absence. The Right Honourable Gentleman has informed me that the names were inserted by mistake, and, of course, I am bound to give credit to the statement; but what I complain of is, that my motion was taken, in an underhand manner, after twelve o'clock, in my absence; so that I was left without the chance of making a single observation on a subject in which I take the greatest interest. For the sake of precedent, I have felt called upon to mention the subject; and I trust that such an explanation will be given as will satisfy the House that the attempt will not be repeated.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I am very glad that the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite has afforded me an opportunity of giving the explanation upon this subject which I am able and willing to give. I beg to declare, in the first place, that nothing could be further from my intention than to do anything in the least degree unfair towards the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite; and, if I had entertained the smallest doubt as to his acquiescence, I certainly would not have acted in the manner of which he complains. As the House is already aware, a Select Committee was to be appointed at the instance of the Right Honourable Gentleman. I had agreed to the appointment of that Committee. It was of great importance that the steps to be taken upon the subject should be taken without further delay; and I, therefote, in the absence of the Right Honourable Gentleman, suggested that a friend of his, sitting on the same side of the House, should move the appointment of the Committee. The Honourable Baronet the Member for Stamford did not seem inclined to do so; and I therefore made the motion. As to having proposed any list of names to constitute that Committee, I have only to observe, that I did no such thing. If I had been guilty of anything of the sort, it could not be otherwise considered than as a departure from the usual courtesy prevailing amongst Members of the House, and quite contrary to the express understanding come to upon the subject. I can assure the Right Honourable Gentleman that when I saw the Votes this morning, I was as much surprised as he could be to find the names of a Committee inserted. The simple account of the transaction is this: I was sitting near my Honourable Friend the Member for Cheshire, and, as it was necessary to appoint a Committee, we each made out a list, intending to examine and arrange them at another time. One of these lists happened, inadvertently, to be left on the table of the House; it was taken up by one of the Gentlemen sitting there, who, supposing that it was a notice which I had given, inserted it in the Votes. I regret that such an occurrence has taken place; but I feel assured the House will see that I could have had no intention of doing anything unfair towards the Right Honourable Gentleman. I allow that there were grounds for requiring an explanation; and I am glad that the Right Honourable Gentleman has afforded me the opportunity of giving it. I admit, also, that the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite is fully entitled to the nomination of the Committee. Having thus given, publicly, that explanation which I have previously given in private, I trust the House will feel satisfied that nothing unfair has been intended.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I am happy to say, that the explanation which has just been given by the Right Honourable Gentleman is, to me, perfectly satisfactory.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND—NON-INTRUSION.

Mr. COLQUHOUN. — I wish to call the attention of the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies to a matter which is exciting the greatest possible interest in Scotland, — I mean the collision which has unfortunately taken place between the civil and ecclesiastical courts of that country; and in reference to the disputes which have taken place between them, I want to know from the Noble Lord whether or not it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose to Parliament a measure designed to allay those dissensions; and, if such a measure be contemplated, at what period the Noble Lord intends to state its outlines to the House?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, the subject certainly is one of very great importance; and it is at present under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, with a view to a satisfactory arrangement of all matters in dispute. I cannot promise to bring forward any measure, but I will shortly state the intentions of the Government on the subject.

Mr. COLQUHOUN. — Perhaps the Noble Lord will allow me to put another question. An impression has gone abroad, from what passed when the deputation waited on the Government, that not only was it intended to bring in a measure upon this subject, but that they would very speedily state to the House the outlines of their plan. I wish to ask whether that impression be an erroneous one, and whether the Government, having had the subject under consideration since the month of May last, have not yet been able to agree to any measure?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — The impression to which the Honourable Member refers is certainly a mistaken one. What I stated to the deputation was, that the Government were endeavouring to frame a measure on the subject; but that they would not bring one forward unless they were perfectly assured that it was calculated to produce beneficial results.

SIR R. PEEL. — I do hope that, as soon as Her Majesty's Government have made up their minds upon the subject, they will make known the result to the House; and that the House will be apprised of the intentions of the Government at least as soon as any deputations from Scotland. I have answered a great number of letters which I have received upon the subject, stating that I believed it to be the intention of Government to introduce a legislative measure with reference to the matters in dispute. It now appears that the Noble Lord is not prepared to say anything calculated to afford the least information; and that I have been in error when replying to the various letters which I have had occasion to answer upon this subject. All I now ask of the Noble Lord is, that as soon as the Government have made up their minds, he will give a distinct assurance, either that he intends to bring forward a measure of the nature referred to, or that he will abandon it.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I will endeavour to give the House every information on the subject as soon as possible.

CHURCH EXTENSION.

Mr. HAWES.—I wish to ask the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford at what time he proposes to introduce his measure for church extension; whether or not it involves a grant of public money; and also, whether the church extension which he contemplates is to be confined to England?

SIR R. INGLIS.—Sir, in reply to the first question of the Honourable Member for Lambeth, I beg to say, that it is my intention to bring forward the motion of which I have given notice as soon as possible after Easter. With respect to the second question, whether it involves a grant of the public money, I think that it requires much less sagacity than that possessed by the Honourable Member for Lambeth to see that church extension cannot be effected without a grant of public money; and, with respect to the third question, my reply is, that my motion has reference to England and Wales.

FRAUD ON THE REVENUE.

SIR W. JAMES. — I wish to call the attention of the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite (the President of the Board of Trade) to a paragraph which has appeared in the public papers respecting frauds committed upon the revenue, to the amount of 150,000*l.*, by persons taking goods from certain ports, where there are bonded warehouses, to other places, to re-bond them. I beg to ask whether there is any foundation for the statement, and whether the Right Honourable Gentleman has any information to communicate to the House on the subject?

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I have not seen the paragraph to which the Honourable Baronet refers, and can give no information on the subject.

CHURCH REVENUES IN CANADA.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — I understand that a Bill has passed the Legislature of Upper Canada, dividing the clergy reserves amongst all denominations of Christians, and allotting to the Church of England only one fourth part of that property. I wish to ask the Noble Lord whether the Bill has been received at the Colonial Office; and if so, how soon it will be laid on the table of the House?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — The Bill has not yet been received. Captain Pringle, who is expected with despatches, has been detained by contrary winds.

BERLIN REPORT.

Mr. HUME. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord if orders have been given for laying the Berlin Report before the House?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Yes.

MILLS AND FACTORIES.

LORD ASHLEY. — As I understand that Her Majesty's Government do not intend to oppose the motion of which I have given notice, and as I have so frequently addressed the House at considerable length on the subject, I will content myself with moving "That a Select Committee be appointed, to inquire into the operation of the Act for the regulation of mills and factories, and to report their observations and opinion thereupon to the House."

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I beg to second the motion.

Question put, and agreed to. Committee appointed.

JOHN DILLON.

On the motion of SIR FRANCIS BURDETT, petition of John Dillon (presented 24th January) read.

SIR F. BURDETT. — In rising to move "That a Select Committee be appointed, to inquire into the case of Mr. John Dillon, as stated in his petition, and to report their observations thereupon to the House," I will not detain the House at any great length, having, on former occasions, detailed the whole of the facts connected with the case. It must be in the recollection of the House, that Mr. Dillon, in the year 1822, held a situation in the coast guard; and that, by his vigilance, the revenue was materially benefited, he having been the means of preventing smuggling to a very great extent. In the course of that year, in the discharge of his duty, he sailed from Mill Cove, with the view of exercising and trying his crew. Shortly after his departure from the harbour, he discovered a vessel, which he suspected to be a smuggler, and gave chase to; but the night being dark and tempestuous, he was unable to board her; and even had that not been the case, his force was so much inferior, that it would have been exceedingly injudicious to make the attempt. He, however, pursued her as closely as possible; and his signal having been answered from the shore, the smuggler stood out to sea, in order, if possible, to escape before any reinforcement could arrive. In consequence, however, of the exertions of Mr. Dillon, the smuggler was obliged to take refuge in the harbour of Kinsale, where she was seized by the tide surveyor, to whom a very large portion of prize money was awarded on her condemnation. Mr. Dillon, about that time, took the command of a merchantman bound for the West Indies, having previously received a letter of thanks from the Treasury for his exertions on the occasion alluded to. Before he left this country, the owners of the vessel objected to the award which had been made, and carried the case before another tribunal; and Mr. Dillon, on his return, found that the tide surveyor had received upwards of 11,000*l.*, and that his own claim had been disregarded, on the ground that he had been guilty of cowardice in not boarding the vessel. Mr. Dillon prayed that an investigation might take place; and Lord Althorp suggested, that the question should be referred to Sir Edward Codrington, to ascertain whether Mr. Dillon had done his duty or not. Mr. Dillon at once assented to this proposition; and Sir Edward Codrington decided that Mr. Dillon's conduct had been highly creditable. Lord Althorp promised that a further investigation should take place; but, unfortunately, he only remained a short time in office, and nothing was afterwards done. It does not appear that there is the least imputation on the character of Mr. Dillon; and I think it extremely hard that he should be deprived of the reward to which the Government must consider him to be entitled; for they afterwards gave him 50*l.*, which they certainly would not have done had they considered him guilty of the charges brought against him. It has been urged, on former occasions, that the claim was not made until two years after the proper time; but really I think that if the conduct of Mr. Dillon has been fair and honourable, it ought not to be resisted on that ground. At all events, I hope the House will not refuse to appoint a Committee, in order that the subject may be fully investigated.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I am really sorry to have to trouble the House with any observations on this case, which has already been brought forward four or five times; and I do think that Mr. Dillon might be better employed than in attempting, by repeated applications, to obtain money from the Government. This transaction occurred so long ago as 1822; and I think that that fact is a strong objection to the appointment of a Committee in 1840. It appears that Mr. Dillon went out for the purpose of boarding the vessel; but that he did not succeed in so doing. He, however, prevented her from running her cargo; and she ultimately went into the port of Kinsale, where she was detained by the officer on that station. Upon this fact Mr. Dillon rests his claim; and the question is, whether that claim be well founded. I consider that he has no claim to any share in the capture of the vessel; and I believe that to be the opinion of every person who has fully considered the subject. Mr. Dillon, to a certain extent, has made the same admission; for he claimed, under a supposed order, the reward for having prevented the vessel from making the run; and when it turned out that there was no such order, his claim fell to the ground. From the year 1822 to 1829, Mr. Dillon made no application to the Treasury; and one ground for that long delay was stated to be the necessity of withholding, for a time, the proportion due to his crew, whose characters were very indifferent. He subsequently accounted for the delay, by his long absence in the West Indies. With respect to the reference to Sir Edward Codrington, I fully admit that the character of Mr. Dillon was cleared; but I contend that that is a point quite distinct from his claim for a portion of the prize money. I hold in my hand a letter from Lord Althorp to Mr. Dillon, stating that the delay of the claim from 1822 to 1829 was not satisfactorily accounted for; and that, "the money having been distributed, and the claim having been made so long after the transaction, the Treasury could come to no other decision, as to the case, than that which has been already come to." Mr. Dillon has stated that he received 50*l.* from the Treasury; but I beg to remark to the House, that it was not paid in consideration of his claim, and that it was no acknowledgment of its justice. The Treasury minute states that it was granted on account of Mr. Dillon's distressed condition, and the trouble to which he had been put in the investigation of his claim. I think the case has been amply investigated; for it has been fully gone into by several Governments, who have all come to the same conclusion; and I shall therefore give my decided opposition to the motion of the Honourable Baronet.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I conceive that, if this transaction had taken place only a short time ago, and the petitioner had now made his claim for the first time, it would have been utterly impossible to refuse him the compensation which he seeks, because the main facts alleged by him are not denied. It is not denied, that, in consequence of the attack which he made on the smuggler, she was compelled to run into Kinsale, where she was seized and condemned. This fact is clearly stated, in a speech made by Sir George Robinson in the Admiralty Court, when this case was under consideration. It was also stated, by the same learned gentleman, that this being a hostile vessel, and running into a situation where she could not avoid being captured, amounted, in law, to a capture. So that, by the admission of the counsel for the Crown, Mr. Dillon, having forced this vessel to run into harbour, where she was condemned, was thereby entitled to participate in the capture. It appears to me, that the only weak point in the case is this, that Mr. Dillon did not bring forward his claim at an earlier period. I think a poor officer of the coast guard may be readily excused for not having become a party to the suit in the Admiralty Court; which must of necessity be attended with considerable expense. But if Mr. Dillon did not appear before the Admiralty Court, he petitioned the Treasury, in 1828, at the time Mr. Dawson was Secretary. Mr. Dawson, in a letter, dated the 14th of April, 1838, addressed to Mr. Dillon, stated, that he felt great commiseration for his case; that the papers which had then been transmitted to him contained additional matter to those which came before him as secretary; that, when the board at that time decided the case, and confirmed the orders of preceding boards, it was because no new matter had been brought before them; but that it was by no means intended to close the inquiry if any new facts should come to light. And, as far as I recollect, such has been the substance of all the decisions come to. Now, I have not the least doubt that if Mr. Dillon had made the claim at an earlier period, it would have been admitted; and I cannot but think that the case is a proper one for the consideration of the Government, and that he ought to receive a portion of the money arising from the capture of the vessel. I think that, as Mr. Dillon was instrumental in the capture of the vessel, and the principal means, indeed, of effecting that capture, he is entitled to receive his fair share of the proceeds of such capture; and, in my opinion, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made out no case against that claim.

SIR FRANCIS BURDETT. — I do not think that any satisfactory reason has been assigned why this motion should not be agreed to. The only argument on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has relied is, the circumstance that this claim was so long deferred; but the delay has been accounted for in the petition presented by Mr. Dillon. It appears that, not wishing to lie out of his profession, he engaged himself, very shortly after the date of this transaction, in a vessel going to the West Indies; and this accounts for his absence during part of the period. But I do not think that the delay which has been relied on by the Treasury is a sufficient argument against this claim. It appears that the vessel which was made prize of, in this case, in attempting to run a cargo of smuggled goods into a harbour in Ireland, was driven back, and forced to take refuge in the harbour of Kinsale, where she was captured, having a large cargo on board. Now, if this capture, as I contend it was, was made by the means of Mr. Dillon, he was entitled to a large share of the proceeds. A notion may be formed of the extent of these proceeds, when I mention that one Custom House officer, as his share alone, received upwards of 11,000*l.* It cannot be doubted that the vessel was forced to run into the harbour of Kinsale by the great skill, boldness, and good arrangements of Captain Dillon. Upon this point I have the highest authority to support me. It was referred to Sir Edward Codrington to decide with respect to Mr. Dillon's conduct in this affair; and he declared that Captain Dillon had acted with spirit and judgment, and in a seaman-like manner. Other eminent men in the navy, amongst whom were Sir George Byam Martin and Sir R. Stopford, have expressed the same opinion. With respect to the objection as to time, I do not think time is any bar to the claim. I know that, in the trial of an officer, it would be no bar. In what has fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he has said nothing to impeach the statement of Mr. Dillon, as to the facts of his case. The only point he has been able to urge is, that a great deal of time had elapsed before making the claim. I cannot help thinking that, when once there is a decision against a man, the inhabitants of the Treasury — who are more wolves than sheep — are glad to seize upon an adverse decision, to save themselves the trouble of further inquiry; and to rely upon that decision, as conclusive in their own favour. I regret that the House is not more full; but I certainly feel bound to take the sense of the Gentlemen present upon this motion, by dividing the House upon it.

The House divided: — Ayes 15, Noes 42; Majority 27.

FIRST FRUITS AND TENTHS.

Mr. BAINES. — I rise to renew my motion for a Committee of the whole House, on the subject of the first fruits and tenths, for the purpose of making those payments more conducive than they have hitherto been to the augmentation of the livings of the poor clergy. Having, on a former occasion, shown that, from the first institution of these imposts, the payments were made according to their full amount, — having shown that this practice prevailed at the time of the Reformation, and that it was enforced by a strict valuation, made by order of King Henry VIII. — having further shown that, in the time of Queen Anne, these payments were conferred upon the church for the benefit of the poor clergy; and having shown that the sanguine expectations that were cherished of the vast advantages that would flow to these laborious ministers have been entirely frustrated, — I shall not again go over the ground I have already traversed, but state, as I am empowered to do, upon high legal authority, that the attempt to make the valuation of the livings, upon which the first fruits and tenths are paid, fixed and invariable, is inconsistent with the letter and the spirit of the Act of Queen Anne. Without occupying the attention of the House by detailed statements of legal opinions, I may say, that the balance of authority, as far as I can collect it, is decidedly in favour of the claims of those whom it was the intention of that Queen to serve; and that the amount of the increased value of the funds ought to have been applied by the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty to the relief of the poor clergy, whose interests, as faithful guardians, it was their duty to watch over. This is an opinion not entertained by lawyers only, but by the poor clergy, one of whom has sent to me a selected list of the rich livings, in various parts of the kingdom, merely as a specimen of others; and from which it appears that there are thirty-four livings, returned by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in the year 1835, as of the present value of 64,775*l.* a-year, but which stand valued, in the Liber Regis, on which the first fruits and tenths are paid, at 1014*l.* only. Without detaining the attention of the House to go through the list, I will satisfy myself with selecting three of the smallest and three of the largest of these livings, in order to show what was their value at the time of the Reformation; what is their real value at the present time; the sum paid as tenths by the rich clergy to the poor clergy; and the real tenths which would be due and payable upon the true value of each: —

Name of Living.	Valued at	Real Value.	Sum paid as Tenths.		Real Tenths.
Bilbury, Gloucestershire . .	13	1023	1	6	102
All Cannings, Wilts . .	31	1100	3	2	110
Chelsea, Middlesex . . .	13	1003	1	6	100
Winwick, Lancashire . .	102	3616	10	4	361
Stanhope, Durham . . .	67	4842	6	14	484
Doddington, Cambridgeshire .	22	7306	1	4	730

But it is not only the benefices, but the ecclesiastical sees, of the payments of which I have to complain; and I shall proceed to make a selection, showing the full annual value of four of the bishopricks at the present time; the sum paid as first fruits by each of those bishopricks, and the difference which is withheld from the poor clergy: —

Bishop.	Full Annual Value.	Paid as First Fruits.	Difference withheld from the Poor Clergy.
Bishop of London . .	13,929	901	13,029
Winchester .	11,151	2873	8,278
Exeter . .	2,713	450	2,263
Worcester .	6,569	929	5,640

The injustice that has been done to the poor clergy is felt, not only by lawyers and divines, but by statesmen also. I shall quote the sentiments of a Noble Lord, which I am sure will receive due respect from every Gentleman in this House; but particularly from those on the opposite benches. The speech to which I allude was delivered to his constituents by the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire at the last general election, when his Lordship, with his usual energy, declared that, —

> He (Lord Stanley) thought that the pluralities should be reformed, and that the wealth of the Church ought to be appropriated to raise the livings of the poor clergy, instead of being devoted to purposes comparatively useless. He shared this opinion in common with those of every class in society; and one of the first acts of Sir Robert Peel's Administration was, to issue a commission for the purpose of ascertaining whether, by deducting from the wealth of the large livings and adding to the poorer, the Church would not be placed in a position to be more available for the instruction of the poorer classes of the community.

But though all men agree, as his Lordship has observed, that pluralities ought to be reformed; that the wealth of the Church ought to be applied to raise the livings of the poor clergy; and that a portion of the income of the rich livings should be added to the poor ones; yet what was done in this way in the long reign of George III., and during the reign of George IV.? Nothing; absolutely nothing! — In confirmation of the assertion of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire, I might produce the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, presented to Parliament in 1835; from which it appears that there are nearly 2000 livings under the value of 100*l.* a-year; and yet the persons holding these benefices are required to sustain the rank of gentlemen. The Report stands thus: —

There are, in the Established Church of England and Wales, according to the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, —

	11	livings under	£10 a-year.
	19	— from	10 to £20 a-year.
	32	—	20 to 30 ditto.
	63	—	30 to 40 ditto.
	172	—	40 to 50 ditto.
Making . .	297	livings under	50 a-year.
There are .	305	— from	50 to £60 a-year.
	317	—	60 to 70 ditto.
	254	—	70 to 80 ditto.
	353	—	80 to 90 ditto.
	400	—	90 to 100 ditto.
Making . .	1926	livings under	100 a-year.
There are .	1602	— from	100 to £150 a-year.
And . .	1354	—	150 to 200 ditto.
So that there are	4882	livings under	£200 a-year.

Besides these, there are 5230 curacies varying from 40*l.* to 160*l.*, and averaging 81*l.* per annum each. From the same authority, it appears that there were, at the time of the presentation of that Report, 5728 bishopricks, dignities, and benefices, varying in value from 200*l.* to 20,000*l.* a-year. The scheme I shall submit to the House for the removal of these glaring irregularities is this: — First, to abolish the first fruits; second, to exempt all livings under the value of 300*l.* a-year from the payment, not only of first fruits, but also of tenths, after the next avoidance; and, third, to render all spiritual dignities and benefices in England and Wales, of the clear value of 300*l.* a-year and upwards, liable to the payment of the tenth part of the clear yearly value, after the next avoidance of such spiritual dignity or benefice. The plan recommended by the Select Committee which sat in the year 1837, of which my Honourable Friend the Member for Nottinghamshire (Mr. Gally Knight) was chairman, and of which I was a member, recommended that all benefices above the annual value of 300*l.* should make a yearly payment for the benefit of the poor clergy, upon the principle of the Irish Church Temporalities Bill, which advanced by a graduated scale from 2½ to 15 per cent. But I prefer the payment of tenths, partly because it has the sanction of law, and partly because it is of high antiquity, and in its name carries its amount and proportion. My Noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies, in his Ecclesiastical Duties and

Revenues Bill, proposes to apply 130,000*l.* a-year, on the next avoidance, from the dignitaries of the deans and chapters, to the augmentation of the livings of the poor clergy. But, as the operation of this fund would be very gradual, and would carry on the work of augmentation slowly, both the plan of the payment of the tenths and that of the Noble Lord would be necessary to produce the effect that I contemplate; and for this purpose, I have entered into calculations to ascertain the sum that would be requisite in order to increase the small livings to 200*l.* a-year; and the following is the result of that calculation: —

297 livings, from £10 to £50 will require . . .	£48,315
1602 — 100 to 150	120,150

Deduct sum proposed for augmentation by Lord John Russell's Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues Bill . .	130,000
Leaving a deficiency of	£273,680

From which it would appear, that the sum of 273,680*l.* a-year will be necessary to augment the small livings to the amount of 200*l.* a-year each; and for this sum I have provided, by appropriating the tenth part of the livings from 300*l.* a-year and upwards.

The total clear annual revenue of the Church, as appeared from the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, was	£3,439,767
Deduct for livings under £300 a-year, not chargeable . .	1,036,844
The tenths on which amount to	£240,292

to be augmented by the excess of tithe commutations over the amount returned by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, which was very considerable, and swelled the revenue of the Church, represented at 3,439,000*l.*, to 5,000,000*l.* Having laid these statements before the House, I shall, for the present, satisfy myself with moving the following resolution, which I confidently hope will receive the sanction of the House: — "That this House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to take into consideration the propriety of abolishing the first fruits of the revenues of the Church, and rendering the tenths conducive to the more efficient augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy."

Mr. G. KNIGHT. — In rising to second this motion, I trust it is superfluous to state that I am not actuated by any feelings hostile to the Church; but, on the contrary, by an earnest wish for her welfare. I desire to see an alteration take place, for two reasons, — the condition of the poor livings, and the injustice — I had almost said the absurdity — of the distribution of the present impost. As a proof of the necessities of the poor livings, I will only state that, to augment the small livings, with the population of 300 and upwards, so that their incomes shall range from 150*l.* to 400*l.* a-year, according to the number of inhabitants, would require an additional sum of 276,691*l.* a-year; whilst to augment all the small livings to 300*l.* a-year (no extravagant allowance for a man who has to live respectably and bring up a family) would take a much larger sum. From this it is evident that no plan which is already before the House would provide a remedy. But it is not on this ground alone that I advocate the present inquiry. I advocate it fully as much on the ground of the capricious distribution of the existing impost. With respect to the existing state of the law on this subject, I must say, that it appears to me to favour the inquiry; for, according to the last statute passed on this subject, the 1st of George I. c. 10., bishops are directed to inform themselves, from time to time, of the true, clear, improved annual value of every benefice in their respective dioceses, and to certify the same to the Governors of Queen Anne's bounty, with a view to the more speedy augmentation of the poor livings. But even admitting that, as the law now stands, first fruits and tenths are only to be exacted in such proportions and from such parties as at present, it will not be disputed that Parliament has the right to interfere with them, — and the rather, because Parliament has more than once interfered on this subject already; — in the reign of Henry VIII., in that of Anne, in that of George I.; and, after the lapse of a century, it can scarcely be said that it is too early a period to review the subject again, or that revisions at such a distance of time need excite a just apprehension of frequent and vexatious exactions. Nor let it be said that we have any innovation in view. Let it not be said, for it cannot be said with truth, that we are seeking, for the first time, to tax the clergy. The tax already exists; the clergy are taxed already, — but they are taxed unequally. The tax, in its present shape, possesses the worst defects by which a tax could be accompanied, — it is unequal, and it is unproductive. By the Act of Anne, 'all livings of or under the value of 50*l.* a-year were exempted from the payment of tenths, and livings above that value were to continue to pay first fruits and tenths, according to the valuation taken in the time of Henry VIII. I need not detain the House by pointing out the immense difference between the value of livings in the time of Henry VIII. and their actual value at present, or the consequent little proportion which the tenths bear to the real value of tenths. But the House will do well to consider how infinitely above the mark of exemption most of the 50*l.* livings of Queen Anne's time are now; and also in what different degrees the circumstances of different livings have been affected. The 50*l.* livings of Queen Anne vary at this time from 300*l.* a-year to 800*l.*, and even 1000*l.*; none of these pay tenths: but all livings have not been affected alike; and thus it may happen that livings of inferior value pay, whilst many of high value are exempt. Altogether, out of 10,498 benefices, with or without cure of souls, only 4808 remain liable to the payment of tenths; and that, as I have said before, according to their value in the time of Henry VIII. The consequence is, that the fund which was devoted by Queen Anne to the augmentation of small livings does not exceed 14,000*l.* a-year; and nothing can more fully demonstrate how inadequate this fund is to its object, and how slowly it has advanced that object, than the present state of the livings it was meant to improve. After the lapse of a century, notwithstanding the additional aid of large parliamentary grants and private benefactions, the fund arising from tenths, though it has done much good, has not been able to effect nearly as much as we all desire.

I frankly own that I have two objects greatly at heart, — first, to augment the small livings, so as to secure a resident clergy; secondly, to provide a permanent fund for the erection of new churches. It is no part of my scheme to pull down the large livings for the sake of producing an equality, which, for many reasons, I think undesirable. There are various modes by which the payment of tenths could be more equitably arranged. The strict interpretation of the letter would exact from each living the tenth of its actual value. But I have nothing of so stringent a nature in view. A more equitable distribution of the impost is my chief aim. I entirely concur with the Honourable Member for Leeds in the propriety of altogether abolishing first fruits, which have been always severely felt. The moment of entering upon a living is not the moment when an extraordinary payment should be demanded. We equally propose that no change should take place during the lives of the present incumbents. We equally propose that all benefices of or below the value of 300*l.* a-year should be exempt from the payment of first fruits and tenths. We equally propose that all benefices above the value of 300*l.* a-year should, on the next avoidance, become liable to the payment of tenths, and not according to their value in the King's books, but according to the valuation taken in 1831. The amount of the tax is the next question, — whether it should be uniform or graduated. The principle adopted in the case of the Irish livings was a graduated scale, beginning at 2*l.* 10*s.* per cent. on livings of 300*l.* a-year, and gradually augmenting to 12*l.* 12*s.* per cent. on livings of 1000*l.* a-year and upwards. Another proposal is, that livings above 300*l.* a-year and under 500*l.* should pay 5 per cent.; above 500*l.* and under 800*l.*, 7 per cent.; above 800*l.* and under 1200*l.*, 10 per cent.; and above 1200*l.*, 15 per cent. Both these propositions appear to me to be too severe. I repeat, I have no wish to interfere with the principle of inequality in the incomes of the clergy. I think it better that there should be different degrees in the Church, as in other professions. I think it is useful that there should be attractive prizes in the ecclesiastical lottery. If all paid, I should be satisfied if all paid alike; and I should wish the payment to be so moderate as neither to be oppressive to the smaller livings nor to the larger. Upon the whole, therefore, I would be satisfied if 3 per cent. were to be exacted from all benefices above 300*l.* a-year, according to the valuation taken in 1831. Moderate as this tax would be, it would still produce a considerable sum, infinitely more than is raised at present. First fruits and tenths now produce only 14,000*l.* a-year; 3 per cent. on all benefices above 300*l.* a-year would produce rather more than 65,000*l.* a-year, which would at least augment the poor livings in a much more rapid ratio. I would wish to commit the distribution of this sum to the Board of Queen Anne's Bounty. They would be just as equal to the distribution of the larger as of the smaller sum. I have every reason to believe that the board has worked well; and, by continuing the trust in the same honourable hands, we should avoid the expense of salaried commissioners. It may be objected, that by this new arrangement of the tax, we should interfere with the value of property, by augmenting the value of benefices below 300*l.* a-year, and diminishing, in some degree, the value of those above that mark. It cannot be denied that this would be the case. But where the spiritual instruction of the people is concerned, I look upon this objection as a secondary consideration. Advowsons, above all things, partake of the nature of a trust, and might be justly submitted to such regulations as would best carry the object of so sacred a trust into effect. I have now, I think, left nothing unexplained that I wish to propose. I thank the House for their indulgence, and I earnestly hope that the House will consent to go into committee on the subject. The object of the Committee would be — inquiry: in committee, any plan might be adopted which the House in its wisdom might prefer; but the inquiry should be entertained to meet the general and reasonable wish for a resident clergy, and, in some measure, to supply the deficiency of spiritual instruction to the people.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I do not wish to detain the House with many observations on a subject which has been so frequently discussed, and on which so many, more able to form a correct opinion, have pronounced against the scheme of the Honourable Member for Leeds. The Honourable Member says, that it is expedient that the clergy should be subjected to the payment of 10 per cent. on their incomes, for the purpose of contributing to improve the incomes of the poorer clergy. Now, I think the principle of the Honourable Member's proposition would just be as applicable to all other property as to the property of the Church, to which I contend it ought not to apply. It must be recollected that first fruits were originally a popish imposition; and I suppose the Honourable Gentleman is so enamoured of the Pope, that he wishes to make him the model for his future conduct. The Pope, finding the income arising from first fruits to be very small, attempted to raise the whole value of the first fruits, and render the fund more productive. Against this, however, the Parliament protested; and this, too, it should be recollected, in Roman Catholic times. When Henry VIII. had assisted in establishing the Reformation, he transferred this fund, which had hitherto been the Pope's, into his own treasury; and this monarch was contented to receive a fixed payment: but he was more lenient than the Pope. Sir, will any one say that those livings which in former times were exempted from payment, should now be called upon to be taxed for this purpose? True, many of these livings have increased in value; but in the same way, in many instances, landed property has risen in value; and would the owners of that property think it just to call on them to make a contribution from that property, in proportion to its increased value? The Crown never attempted to interfere with this property, even in the most difficult times, when the Crown often laid its hands on what it had not a right to, as well as on what it had a right to. My Honourable Friend (Mr. Gally Knight), in referring to the Act of George I., has drawn an inference which the wording of that Act does not justify. The Act of George I. was passed with a totally different object. It required that every bishop should, from time to time, certify the value of every living in his diocese. But this was not enacted with a view to tax these livings on their improved value, but in order that, from time to time, the small livings should be augmented. All livings under 50*l.* per annum were exempted by statute from all payment on account of church rates; and I do not see how there can be any just right to impose a tax on those clergy who have been hitherto exempted. Henry VIII. left this charge at the amount at which it had been fixed by the Pope; and no succeeding monarch has attempted to raise that amount. The question is, will you consent to impose a general tax, which must include a class of individuals hitherto exempted from this taxation? I think the proposition is open to grave and serious objection. I object, also, to another principle of the Honourable Member for Leeds, namely, his attempt to equalise livings. I do not think the principle of equalisation at all desirable, especially in the Church. It is not found in the other professions, — the army, the navy, or the law, — nor does it exist in the main body of our society. Fortunately, it does not; for inequality of condition is the greatest impulse to exertion; and a contrary state would only tend to produce indolence and want of exertion. I think, with respect to the clergy, if they were reduced to an equal scale, in point of condition, that, humanly speaking, a great stimulus to exertion would be gone. I am sure that higher motives would be found to actuate them; but when laymen are about to legislate, they cannot put out of their minds all consideration of those motives which are found to actuate mankind in general. I think there is another objection, — that such a plan might influence young men in the choice of a profession, and make them consider whether another profession might not offer them more advantages. Having argued this question, on various occasions, I will not further intrude on the House, than merely to state, that, on these grounds, I am opposed to this motion.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I will state very shortly to the House my reasons for not agreeing to the motion of my Honourable Friend behind me. I think the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite has stated very truly, that, according to law, there exists no right, on the part of Parliament, to consider the first fruits or tenths of the Church as applicable to the maintenance of the poorer clergy. That, however, is the supposition on which my Honourable Friend founds his motion; and it seems to be supposed by him, also, that because, in the time of Henry VIII. and Queen Anne, the funds of the Church were applied in this manner, this right still exists. The only right, however, which exists, in my opinion, is what the Act of Anne gives; and whatever may have been the conduct of the Pope in regard to these matters, the Act of Parliament fixed the right of the clergy; and whatever they were entitled to receive, under the interpretation given to that Act, they are now entitled to receive, and no more. From all the best authorities that I have been able to consult, they have no claim in law beyond that. There is one point, however, on which I cannot concur in the reasoning of the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite. I do not think it to be either unadvisable or unjust to raise a general tax, to a certain amount, for the purpose of increasing the smaller livings. The Right Honourable Gentleman argues that one class of the clergy ought not to be taxed for the benefit of another; but I cannot go along with him in his reasoning, that it would be either impolitic or unjust to tax the richer livings for the benefit of the poorer clergy, provided that the enforced payment be neither exorbitant nor oppressive; and if, as I believe, the Church would be benefited by it, I think that would be a sufficient argument in its favour. As regards the suggestion of the Honourable Member for Nottinghamshire, — namely, to put a tax of 3 per cent. on all livings of 300*l.* per annum and upwards, — I do not think it unfair in itself, nor adverse to the best interests of the Church. But I think, notwithstanding, that the tax proposed is one to which many persons might object upon principle, and which would certainly be also unpalatable to the general body of the clergy. If we look to the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, it will be found that there are several parishes where the population does not exceed 30 or 40 individuals. It is reasonable that the incomes of these livings should be small; but they are often held in conjunction with other livings. I therefore think it unadvisable that we should enter on the subject in a General Committee of the House, for the reasons stated, as well as because I think that notice should be given to the whole body of the clergy. On these grounds, I am not prepared to go with my Honourable Friend on this occasion. The matter of this motion has been so fully discussed before, that I shall not detain the House longer. However, I may say, before I sit down, that there are several measures now before Parliament which render it inexpedient to discuss this more largely, inasmuch as they provide for very nearly the same purposes as that proposed by my Honourable Friend. I shall, therefore, not vote with my Honourable Friend on this occasion.

Mr. G. VERNON HARCOURT. — I feel it my duty to deny the assertion of the Honourable Member for Leeds, that the higher clergy are violating their duty in respect of Queen Anne's bounty, and withholding from the poorer clergy that which of right belongs to them. The bishops have no more power over that fund than the Honourable Member himself; and this the Honourable Gentleman knows perfectly well, though the whole object of his speech seemed to be to cast odium on the superior clergy. Though I am not opposed to any fair augmentation of small livings, I shall oppose the motion, because I do not consider that is its purpose. With respect to giving my support to any measure for the abolition of cathedral sinecures that may be brought forward, I wish to guard myself, as being supposed to be pledged in respect of the support of any measure that goes to interfere with the right of private patronage. I do not question the Honourable Member's right to interfere in matters of this kind; but I am sure the clergy would be better disposed to allow the present disposition of church property to remain as it is, than to owe any advantage to such means as those proposed.

Mr. HORSMAN. — I must protest against the doctrine broached by the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite this night, that, instead of giving a competent income to every clergyman, on which he might be able to live respectably, it is desirable to render the stipends of the clergy unequal, in order to offer a temptation to persons to enter the Church as a matter of speculation. The Right Honourable Gentleman distinctly stated, that these inequalities should be supported, in order that those who enter the Church might have them to look forward to, — a doctrine against which I must enter my protest; and having had many opportunities of seeing the way in which the clergy of Scotland perform their duty, without the existence of any such invidious inequalities as these, I must say, that I think we ought not to admit of any such, in order to induce persons who enter the clerical profession to do their duty. The doctrine of the Right Honourable Gentleman is certainly not one which ought, in my opinion, to be heard in this House.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I wish, in explanation, merely to state, that, as a general principle, I consider inequalities in any class of the community, an evil. With respect to the clergy, all I intended to convey was, that if a young man, in choosing a profession, were to see that in any particular one there was a prospect of advancement, he would naturally look to that profession as the best for him to adopt.

Mr. ANDREW WHITE. — But for the remarks of the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Goulburn), it was not my intention to have taken any part in this discussion. Although equalising the incomes of the clergy might (as the Right Honourable Gentleman has said) be an evil; yet the monstrous inequality now existing is a greater evil. The Returns laid before Parliament in 1834 stated the annual revenue of the Church to be about 3,800,000*l.*; but this is now understood to have been an under estimate: the sum must be, at least, 4,000,000*l.* Out of this large sum, about 6000 curates receive, on an average, 80*l.*; but some hundreds receive under 50*l.* There are nearly 5000 benefices averaging only 110*l.* The total amount paid to those 11,000 working clergy is under 1,000,000*l.*, leaving the clerical aristocracy 3,000,000*l.* per annum. I contend that the whole of this property should be sacredly devoted to the spread of Christian knowledge; and that its present distribution is derogatory to the Established Church, and calculated to alienate from it, more and more, the affections of the people. The working clergy are entitled to the sympathy of every philanthropist. Many of them, after having their feelings refined by a liberal education, are compelled to accept of a remuneration not exceeding the wages of a gentleman's butler. The Honourable and Gallant Member for Oxfordshire has taunted the Honourable Member for Leeds, that, as a Dissenter, he should not interfere in church matters; but I believe the country highly appreciates the untiring exertions of my Honourable Friend, in behalf of the poorer clergy; and also the labours of the large and increasing body of non-conformist ministers, who are successfully endeavouring to promote the moral and religious improvement of the people.

Mr. BAINES. — The Honourable Member for the hundred of Bassetlaw says, that my motive in bringing this question forward is, to cast odium upon the clergy; but if the Honourable Gentleman were to see the letters from clergymen, upon this subject, which I have in my possession, he would form a different opinion, no doubt; as he would, then, the better be able to judge of the difference between the condition of the rich and the poorer clergy. He also seems to wish to impress a principle on this House, to which I am by no means disposed to submit. I will not, whether I am a Dissenter or not, yield my right to bring forward a motion of this description in this House; and I can assure the Honourable Gentleman, that I will never relax in my vigilant exertions to effect the object I therein have in view. I have as much right as any other Member of this House to make such a motion; and although it is not the first time the Right Honourable Gentleman has treated my motion in this manner, I can assure him I will not be restrained from doing that which I consider my duty. If the Honourable Gentleman thinks to put me down by these means, all I can tell him is, that he has very much mistaken his man. Honourable Gentlemen have spoken of this question as a matter of law; but their opinions upon the matter differ from those of Lord Eldon, of Mr. Agar, the late Queen's counsel, and of Sir John Newport. The Right Honourable Gentleman opposite says, "Give us the authorities on the other side." Now, one of those authorities is certainly a high one — namely, Lord Plunket: but there was also Lord Grey, a man of most honourable mind, among them; and there is no doubt that he was misled, in forming his judgment upon this subject, by the supposition that the authorities were decided upon the point. I admit, that they are, to a certain extent, conflicting. The Act says, "Wherever there is a doubt give it in favour of the poor curates:" but, let me ask, has that ever hitherto been the case? It appears to me, that the authorities are in favour of the poor curates; and as the charter of Queen Anne is in their favour, I certainly think they ought to have the benefit of any improvement in these revenues. There is one point on which I have been misunderstood, which is this; that I am accused of a wish to put the richer and poorer clergy on a perfect equality. Now, I really never intended or proposed any such thing as to put the incomes of all the clergy upon a footing of equality; and my object simply is, to provide that the income of none of the poorer clergy shall be less than 200*l*.

[Cries of "Divide!"]

Mr. G. V. HARCOURT. — I merely rise to say, in explanation, that the Honourable Member has quite misunderstood me, in supposing that I dispute his right, as a conscientious Dissenter, to bring forward such a motion as this, if he pleases.

The SPEAKER. — The question is, "That this House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to take into consideration the propriety of abolishing the first fruits of the clergy in England and Wales, and the more effectually rating and the better collection of the tenths applicable to the augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy."

The House then divided: — Ayes 38, Noes 17; Majority 21.

The House then went into committee; Mr. Aglionby in the chair.

Mr. BAINES. — I will not now detain the House by any further discussion, but simply content myself with moving two resolutions for the adoption of the Committee. The first resolution, and which I will now submit to the Committee, is as follows: — "That it is expedient to make provision for the abolition of first fruits and tenths of the clergy, as at present enforced in England and Wales, after the next avoidance; and in lieu thereof, to levy an annual assessment of one tenth part of the clear annual value upon all archbishopricks and bishopricks, and upon all dignities, benefices, and other spiritual promotions above the clear yearly value of 300*l*.; to be applied, in the first instance, to the augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy; and, afterwards, to the building and rebuilding of churches, and such other purposes as may conduce to the interests of religion."

Question put.

Mr. GOULBURN. — Is it the intentin of the Honourable Member to bring in a Bill?

Mr. BAINES. — It is; and my next resolution is to that effect.

Mr. GOULBURN. — Then I will not give the House the trouble of dividing again on the present occasion.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. BAINES. — Before I move the next resolution, I hope I may propose to the Honourable Member for North Nottinghamshire to bring in, with me, a Bill, founded upon the resolution to which the House has just agreed?

Mr. GALLY KNIGHT. — I fear I must decline the honour of bringing in the Bill, on the ground that I think the tenth too large a proportion of the revenue to be paid by the clergy.

Mr. BAINES. — The resolution I have now to move, Sir, is, "That a Bill be brought into Parliament, grounded on the foregoing resolution."

The resolution was put, and agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN then reported progress; and the House resumed.

OFFICIAL PENSIONS.

Mr. HUME. — I beg to move, Sir, for a Return of the amount of money paid as pension to each person under the Acts 57 Geo. III. c. 65., and 6 Geo. IV. c. 90., from the passing of them up to this time; stating the amount paid in each year to each person, and the total amount to each person; also, of the aggregate charge to the public for those pensions in each year to the present time, and the total paid.

Agreed to.

PROOF SPIRITS.

Mr. BAINBRIDGE. — I beg to move, Sir, for an account of the total gallons of proof spirits distilled in England, Scotland, and Ireland, respectively; distinguishing the quantities produced from malt, and from a mixture of malt and unmalted grain, or from any other ingredient; showing, also, the total quantity of each sort in the United Kingdom, for the year ending the 5th day of January, 1840.

Account of the number of gallons of proof spirits (distinguishing the sorts) on which duty was paid for home consumption in each of the three kingdoms, with the rate per gallon, and amount of such duty; also, the total of gallons and duty in the United Kingdom, for the year ending the 5th day of January, 1840.

Account showing, under separate heads, the number of gallons of proof spirits (distinguishing the materials from which made) imported into each kingdom from each of the others respectively, and including, in the cases of England and Scotland, those conveyed either by land or sea; stating, also, the rate of duty per gallon, and the total amount thereof in each case, and what portion of such duty was paid on removal of the spirits from bond, and what after their arrival at the place of destination, for the year ending the 5th day of January, 1840.

Account of the total number of gallons of proof spirits permitted out from distillers' stocks in England, and the total number of gallons proof of British brandy and spirits of wine permitted out from rectifiers' stocks in England, for the year ending the 5th day of January, 1840; also, the stocks remaining in the hands of English distillers on the 5th day of January, 1840.

Account of the total number of proof gallons of rum, brandy, Geneva, and all other spirits, that paid duty in each kingdom, from the 5th day of January, 1839, to the 5th day of January, 1840; rate of duty per gallon, and amount thereof; total number of gallons of each kind, and total duty thereon; total number of gallons of all kinds, and total duty thereon, for the United Kingdom: showing the total number of proof gallons of all kinds that paid duty, and total amount thereof, in each kingdom; and total number of gallons, and total duty thereon, in the whole of the United Kingdom, from the 5th day of January, 1839, to the 5th day of January, 1840.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I beg to move the Order of the Day for bringing up the Report on the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — Sir, as my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland has some amendments which he wishes to have inserted in this Bill before the Report is received, I will now propose, with the view of saving you, Sir, considerable trouble and inconvenience, that the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of having all the amendments inserted at once before the Report is brought up. I move, therefore, that this Bill be now recommitted.

The motion was agreed to, and the House went into committee upon the Bill; Mr. M. O'Ferrall in the chair.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I have a motion to submit, Sir, with respect to the 101st clause of this Bill. By Clause 100. commissioners are to nominate and give salaries to certain officers. The Clause 101. is in the nature of a proviso to the foregoing one; and my object is to secure the omission from that proviso of the words "other than such as shall usually have been appointed." My object, in proposing that these words be struck out, is, that it appears that there should be a check placed on the new town councils, as to the creation of new officers, and the salaries to be given them. For instance, if you take the city of Dublin out of the control of the Lord Lieutenant, in the Bill, as it now stands, there is nothing to prevent the town council from giving to any future lord mayor of that city any amount of salary whatever. I by no means wish to check the town councils from giving their officers a proper salary; but I do say that such salary is a matter which ought to be submitted to the Lord Lieutenant for his approval. My wish is, to check the unlimited power which is given to the town councils to vote out of the means of the corporations any sums they may choose; and to give the Lord Lieutenant a controlling power in this respect. The Lord Mayor of Dublin has at present a salary of 500*l.* a-year, paid out of a particular rate; and this Bill will take that away from him, and, at the same time, provide for his remuneration in another way. I do not see why the Noble Lord should not let these words be struck out, and why this, as well as every other case, should not be submitted to the ultimate control of the Lord Lieutenant. I therefore move, Sir, the omission, in Clause 101., of the words "other than such as shall usually have been appointed."

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I think that this clause, as it stands, draws a very fair distinction between any new offices that may come under some new controlling power, and those old offices which have existed from time immemorial, and over which the corporate body has exercised a jurisdiction. The amendment proposed by the Honourable and Gallant Member implies, in my opinion, a suspicion and distrust of the new corporations, to which I will not make myself a party; and, in addition to this, I think it is both unnecessary and offensive.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I must say, that I do not think that the observations of the Noble Lord afford any answer whatever to the proposition of my Honourable and Gallant Friend. I do not see that the amendment of my Honourable and Gallant Friend throws any greater light of suspicion upon the new corporations than the clause itself, which provides various checks; and I agree in the propriety of giving the Government in Ireland a control over any extravagant application of the public money. The liberality of people in Ireland is such that they are always more disposed to err on the side of extravagance than on that of economy.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I can assure the Noble Lord that I have not the slightest intention of casting any imputation on these new officers, and that my only object is, to place the salaries, to be appropriated under the new Bill, under the control of the Lord Lieutenant.

Mr. PIGOT. — The effect of this amendment is, that it will go much further than even the intention of the Honourable and Gallant Member himself; for it will not only restrict the salaries of these officers, but it will restrict the corporation from appointing officers at all. It will prevent the new corporations from re-appointing any of the old officers, or appropriating their salaries, without the approval of the Lord Lieutenant; so that the appointment of every officer who has been appointed from the granting of the charter to the present time would have to be brought under the consideration of the Lord Lieutenant and the council. In my opinion, the amendment is not merely unnecessary and offensive, but it is calculated to do away with all the benefit of the measure.

The question, "That the words be left out of the clause," was then put, and negatived, without a division.

Mr. O'CONNELL (to the Treasury benches). — Are we to go on with these clauses now?

[An observation was here addressed to the Honourable and Learned Member, in an under tone, by VISCOUNT MORPETH and Mr. PIGOT.]

Mr. GOULBURN. — The Noble Lord and the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin seem to understand each other very well; but we on this side of the House are left in perfect ignorance of what is going forward.

LORD MORPETH. — What I was saying was simply this, that if the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin wished to propose any new clauses, now was the time for him to come forward and state what his proposition was.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I appeal to the House whether some question has not passed between the Honourable and Learned Member and the Treasury benches as to who has got the clauses that are to be proposed.

LORD MORPETH. — Then, the Honourable Gentleman has entirely mistaken what passed.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin certainly addressed himself to the Solicitor General to know whether he was to propose the clauses. The thing was quite plain.

Mr. PIGOT. — The clauses which it was intended to introduce have been printed with the Votes of the House, and the observation which I made was directed to this circumstance. The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin appears not to have been in the House when the Noble Lord near me suggested that, instead of the amendments being proposed distinctly and separately, the Bill should be re-committed, for the purpose of having them printed. It was this that I was explaining to the Honourable and Learned Member, — and that is all.

Mr. GOULBURN.—The request which I make is a very humble one, — simply to know what the substance of the clause is. Perhaps, however, we are so few on this side of the House that we are not entitled to have that curiosity gratified.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Your curiosity might have been gratified this morning, for my amendments have been printed with the Votes; and all I wanted to know from the Solicitor General was, whether he was going on with the clauses of which he had given notice, or whether I should go on with mine? I will now state, that it is my wish to introduce two new clauses into this Bill; one after Clause 207., and another after Clause 208. I think that one of the objects of this measure ought to be to prevent, as far as possible, the excitement of those feelings of resentment which will naturally exist under the circumstances, and which must, of necessity, arise from transitions such as this Bill will create. The new corporations will have the power of removing existing officers from their situations. This was the case with the English Bill; but the English Bill, at the same time, removed officers without giving them immediate remuneration. Now, it is well known that the old officers of these corporations are great political partisans; and it will be in the power of the new officers, on coming in, to expose them to many very serious annoyances; and what I am anxious to do is, to give those officers the power of resigning within three months after the first election of councillors; and that, if they choose to resign within that period, they shall not go without being entitled to compensation. I beg to move, therefore, that the following clause be inserted in the Bill, after Clause 207.: — "And whereas it is desirable that every officer of any borough named in the said Schedule A, to this Act annexed, who shall be in any office of profit at the time of passing this Act, and who may be subject to removal from his office under the provisions thereof, should have the power to resign within a limited period:

Be it enacted, that it shall and may be lawful to and for every such officer, within the period of three calendar months next after the first election of councillors in such borough, under the provisions of this Act, to resign any office of profit which he may hold in such borough; and every such officer who shall or may so resign his said office shall be entitled to compensation in like manner as if he had been removed from his office under the provisions of this Act, anything before contained to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding."

COLONEL VERNER. — In the absence of an Honourable Friend, whose intention it was to have seconded this clause, I will second it myself; and I hope that, coming from the quarter it does, it will meet with the favourable acceptance of the Noble Lord opposite. The clause, indeed, contains nothing more or less than a principle of common justice; inasmuch as most of the persons who will be affected by it have held offices in the existing corporations for many years: and although they may, in several instances, not require compensation; yet, if this clause be not inserted, many of them may be so circumstanced as to wish to resign, and still have no means of obtaining remuneration. Again, as has been observed, their situations might be made so disagreeable to them that they could not, on any account, continue to hold them. There is one individual, who, I understand, has been connected with the corporation of Dublin for fifty years, and has held office during the whole of that long period with credit to himself and advantage to the public. Now, if this gentleman should, after his long and meritorious services to his fellow citizens, be desirous to resign, he and his family might, however unjustly, fail to obtain that remuneration to which they are entitled. This clause involves a principle of common justice; and I should like to see it, as well as the other clause about to be proposed by the same Honourable and Learned Member, embodied in the clauses of the Honourable and Learned Solicitor General opposite.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — It is only common justice to give these persons the power of resigning, if they please. In this I agree with the Honourable and Learned Member and my Honourable and Gallant Friend. I cannot, however, help calling the attention of the House to the evidence we here have of the truth of the argument which has been so frequently used with respect to this Bill,— namely, that it will transfer the whole power in these boroughs from one party to the other.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I am sorry that the Honourable and Gallant Member has given that qualifying addition to his support of this clause. The transfer that will be created by this measure will be from a limited number to the citizens at large; and the moneys they will have the control of do not come out of any public fund, but out of the corporate revenues of the borough; so that the public cannot suffer any loss by the change of hands.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — It seems that there is a much better understanding between the Honourable and Learned Gentleman and the Honourable and Gallant Gentleman opposite, upon the subject of this amendment—— — than there is between the Honourable and Learned Gentleman and the Government; for I confess that I feel great difficulty about the clause. In the first place, it seems to take for granted that there will be, in most cases, an entire difference between the parties holding offices in the new corporations and the existing officers; and, in the next place, the clause appears to be calculated to lead to some agreement or bargain between the different parties in the corporations, by which large compensation will be given to particular persons, in order to obtain the appointment to the offices which they hold; so that a great additional expense will be imposed upon the inhabitants. I think the clause is liable to that interpretation, and that it will necessarily lead to the introduction of other clauses; and I therefore am not prepared to agree to it.

Mr. HUTTON. — I must say, that I take the same view as the Noble Lord has done of the clause now proposed by my Honourable and Learned Colleague.

The clause was then put, and negatived.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I hope that the Government will not resist the next clause I have to propose. They have admitted the claims of Mr. Dickinson and of the sword bearer and marshal of Dublin to compensation; and the four junior aldermen of that city have precisely the same claim. The Lord Mayor is allowed a compensation for his expectancy of the office of president of the Court of Conscience; and each of the four junior aldermen would, in rotation, become Lord Mayor, as certainly as the present Lord Mayor would become president of the Court of Conscience if this Bill were not to pass. The office of alderman, too, let it not be forgotten, is one of considerable dignity, inasmuch as aldermen are, ex officio, magistrates; but that office is taken from them by this Bill. The compensation, too, which I wish to secure to them comes out of the funds of the corporation; so that the public would lose nothing; and this clause really proposes nothing more than what is an act of common justice to these individuals. I will, therefore, Sir, move that the following clause be inserted after Clause 208.: " And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the town council of the borough of Dublin to grant compensation to each of the present four junior aldermen of the city of Dublin, one fourth of the amount of the average profits received, as judge or president of the Court of Conscience in Dublin, by each person who, for the five years ending the 29th day of September, in the year 1838, served the office of Lord Mayor of the said city, or by his deputy; and each such junior alderman shall verify, on oath, to such town council, a statement of such profits, in lieu of the statement hereinbefore required to be made of the amount received by the person claiming compensation, or his predecessors."

Question put.

COLONEL VERNER. — After the fate of the last clause, and in the present thin state of the House, I consider it almost useless to press this amendment, as the two Noble Lords opposite appear determined, or have their instructions, to resist every amendment that has any connection with this side of the House.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — The argument of the Noble Lord on the last clause does not apply to this. I hope the Noble Lord will take into consideration the very heavy expenses to which these persons are exposed; and I really think, under the circumstances of the case, that the Honourable and Learned Member has laid before the House irresistible grounds for the adoption of this clause.

Mr. PIGOT. — I do not know what the Honourable and Gallant Gentleman means, when he talks of the Noble Lords near me having received instructions to oppose these clauses. I conceive that the cases now put forward by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman are widely different from that of the Lord Mayor, and from those other cases to which he referred, and in which it clearly appeared, that the parties had an insurable interest in the offices which they hold. At the same time, I do not say that there might not be some claim for compensation in these cases. I will, therefore, not directly oppose the clause now offered, but will propose to amend it in this way,—"That it shall be lawful for the town council of the borough of Dublin to grant, by way of compensation, to each of the four junior aldermen of the city of Dublin, such sum (not exceeding one fourth of the amount of the average profits received, as judge or president of the Court of Conscience in Dublin, by each person who, for the five years ending the 29th of September, in the year 1838, served the office of Lord Mayor of the said city, or by his deputy), as to such town council, or to the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, on appeal, shall seem to be just; and further, that if it shall appear that any of the said four aldermen shall have received or acquired any title to any sum or benefit since the month of August, 1839, which ought justly to be taken into account in estimating such compensation, the same shall be considered, in fixing the amount of compensation, as extinguishing his claim or reducing its amount." To the clause thus guarded, I shall not object.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I am afraid the words of this proviso are so vague and general, that they would lead to embarrassment; and I do not know if I ought to accept a clause of so indefinite a character. I should wish to know whether it is intended by this clause to give the aldermen a right of appeal to the Commissioners of the Treasury?

Mr. PIGOT. — Yes.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — If that be so, it is difficult to quarrel with this limitation. I repeat, however, that I am afraid of the generality of the terms of the latter proviso. Is the remuneration to be confined to pecuniary benefit?

Mr. PIGOT. — The words of the proviso are, "any sum or benefit which ought justly to be taken into account."

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I think it would be requisite to insert the word "pecuniary."

Mr. PIGOT. — I have no objection.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — There seems to be some suspicion on the mind of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, that the corporation may vote away the pipe water debentures, or something of that kind; but I think the previous Act will prevent the corporation from disposing of this property. I wish not to affect to give compensation with one hand, and withhold it with the other.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I certainly think the proviso will operate suspiciously against the aldermen, and that it will injure their characters to an extent not to be compensated by any pecuniary remuneration. It would be better to reject the clause altogether. If the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has any ground of suspicion, let him state it to the House, or else leave the clause in its present state.

Mr. HUTTON. — I thought the clause, in the first instance, highly objectionable; because I consider these gentlemen have no right to call for any such provision. They knew, when they solicited the office, that a Bill had passed this House for the abolition of corporations; and therefore they can have no claim, in fact or in any way whatever, to any compensation for any imaginary loss. Where a proposition is wrong in principle, no amendment can set it right; and if I go out with only one supporter, I will certainly divide the House.

Mr. PIGOT. — I had not the least intention of casting any reflection on the aldermen. My anxiety was, that we should not set a precedent for further demands.

COLONEL PERCEVAL.—My object has been fully answered by the declaration of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman.

Hr. HUME. — I hope the word "pecuniary" will be inserted.

Mr. PIGOT. — It is already inserted.

Question put, — "That the clause, as amended, be added to the Bill."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 30, Noes 10; Majority 20.

Clause added.

Mr. BLAKE. — I propose to omit the proviso at the end of the 106th clause, relating to the pilot of Galway. On several occasions, I have been intrusted with petitions complaining of the losses occasioned in the bay of Galway, by the insufficient number of pilots; and I trust the Honourable and Learned Gentleman will consent, for the present, to strike out this proviso. I think the vested right of the pilot will be protected in the same way that the rights of other parties are guarded in the compensation clause.

Mr. PIGOT. — I certainly do not feel at liberty to abandon this proviso; for, up to the present time, it has never been complained of. The object of it is, to secure to the individual holding the office the continuance of that office during his life. I propose to amend the clause, so that it shall place him under sufficient control, and give to the Government, when he shall vacate the office, the power to make new regulations.

Mr. BLAKE. — I cannot see why Galway should be deprived of the privilege of having pilots appointed in the same manner as they are appointed at other ports. I do not wish to make use of any offensive expressions; but I cannot see any honest motive for introducing this proviso, which will certainly make the Bill very unpopular in the town which I have the honour to represent.

LORD MORPETH. — I cannot consent to omit the proviso, without making some inquiry. The words of my Honourable and Learned Friend leave the office open to subsequent improvements.

Mr. BLAKE. — I cannot imagine why the new corporation of Galway should not have the appointment in the same manner the old corporation had.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — It appears to me that the opposition to striking out the proviso is not very decided, and perhaps the Noble Lord will consider the propriety of doing so before the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. — If the Noble Lord can give any good reason for placing Galway in a different position from other ports, I will not object to the proviso.

LORD MORPETH. — I think the proposition now made is quite fair, and I will make further inquiry.

Mr. BLAKE. — Under these circumstances, I am perfectly satisfied.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, I hope there will be no objection to the printing of the Bill with the amendments, and I propose to take the third reading on Monday next.

The House resumed.

Bill reported; to be read a third time on Monday next. Bill, as amended, to be printed.

PRINTED PAPERS — CASE OF MR. SHERIFF EVANS.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — I wish to make a communication to the House relative to the case which I brought under consideration yesterday. I have been informed that Mr. Freeman has felt it desirable to obtain the benefit of another medical opinion; and that Mr. Sheriff Evans has this day received a professional visit from Dr. Chambers.

who is now in attendance; and if it be the pleasure of the House to examine that gentleman, I will move that he be called in. I have not, myself, seen Dr. Chambers; but I cannot but feel that his evidence may be of importance in putting the House in possession of the real facts of the case. I assure the House, in all sincerity, that it is with an anxious desire that the facts should be fairly and fully stated, that I have, at the request of the medical gentleman who was examined yesterday, and of whom I have received a very high character, thought it right to bring the matter before the House. I will now move that Dr. Chambers be called to the bar, and examined as to the state of the health of Mr. Sheriff Evans.

Upon the question being put,—

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said:—I certainly do not see the necessity for any further proceeding in this case. It appears to me that the evidence which we received yesterday at the bar was fully sufficient to enable us to decide the question with regard to Mr. Sheriff Evans. I was not previously acquainted with the name of the gentleman who attended yesterday; but I have been told that he is a person of considerable professional skill and reputation. That gentleman stated, from his knowledge of Mr. Sheriff Evans's state of health, various particulars, showing, undoubtedly, that Mr. Sheriff Evans was in bad health; but he stated nothing to show that he was in any immediate danger from his confinement, nor did it appear that Mr. Freeman had thought it necessary to advise any extraordinary assistance to be called in. There is another circumstance which I think of a very conclusive nature, in addition to the evidence given yesterday,—I mean the appearance of an advertisement in the newspapers of this day, stating that Mr. Sheriff Evans is quite ready, should he now be discharged from custody, to go at once and to canvass the electors of Lewes——

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I really think, if we were to proceed, in this case, to discharge the sheriff, no one would seriously imagine that it was done on the ground of fear of injury to his health; but it would be supposed that we wished to escape the consideration and settlement of the real question at issue. I therefore see no reason for proceeding further in this matter; and I hope the Noble Lord will not think it necessary to press his motion.

SIR R. INGLIS.—When the Noble Lord states that he is satisfied with the evidence of yesterday, as to the state of Mr. Sheriff Evans's health, I should have thought the Noble Lord would have been ready to agree to the other motion of my Noble Friend for the discharge of the sheriff. Now, what is the ground which the Noble Lord takes? He says, "I am satisfied, from the evidence we have already heard, that the sheriff is not in that state in which it would be proper for the House to discharge him, on the ground of ill health; he is not in any immediate danger, and therefore we will keep him a little longer and try his constitution a little more."

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

Why, we know, from the evidence of the medical gentleman who was examined yesterday, that Mr. Sheriff Evans is growing worse under his confinement. That opinion was elicited in reply to the question of the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin; and we also know that, although his life is not in immediate danger, very serious consequences may result if he remain longer under restraint. Having that evidence before him, I should have thought the Noble Lord would have felt justified in saying, "I want no further evidence; I am prepared to give way to my own natural feelings, and to release the sheriff." I did conceive that the Noble Lord would have been anxious to avail himself of any opportunity that might offer; or even—if he could do so consistently with his own feelings of honour—to make an opportunity to release the sheriff. The Noble Lord, however, refuses to liberate the sheriff, because his life is not in any immediate danger. The Noble Lord thinks it also consistent with his position in this House, to state another ground for resisting the motion of my Noble Friend,—namely, that there has appeared an advertisement in the papers of the day, stating that the sheriff would be a candidate for the suffrages of the electors of Lewes. Has the Noble Lord read that advertisement? If he have, he must have forgotten it; since Mr. Sheriff Evans there states that he cannot go down and canvass the electors, because the House has put that out of his power. The vote of a tyrant majority has destroyed all prospects of that kind; but that if, under all the disadvantages, he should be returned by the electors of Lewes, then, in conformity with the precedent established in the case of Mr. Robert Christie Burton, who, on being returned by the electors of Beverley, was brought up under the warrant of the Speaker, he would be enabled to take his seat among Honourable Members in this House. I do not see how the Noble Lord can refuse to hear further evidence, unless he has a design of confining Mr. Sheriff Evans till his life shall expire. I am, myself, perfectly satisfied, having read the evidence, that sufficient grounds have been stated for the release of the sheriff; but if there be any doubt on the mind of the Noble Lord, or of any other Honourable Member, then the consistent course will be to call in the other medical gentleman who has visited Mr. Sheriff Evans this day. Under these circumstances, I hope the House will not be put to the trouble of a division, but that Dr. Chambers will be at once called in.

Mr. GORING. — I have this morning seen Mr. Sheriff Evans, and have ascertained that Mr. Freeman did not communicate to him his intention of communicating with the Noble Lord (Mahon) in order to obtain Mr. Sheriff Evans's discharge; but that Mr. Freeman made the application on his own judgment of what he deemed right and necessary for the preservation of the sheriff's life. There is now another medical gentleman in attendance, who, if called to the bar, will give his opinion to the House upon the same point, should the evidence which has been already given, be thought insufficient. Let not the House, however, suppose that Mr. Sheriff Evans has altered, or is at all likely to alter, the opinion which he conscientiously holds. He does not brave the House,—he respects it, as every British subject should do; but having formed the opinion that the law of the land is supreme, I am sure that, whatever course the House may take, Mr. Evans will never give way one inch.

Justum et tenacem propositi virum,
Non civium ardor prava jubentium,
Non vultus instantis tyranni,
Mente quatit solidâ.

Mr. R. M. MILNES. — I do not think it right that we should occupy the time of the House in useless discussions. I cannot see that any repetition of the evidence of last night can be of the least use to Mr. Sheriff Evans. The case which existed for the motion of yesterday would not be made better by calling in Dr. Chambers. If there had been immediate danger, Dr. Chambers, or some other practitioner, would have been called in before. I cannot but think that my Noble Friend has been somewhat premature in bringing forward the present motion. I cannot but think that he has hardly consulted the sheriff's character in doing so. There is no advantage to be obtained by those pleas ad misericordiam. By these motions being made from day to day, it would seem to be implied that the House was exercising vengeance; as if a single angry feeling against the sheriffs had been expressed during the whole of the discussions, — as if the sheriffs had not been treated throughout with the respect to which their conduct entitles them,—as if the very evening on which they were committed, the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth had not spoken of their conduct with the greatest respect. I think that every possible indulgence ought to be given to Mr. Sheriff Evans in his present situation; and therefore I have no objection to any enlargement which the House may think proper to grant; but I do not consider that any case has been made out for the liberation of the sheriff. To discharge him, now, would be to stultify the whole proceedings of the House up to the present time.

SIR A. DALRYMPLE. — I do not think that the dignity of the House would be at all impaired by calling for further evidence. I had an opportunity of sitting near the bar yesterday, and of witnessing the manner in which the examination of the medical gentleman was carried on. I have since taken the liberty of inquiring whether Mr. Freeman is a person of any note in his profession; and I find that he is very much in repute, and is well known to many Honourable Members of this House as a gentleman of great professional experience and ability. Now, it appears that Mr. Freeman has come forward, thinking that the life of his patient would be endangered by further confinement; and I, therefore, having full confidence in the opinion of Mr. Freeman, think it would not be beneath the dignity of the House to act on his evidence, and to release Mr. Sheriff Evans. But, after the examination of last night, I consider that Mr. Freeman, out of a regard for his own character, is perfectly justified in calling in Doctor Chambers; and I hope the House will not refuse to hear that gentleman's opinion.

Mr. H. LAMBTON. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord the Member for Hertford whether, when he made the motion which he brought before the House yesterday, he was aware that Mr. Sheriff Evans was about to offer himself as a candidate for Lewes; and if not, whether he was aware of that fact, otherwise than from the printed advertisement which has been referred to, before making his speech of this evening?

LORD MAHON. — I will answer both the questions of the Honourable Member most readily, and with one reply. The only intimation which I have received of Mr. Sheriff Evans's intention to offer himself as a candidate for Lewes, was by reading his address in the Times newspaper of this morning; and I do not know whether that address is an authentic document, or not.

SIR R. PEEL. — I should wish to act throughout the whole of these proceedings in a judicial capacity, and to disregard every consideration which would interfere with the performance of what I consider to be strictly a judicial duty. I expected, on coming down to the House, that the subject on which I should have to decide was, whether the evidence adduced at the bar yesterday was sufficient to induce me to consent to the liberation of the sheriff on the ground of ill health. Having given every attention to the evidence, I came down to the House, prepared to discharge a painful duty, and to declare that I did not think the evidence sufficient to justify the House in liberating Mr. Sheriff Evans. But I now find myself unexpectedly called upon to decide another question,—whether or no Sir William Chambers shall be permitted to be examined at the bar on the subject. Considering that we have on two former and similar occasions permitted evidence to be adduced,—first, in the case of Mr. Sheriff Wheelton, and again, yesterday, in the case of Mr. Sheriff Evans,—and considering the great eminence of Dr. Chambers, and that this case is more of a medical than of a surgical kind,—it is my advice to the House that we should not refuse to receive Dr. Chambers's evidence. I am perfectly unprejudiced in this matter. I have already stated my intention of voting against the discharge of Mr. Sheriff Evans, on the evidence adduced yesterday. If Dr. Chambers's evidence should be of similar import, I shall be prepared to act on the decision I have already come to. If Dr. Chambers's evidence should be of a nature to show that the sheriff's health is in serious danger, I should regret, and I am sure the House would regret, having excluded the evidence of a man of so much eminence.

COLONEL SALWEY. — The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford has taunted Honourable Members on this side of the House with being a tyrant majority, upon this question, and with a want of sympathy for the sufferings of the sheriff. There is, however, a poor man who has been in confinement for a much longer period than Mr. Sheriff Evans. I allude to John Thorogood—— — who has been for fourteen months the victim of persecution; but for whom Honourable Gentlemen opposite, who are so sensitive in this case, can show no sympathy.

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear!]

Mr. NICHOLL. — I believe the Honourable Member is himself the defendant in a church-rate suit; so that it is natural he should sympathise with John Thorogood.

[Laughter.]

And I believe, also, that the Honourable Member has very little chance of success.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Rather than the House should be put to the trouble of a division on this question, I will accede to the motion.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I must, however, repeat, that my wish is against calling in Dr. Chambers. I think, Sir, that on a question of this nature, it is very desirable that the House should not divide. And it is on that ground that I give my consent to the motion that Dr. Chambers be called in.

The motion was then put, and agreed to; and Dr. Sir William Frederick Chambers was then called to the bar, and examined by the Speaker.

What is your name? — William Frederick Chambers.

You are a physician? — I am.

Have you been called upon, professionally, to visit Mr. Sheriff Evans? — I saw Mr. Sheriff Evans, for the first time, this morning.

Will you state to the House what you consider to be Mr. Sheriff Evans's condition? — I think he is obviously labouring under ill health; his appearance shows that; and I consider that that arises from a very imperfect state of his digestive organs: he has an unhealthy aspect of body, fat, bilious-looking, and gouty; and I understand he has suffered several severe fits of gout, and that recently.

Do you consider him in that state that his life would be endangered by further confinement? — I think his health would be much deteriorated by confinement; and I conceive that his further confinement might convert those defects which have so disordered the digestive organs, into absolute diseases; for instance, if indigestion is continued for any length of time, the liver becomes at last disordered. When defect is continued, that becomes a disease; and we know that, from diseases of the liver, for instance, dropsy arises, and all the dangers of dropsy.

The witness was then ordered to withdraw.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — I think, Sir, the evidence which has now been received at the bar of the House tends to show that a further continuance of the confinement of Mr. Sheriff Evans might convert into a dangerous disease the present defective state of health of that gentleman. I consider the statements of Dr. Chambers to be, therefore, in corroboration and confirmation of the evidence which was received by the House yesterday. I cannot believe that the House would incur the responsibility of any danger arising even to the health, much less to the life, of any person whom it had committed into custody; and, under these circumstances, and feeling that I shall not exceed the grounds furnished by the evidence which has been offered, I will now move, "That, in consideration of the matter stated in the evidence of Dr. W. Chambers and Mr. Freeman, in respect of the health of Mr. Sheriff Evans, Mr. Sheriff Evans be forthwith discharged."

Mr. KELLY. — I beg to second the motion. I cannot but view the evidence given yesternight, as well as on this evening, as entitled to the very gravest consideration. It was stated by Mr. Freeman, that he believed, if Mr. Sheriff Evans were to be confined longer, his life would be endangered. Now, the probability is, that Mr. Freeman is not so well known to several Members of the House as the very eminent physician who has just been called in. I feel bound to say, concerning Mr. Freeman, that I know him to be a gentleman of extensive practice, and of eminence in that practice. His declaration, that any continuance of the imprisonment of the sheriff would be prejudicial to his health, has been substantially confirmed by Dr. Chambers. If the House, then, is satisfied that, under prolonged confinement, that which is now only a disorder or derangement of the bodily functions, may be converted, by confinement, into a permanent disease, and therefore have a tendency to shorten his life; I ask whether the House, under the circumstances in which it is placed with respect to Mr. Sheriff Evans, can feel itself justified in longer detaining him? I submit that this is not a case in which further detention is necessary to the maintenance of the dignity of the House. If it were necessary that the sheriff should be taken into custody and punished by imprisonment, to vindicate the privileges of the House, so far the dignity of the House has been upheld. Both the sheriffs have been put into custody by the House, and kept for some considerable time in imprisonment; and the question now is, — not whether any person shall be so arrested and imprisoned, but whether the prolonged imprisonment of one already so treated, is necessary to the maintenance of the dignity of the House, under the circumstances of the case? If any other step be necessary, it can only be the imprisonment of some other person who has committed himself, as well as Mr. Sheriff Evans. But, seeing that that gentleman has been guilty of no moral offence; having acted in what he believed to be, perhaps erroneously, the proper performance of his duty, and that he has now been kept in custody for six weeks, I would put it to the humanity, to the honour, and to the good sense of the House, whether anything that may be required for the maintenance of the dignity of the House renders it necessary to detain him one moment longer? I have heard with pain an observation made by the Noble Lord opposite respecting an advertisement which has appeared in a morning paper. I do not know that the advertisement is genuine. It may be so; and if it be, I am ready to admit that, if Mr. Sheriff Evans is in a condition to go and canvass a constituency, his state of health cannot be such as to entitle him to be discharged, supposing his imprisonment under the order of the House to be just. But the advertisement may not be genuine; and, whether so or not, I can see nothing in it which shows that the bodily health of Mr. Sheriff Evans is such as to enable him to go and canvass the electors of a borough. There is, therefore, nothing in the mere fact of the advertisement to break in upon the evidence of the respectable medical gentlemen who have appeared at the bar of the House. As it seems, then, that if he be longer confined, he will probably be thrown into a state of indisposition that will seriously threaten his life, I hope no Honourable Gentleman in this House will feel himself called upon, by any view of his public duty, to prolong the imprisonment of the sheriff, not only to the augmentation of his bodily suffering, but to the risk of his life. I should take a different view of the case, if I thought the privileges of the House would suffer by the release of the sheriff, or that his further detention was at all necessary to the maintenance of the dignity of the House. But, feeling that there is no individual in this House, who, if he became a party to the extended imprisonment of Mr. Evans, might not, hereafter, feel in his conscience that he had aided in destroying the life of an individual, who, all are agreed, has behaved fairly and honourably, according to his own sense of duty, I hope the House will agree to the motion of my Noble Friend.

Upon the question being put, —

SIR W. JAMES said: — As the Noble Lord opposite has alluded to an advertisement, purporting to come from the sheriff, as a candidate for the representation of the borough of Lewes, I cannot help reminding the Noble Lord of a circumstance which, to my own mind, affords a strong proof that the advertisement is not genuine, but a forgery; — namely, that the Honourable Baronet (the Member for Buckingham) has, this day, moved for a new writ in the room of Viscount Cantilupe, who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds, and who, I understand, has gone to Lewes to present himself as a candidate for the representation of that borough.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I have procured a copy of the Times newspaper, in which the advertisement that has been alluded to appears, and will call the attention of the Noble Lord to the first line of the second paragraph.

The SPEAKER. — The Honourable Member will be aware that it is contrary to order to read from a newspaper in the House.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I bow, at once, Sir, to your opinion; but, although it be not in order to read from a newspaper, I apprehend, I may be allowed to quote from recollection, the first lines of the second paragraph of the address in question: —

> Visited with imprisonment, and deprived of that personal liberty which has ever been the birthright of Englishmen, for no crime but that of having, in obedience to the laws, and observance of my oath, discharged the duties of the high office of sheriff of Middlesex, I feel no apology will be necessary for not paying my respects to you in person upon this occasion.

That is the ground upon which the sheriff rests his claim; or, rather, that is the ground upon which he states his inability to make a personal canvass of the electors. It is very unfair to argue against the sheriff, that he should still be deprived of his liberty, because the first use he might make of it would be to go and pay his respects to the electors of Lewes. Surely, that is not an unusual, nor is it an un-English, use of liberty; and the Noble Lord should be the last man to say that any one of his fellow subjects should be kept in confinement, because the first use he might propose to make of his liberty should be to offer himself as a candidate to the constituency of any place, and to canvass for their suffrages. With respect to the state of the sheriff's health, all doubts I might have entertained, before, have been entirely removed from my mind by the evidence of Sir W. Chambers; and, unless you intend to keep Mr. Evans until he shall die, in your custody, you must at once order his liberation. The dignity of the House does not require his further imprisonment; that has been sufficiently vindicated and appeased already, — first, in having committed the sheriff, and then in refusing to allow the Court of Queen's Bench to interfere to discharge him by writ of habeas corpus. The Court of Queen's Bench have assisted you in maintaining your privileges, by allowing you to keep their officer in your custody for six weeks; and now, when you find that you cannot keep him longer in confinement without danger to his health, and, perhaps, his life, I call on you, on every principle of justice and humanity, to concur in the motion of my Noble Friend (Lord Mahon). I should have stopped here, if the Honourable Member for Ludlow had not servilely copied, not only the precedent, but the very words addressed, on a former evening, to the Honourable Gentlemen on this side of the House, by asking whether the sufferings of John Thorogood are not altogether a matter of indifference to them? Is there no difference between a person who has been legally convicted and one who has not?

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — He has not been convicted.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I do not say he has been. I was about to put two cases, when I was interrupted by the Honourable Member. Is there not a difference between the case of the sheriff and that of an individual who has refused to appear and plead before a tribunal, the jurisdiction of which, according to the opinion of my Right Honourable Friend opposite, is perfectly competent? If it were not for his false friends, it has been plainly shown to the House, that Thorogood would have appeared and pleaded, and so have avoided the trouble he has brought upon himself, by taking another course. The two cases are not at all analogous.

Mr. HORSMAN. — I wish to call the attention of the House to a very remarkable discrepancy in the evidence of the two medical men who have been under examination, and which appears to have escaped the Noble Lord who has moved, and the Honourable and Learned Gentleman who has seconded his motion. Mr. Freeman stated, on Tuesday, that Mr. Sheriff Evans was very bad with a disease of the liver. What says Dr. Chambers this day? That he has no disease of the liver.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

Dr. Chambers stated, merely, that the digestive organs of Mr. Sheriff Evans were deranged. That being the only additional evidence this day, I cannot see that it is so far concurrent with the evidence of Mr. Freeman yesterday, as to induce me to vote for the liberation of the sheriff. If that consideration did not satisfy me, the fact of the address which has been published this morning, and to which allusion has already been made, would be sufficient to induce me to come to that determination.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — Before the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down rose to address the House, I was about to submit a new proposition. Like my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Tamworth, I came down to the House with my mind made up that I could not, upon the statements of Mr. Freeman, unsupported by further medical evidence, vote for the liberation of the sheriff. At the same time, I feel bound to offer to the House my testimony in favour of the great respectability of Mr. Freeman, whom I have long known as a skilful and eminent member of the medical profession. But having given my most careful attention to the evidence of that gentleman, I do not think it sustains the necessity for the immediate liberation of Mr. Sheriff Evans. Still I must say, after what has fallen from the Honourable Member who spoke last, that the examination of Dr. W. Chambers is not, to my mind, full and satisfactory I had imagined that some further inquiries would be made by some Honourable Gentlemen more competent than myself to examine a medical witness. I therefore did not rise to put any question; and as the House is by no means satisfied with the evidence as it now stands, it is my earnest desire that Dr. Chambers should be recalled. I therefore move, as an amendment, that he be recalled, for the purpose of a more full and particular examination. The House cannot err, in referring for information to an authority so high and impartial.

LORD MAHON. — I shall be most ready to withdraw my motion for the present, in order that Dr. Chambers may be further examined.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — Before the motion of the Noble Lord is withdrawn, and the House determines to adopt the course which the Right Honourable Baronet has suggested, I wish to impress upon the House the very great difficulty in which it may be involved by pressing this medical examination, further. I believe there is no Gentleman who has been present during the examination of Dr. Chambers and Mr. Freeman, who does not feel how highly painful and disagreeable to Mr. Sheriff Evans the nature of that examination must be. Unless, then, there be some great and obvious necessity for continuing that line of examination, it would be much better avoided. But it appears to me that there might be a course which the House could adopt, without incurring the inconvenience of pursuing the examination, and at the same time avoid the risk — which is no doubt a serious one — of placing the health of Mr. Sheriff Evans in greater danger by prolonged confinement. In the evidence given, there appears to me, as well as to others, nothing which would sufficiently justify the House in consenting to an immediate discharge of the sheriff. But, on the other hand, there is, I must confess, much in that evidence to show that it would be highly desirable and expedient not to continue him in that species of custody in which he is now placed. It is impossible for any one to have listened to the evidence of Dr. Chambers without admitting that it is not altogether improbable that the prolongation of the imprisonment of Mr. Evans might be attended with very serious consequences. Nothing is more likely to enlist the feeling of the public against the House, and to damage us in the assertion of that privilege, which I, for one, am resolved to maintain to the very last, — nothing is more likely to weaken us in pursuing that course, than if it should turn out, unfortunately, that while we are balancing the evils to which Mr. Sheriff Evans is exposed, he should contract a serious, and possibly a mortal, disease. The course, then, which I think the House ought to adopt, under these circumstances, is, — not to discharge Mr. Sheriff Evans out of their custody, but direct that, under the charge of a messenger of the House, he should be permitted to take up his residence, in custody, in such a place out of town as his medical advisers shall recommend.

[Cries of " Oh, oh!" and " Hear, hear!"]

By that course, all risk of his health, all danger of his suffering from the prolongation of his present species of confinement, will be avoided, and at the same time the House will manifest that which I think it is absolutely necessary it should manifest,—a positive and fixed determination to enforce its authority. The Honourable Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford has said that enough has been done for the dignity of the House. In my opinion, when a person is once committed for contempt, enough is never done for the dignity of the House until that person shall submit himself to the authority of the House; petition for his enlargement; express contrition for the fault he has committed, and engage not again to fall into a similar fault. Mr. Sheriff Evans has done nothing of the kind. More than that, he has published, in a newspaper of this day, an address, which has been more than once alluded to, and which is a fact of great importance for the House to bear in mind; not only from its directly flying in the face of the House, but from its implying that Mr. Evans desires to be discharged, not on account of the state of his health, but that he may be enabled the more effectually to carry out a particular object, which he has in view. The Honourable Baronet the Member for Oxford University has said that there is no analogy between this case and that of John Thorogood; because, if Thorogood had not listened to the suggestions of false friends, he would have submitted to the jurisdiction of the court, and have paid the money, and consequently, would now have been at large. Why, that appears to me to be just the case under discussion. If the sheriff would submit himself to the authority of the House, he would be discharged. If he had not listened to the suggestions of false friends, I firmly believe that, before this, he would have submitted, and, in consequence, have been liberated. But he has not done so, and therefore is properly continued in custody. I would, however, entreat the House not to run the risk of endangering that gentleman's health, by retaining him in his present custody, when, by adopting the course which I have ventured to recommend, we might avoid that risk, while, at the same time, we should show that we were determined not to abandon the privileges of the House. I think it is more peculiarly important, on this occasion, that we should show such a determination; because I believe it very much depends on the course we now take, what the Court of Queen's Bench will do, when it shall assemble again in Easter term. If we waver, if we show any irresolution, I have no doubt that the Court of Queen's Bench, on their side, will avail themselves of that weakness.

[Cries of " Oh, oh!"]

But if we show a fixed determination to maintain our privilege, I cannot believe that the Court of Queen's Bench, having, on its own acknowledgment, no power to protect the sheriff, and having admitted that it could not (he being in custody for a contempt of the House) relieve him from that custody, will act in a manner so contrary to all precedent and usage as to insist that a third and innocent party should take a course by which he would subject himself to a punishment, from which the court has not the power to release him. For all these reasons, I suggest that it would be inexpedient to recall Dr. W. Chambers, and that it would be far better to take the course I have suggested.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — On a former occasion, when the Noble Lord who spoke last addressed the House on the subject of the sheriffs' confinement, he advocated the adoption of more harsh measures; and even went so far as to recommend that the prisoners should not be allowed the use of pen, ink, or paper; and now, when we are told by the eminent medical authority who has been examined at the bar this evening, that the consequence of the further confinement of Mr. Sheriff Evans may be to produce a disease, which, sooner or later, may prove fatal to his life, the Noble Lord says, " Oh, don't let the sheriff out of your hands, but send him off into the country, in the custody of a messenger of the House.". The feeling of Honourable Members opposite evidently is, — "having got a man in our power, let us exercise that power as far, and in as harsh a manner, as possible." I hope, however, that the House will agree to no other proposition than the immediate release of Mr. Sheriff Evans. His continued imprisonment would be a disgrace to the country; his ever having been sent to prison is a disgrace to the House; and, above all, a disgrace to that part of the House which calls itself liberal. The sheriff has been kept in custody by the exercise of tyrannical power; and I only regret that I have not a vote for Lewes, as I am perfectly assured that the return of Mr. Evans would do honour to any constituency.

SIR R. PEEL. — I wish to address myself singly to the question which now properly comes under the consideration of the House. The question which the present motion brings before us is, not whether Mr. Sheriff Evans should be discharged on merits; neither is it a proposition that he should be discharged on the ground that the punishment which he has already endured is commensurate with his offence; but whether he ought now to be discharged on the score of ill health?

I will take the liberty of repeating what I said yesterday in reference to this question, — namely, that it would not be creditable to the House to proceed upon one ground, and use it as a pretext, while they were really influenced by considerations arising out of another. If Mr. Sheriff Evans ought to be discharged upon merits, let it be done forthwith; if he ought to be discharged because he has already endured sufficient punishment, let him no longer be detained; but if he ought to be liberated on the first or second of these grounds, let not the third be assigned as the ground of his discharge. Let the House not forget, that, if they discharge Mr. Evans on the ground of indisposition, such a proceeding will have the effect of establishing an important precedent, — and for this reason, that all other persons similarly circumstanced will be equally entitled, in point of equity, to a similar relief. I put out of view, altogether, the question whether the original committal was just or unjust, and merely confine myself to this observation, — that, if Mr. Sheriff Evans be discharged on the ground of ill health, the meanest man in the community, if sent to prison for any offence, would be entitled to a similar indulgence. As to the address which has appeared in the newspapers, and to which reference has been made, I conceive that the House ought to disregard it altogether; there is no evidence before the House of the authenticity of that address. My first impression respecting it was, that it could not be genuine. I did not think, after the statement yesterday made in this House by the medical adviser of Mr. Sheriff Evans, that such an address was likely to have appeared in the public prints; but I think the House, acting judicially, and not having before them any evidence of the authenticity of the address, ought to put it altogether out of view. Looking, then, at the question before us in the light in which I have endeavoured to present it to the House, I feel bound to say, that I have arrived at the same conclusion as has the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland. I cannot vote for the discharge of Mr. Sheriff Evans; and I confess that I do not think the House could come to any such vote without applying the same principle to other parties similarly circumstanced. Nevertheless, I am bound also to say, that we should be incurring a very serious degree of responsibility by keeping Mr. Sheriff Evans any longer in strict confinement. The House, I am sure, will agree with me that the more firmly and temperately we maintain our privileges, the longer will those privileges be preserved in a permanent and efficient condition. I do not, however, think that it would be inconsistent with the due maintenance of those privileges, for the House to adopt the course which has been suggested by the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland. The House might, I think, very properly say, "We are unwilling to run the risk of laying the foundation of some permanent disease, by keeping Mr. Evans in close confinement; and therefore we will not permanently and unconditionally discharge him; but, on the evidence of his two medical attendants, we are willing (and I, for one, am willing) to adopt the course which the Noble Lord has proposed: that is, we will give Mr. Sheriff Evans the benefit of air and exercise in the country, upon the understanding that, when the cause of that indulgence shall be removed, he shall return to his present custody." But it may be said, we have had no application from the sheriff himself, and it is improper to extend the indulgence proposed, except upon application from the party in custody. Still I say that, as the House has already acted in this matter without any application from the sheriff; as they have, unasked by him, taken evidence at the bar as to his state of health, with a view to grant him indulgence, should it be found necessary, I think we might, upon that necessity being shown, proceed to act upon the suggestion of the Noble Lord, even in the absence of an application from the sheriff himself. I care not for any application from the sheriff; however unwilling he may be to apply to us, I cannot consent to continue him in such strict confinement as might endanger his life. In the course suggested by the Noble Lord, there will be temperate relaxation of confinement, and one that will not subject the sheriff to any odious or onerous restriction. I think this will be a temperate course, — I think it will be a just course, — and I think it will be a course the most consistent with the maintenance of our privileges.

Mr. T. B. HOBHOUSE. — I think the House cannot follow a better course in this matter than that which is pursued by the courts of justice. When a prisoner is convicted, we do not hear of the judge ordering the man to be liberated, on account of his health being endangered by confinement; nor do we hear, when a man has been sentenced to transportation, that he is brought back because he is in a delicate state of health. The sheriff here is suffering in consequence of his violation of the laws of the land.

[Cries of "No, no!" and "Hear, hear!"]

The sheriff here is suffering in consequence of a violation of the privileges of the House; and the privileges of this House rest upon the same footing as the laws of the land.

Mr. PLUMPTRE. — Mr. Freeman has stated, in his evidence, that it is necessary to the recovery of Mr. Sheriff Evans that he should be unshackled in mind and in person; but he surely can never feel himself really free so long as he is in the custody of an officer of this House. It is well known that diseases of the liver are increased by circumstances that prey on the mind.

The LORD ADVOCATE. — I rise merely to observe, in reply to what has been said by the Honourable Member for Rochester (Mr. T. B. Hobhouse), that it is the custom with some courts, occasionally, to allow persons to go out of gaol, when it can be shown that their lives would be endangered by continued confinement. Formerly, it was not at all an uncommon thing in Scotland, on strong grounds of necessity being shown, and security being taken for the return of the party, to allow convicted persons to go out of gaol under such circumstances.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I do not know that it is exactly in the power of the court to enlarge a prisoner from confinement, when once he has been regularly convicted, on the ground of ill health; but it is, of course, in the power of the Crown, in the exercise of its prerogative, to enlarge persons, under such circumstances. At the same time, it is required that very sufficient testimony should be given as to the fact of ill health; and I have very often directed that the certificate of the surgeon of the gaol in such cases should be sent back, on the ground of its having been loose and vague, and in order that I might ascertain whether or not the life of the prisoner was really in danger. But this case may be regarded as different from those in which the prerogative of mercy is exercised. Even in cases where the parties were convicted,—and I do not mean to say the sheriff here stands in the same position,—there would be an interference on the part of the Crown, where the prisoner's life was in danger from further confinement. But, with regard to a person of whom it could only be said that his constitution was such that his health might be impaired by further confinement, and that there was some danger that disease would arise, I do not think that the prerogative of the Crown would, in such a case, be exercised. As, for instance, in the case of William Lovett, who is confined in Warwick Gaol, affidavits were sent up and laid before me, with respect to the state of the health of that person; but there was nothing to show that the clergyman of the gaol had any serious apprehension of death following from confinement: but then there was the evidence of a medical man, who stated that he had known Lovett for a very long time, that he was a man of delicate constitution, and that the confinement and short diet of the gaol would endanger his health. Still I did not consider that this evidence was sufficient for me to recommend the exercise of mercy on the part of the Crown. I do not say that the case of Lovett is like to that of the sheriff; but then I should be sorry for it to be supposed that I should be willing to apply to a gentleman in a higher situation in life, and for whom there is naturally more sympathy, that rule which I would not apply to a man in the humblest situation in life. I feel, then, very great difficulty as to the vote I shall give. I think, however, that the proposal of my Noble Friend (Lord Howick) will save the House from the responsibility of placing the life of the sheriff in danger; and, although I should have hardly proposed such a motion myself, I shall still, with considerable doubt and hesitation, support that of my Noble Friend.

LORD HOWICK.—If the amendment of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke were withdrawn, I might then submit my suggestion in the form of an amendment on the original motion.

SIR J. GRAHAM.—I still think it is desirable to ascertain to what extent it will be necessary to relax the confinement of Mr. Sheriff Evans; and for that purpose I would suggest that the motion be withdrawn, and Doctor Chambers called in; after which, the proposition of the Noble Lord opposite might be taken into consideration.

The amendment and motion were then, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, "That Dr. Chambers be again called to the bar, and be further examined."

Dr. Chambers was then called to the bar accordingly, and examined as follows:—

SIR J. GRAHAM.—When you saw Mr. Sheriff Evans this morning, did you meet Mr. Freeman?—I did.

Did Mr. Freeman state to you his view of the malady of Mr. Sheriff Evans?—Certainly.

Did he state to you for what length of time he had attended Mr. Sheriff Evans?—I think he did not; I do not recollect exactly.

Did Mr. Freeman state to you that, in his medical treatment of Mr. Sheriff Evans, he had treated him on the supposition that his liver was affected?—He did.

Did you examine Mr. Sheriff Evans, with a view to ascertain whether there was any enlargement of the liver?—I did.

Is there an enlargement?—I must answer that question a little at length. There is not that enlargement which constitutes disease of the liver; but the whole region of the liver is turgid and hard, and, in fact, in that state which we consider as congested,—that is the medical term,—the liver full of its own secretions, and not discharging them properly.

The term used by Mr. Freeman was induration; do you think there is an induration of the liver?—Not in the general sense of induration, but in the sense of turgidness and over-congestion.

Is that part in a state of disposition to indurate?—Certainly, a free disposition to disease, properly so called, as distinguished from disorder.

Having ascertained to your satisfaction the state of the parts affected, do you think that close confinement is highly injurious to that predisposition to disease?—I do.

Do you think that custody, such as Mr. Sheriff Evans has undergone for the last six weeks, if continued, will lead inevitably to disease?—I cannot say that; because that depends upon a number of circumstances which no one can foresee; nor can I say anything as to the time at which disease may be produced; but I view the disposition as distinct.

Would you incur the responsibility of stating that further confinement for six weeks, or even a shorter period, might not produce permanent disease?—I really cannot fix any time in which permanent disease might be produced. I should not like to feel the responsibility of continuing the confinement for a very long time, if it were in my own power to prevent it.

In the present state of Mr. Sheriff Evans's health, do you consider danger from a lengthened confinement, such as you would not incur the responsibility of recommending?—I cannot answer that question.

Do you think it necessary, with reference to the present state of health of Mr. Sheriff Evans, that some relaxation of close confinement should be immediately granted?—I do not believe that anything but absolute freedom would place him in a state to recover the degree of good condition which he wants now.

You do not think any relaxation with regard to air and exercise would effect that?—It depends upon how far that is perfect liberty. I do not know how to say anything short of the power of taking free exercise, and having freedom of mind,—freedom, properly so called,—would effect it.

Do you think any such enlargement of custody, as should be limited merely to air and exercise, would not be sufficient to meet the necessity of the case?—I think that would only diminish the probability of further disease. I do not know that perfect freedom would restore any individual, who is out of condition, to health; but, certainly, the prospect would be less of recovering health, if the freedom were only partial.

Taking the case as you saw it this morning, have you any doubt that confinement is injurious? — I should say that confinement is injurious, particularly where there is a state of constitution and habit of body peculiarly disposed to be injured by confinement.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Did you put any questions to Mr. Sheriff Evans with respect to the air and exercise he is enabled to take at present? — I understood from him, in the course of conversation, that he was allowed to walk in the cloisters here; but I do not recollect putting any distinct questions as to the degree of exercise.

Did you think the room in which he was confined one that would materially interfere with his health? — The room is a confined one; considering, also, that a great many visitors and persons on business, even while I was there, were brought into it.

Did you understand from him that there was any prohibition to his being out in the air for a certain time every day? — I did not question him distinctly upon that head; but I understood he was allowed to be out in the cloisters; I think he mentioned, generally, when he mentioned walking out, walking in the cloisters.

Do you think he would be enabled to take exercise if he were at liberty? — I think he would.

Mr. GLADSTONE. — Do you consider mental anxiety as a very important feature in the case of Mr. Sheriff Evans, as it at present exists? — I have not seen enough of Mr. Sheriff Evans to say how much mental anxiety he suffers; but I think it is a distinct aggravating cause of the other evil of confinement.

Without referring to the peculiarities of Mr. Sheriff Evans, as an individual, do you think that, in the state of disease, or any disposition to disease, in which he is at present, mental anxiety must be regarded as an important element in the case, and as likely to exercise a decidedly unfavourable influence? — I think so, decidedly.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — Do you conceive that if Mr. Sheriff Evans were in custody out of London, and permitted to take a larger portion of air and exercise, that would materially diminish the risk? — That depends entirely upon the conditions of his confinement. I think that confinement in the country, in an airy situation, certainly would be better, upon the whole, but whether the difference is a material one, between one and the other, I doubt, supposing he is in confinement, and a prisoner.

Mr. SANFORD. — Should you, as the medical adviser of Mr. Sheriff Evans, have thought it your duty to have made such a representation as you probably understand has been made by Mr. Freeman to this House, that he ought to be liberated, in consequence of the state he is now in? — I really doubt whether I should have thought it my duty to have come forward on such an occasion, myself; but this I should say, that if Mr. Sheriff Evans had come to me to consult me, I should have given him advice similar to that which I recommend as necessary for him now; that is, that of all others, that kind of constitution he has, requires activity and freedom: it appears that he is just in the condition materially to suffer from the want of it; and I should have advised him, by all means, to take the opportunity of obtaining those advantages as soon as possible.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — Did you understand from Mr. Sheriff Evans that he was confined to walking under the arches, or that he was at liberty to take exercise on the banks of the river Thames? — I did not ask him any distinct question; I think he mentioned the Terrace in the course of conversation; but I did not know the nature of the locality, and therefore I did not take any particular notice of it.

Are you acquainted with the banks of the Thames? — No.

An Honourable Member. — Do you consider that Mr. Sheriff Evans is in any immediate danger — No, I do not.

Do you consider that the liver of Mr. Sheriff Evans is in a state of chronic inflammation? — No, I do not; it is in what we call a state of congestion; it is a loaded liver.

Do you happen to have cast your eye over the examination of Mr. Freeman, taken last evening? — I saw it in the newspaper.

Mr. MUNTZ. — Are you aware what quantity of exercise Mr. Sheriff Evans takes? — No, I am not; I never saw Mr. Sheriff Evans till this morning.

The witness was then directed to withdraw.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — I think, Sir, the further evidence which has now been elicited tends very strongly to confirm the original resolutions which I placed in your hands. I consider that, upon the evidence of the two medical gentlemen who have been examined at the bar, I am fully justified in the motion which I now propose, — namely, "That, in consideration of the matter stated in the evidence of Doctor Chambers and Mr. Freeman, in respect of the health of Mr. Sheriff Evans, Mr. Sheriff Evans be forthwith discharged." I trust that that evidence will have the same effect on my Noble Friend opposite (Lord Howick), and that he will, instead of pressing his own motion, support that which I now make.

Upon the question being put, —

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK said: —I confess that, after the further examination which has now taken place, I take so different a view of that examination from my Noble Friend, that I am disposed not to make my motion at all. I would rather postpone doing so, at all events, until there shall appear some greater necessity for it than at present exists.

The House then divided: — Ayes 84, Noes 125; Majority against the motion 41.

SIR J. GRAHAM.—The result of the evidence on my mind is, that the responsibility on the House of continuing Mr. Sheriff Evans in custody is very great, and that the House will not act wisely if it incur so dangerous a risk. There are precedents for enlarging prisoners from close custody in similar cases; and I think those precedents should be carefully considered with reference to this case. I shall therefore move that the evidence of Doctor Chambers be printed with the Votes; and I hope that the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland will turn his attention to the subject, and propose, to-morrow, some such motion as he was about to make to-day, for relaxing the close custody of the sheriff.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—I am disposed to take the same view as the Right Honourable Baronet; but as the case does not appear pressing, I have abstained from making my motion. It is, however, probable that, upon further consideration, I may, either to-morrow or on some other day, be induced to make such a motion as I have suggested.

LORD VISCOUNT INGESTRE.—It might be worthy of consideration, whether the sheriff should not be allowed to go out of custody on parole.

CAPTAIN POLHILL.—The same suggestion has occurred to me; and in consequence of what has been stated by the two medical gentlemen who have been examined at the bar, I shall move, to-morrow, that Mr. Sheriff Evans be liberated on parole.

The question "That, Dr. Chambers's evidence be printed with the Votes;" was then put, and agreed to.

BRITISH CLAIMS ON THE BRAZILS.

Mr. E. TENNENT.—I beg to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether any satisfactory answer has been received from the Government of the Brazils upon the subject of the compensation due from that Government to British subjects for injuries sustained during the insurrection at Para in 1835, and to what that compensation would extend?

LORD VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.—An answer has been received, and is now under reference to the Queen's Advocate, for his opinion, as to the validity of the claims.

CORN LAWS.

Mr. BARNEBY.—Seeing the Honourable Member for Cambridge in his place, I will take the opportunity of again asking him whether it is his intention to bring on his motion respecting the Corn Laws on Tuesday next, or to wait until the general question shall come on for discussion?

Mr. PRYME.—I have been informed by my Honourable Friend the Member for Wolverhampton that he intends to propose his motion on the 26th instant; and it is my intention to move, in rather more general terms than appears in the Votes, my motion, as an amendment; thus including both subjects in one debate.

BRITISH CLAIMS ON PORTUGAL.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON.—I wish to know, from the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, whether, as regards the new claims which have been made against the Portuguese Government, any satisfactory answer has been received?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.—An answer has been received, but it is not final.

DR. BOWRING'S REPORT.

Mr. P. HOWARD.—I wish to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs what prospect there is of the publication of Dr. Bowring's Report with regard to our commercial relations with Prussia and Germany?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.—I hope to be able in a few days to lay it before the House.

CORN LAWS.

The EARL of WARWICK.—My Lords, I have to present 100 petitions from the county of Warwick against any alteration of the corn laws; and I understand that 70 petitions to the same effect have been forwarded for presentation to a Noble Friend of mine. These petitions have been perfectly voluntary; no influence having been used to induce the petitioners to come forward. They have been got up in the course of one week, and are the result of the apprehension which is felt by the agriculturists that an alteration is contemplated in the corn laws, which would be not only injurious to them, but to the whole community. I would beg to remind your Lordships that there is a great difference between these petitions and those which are got up by the anti-corn law delegates who are now traversing the country in all directions, setting farmer against landlord, and labourer against farmer. The petitions I have to present are from owners and occupiers of land in Kington; Ratley and Upton; Budingbury; Snitterfield; Upper Radburn; Walmington and Arleocote; Wormleighton; Haselor; Spernal; Tanbourn; Weithly; Fulbrook; Long Itchington; Coughton; Billesley; Claverdon and Laingly; Ladbrooke and Idoitnell; Brailes; Long Compton and Little Wolford; Stourton; Leckington; Wishaw and Moxhull; Burton and Hastings; Brinklow; Tutnell and Cobley; Ashow; Copson; Oversley; Binton; Bubbenhall; Astley; Wappenbury; Foleshill; Long Lawford; Radford Semele; Hampton Lucy; Farnborough; Bishops Itchington; Chadshunt and Laydon; Aston Cantlow; Stoneleigh Stoke; Wasperton; Weston under Wetherley; Lapworth and Kingswood; Willoughby; Stretton upon Dunsmore; Ryton upon Dunsmore; Hampton in Arden; Lower Shucksburgh; Packwood; Whichford and Ascote; Avon Dassett; Combfields; Pellerton Priors; Cherington and Burnington; Hornington; Kings Newnham; Frankton; Lea Marston; Billow; Middleton; Corley; Ufton; Willenhall; Tamworth; Grendon and Whittington; Edgebaston; Wiletoft; Arrington and Stonedelph; Cestersoon; Monks Kirby; Newnham Paddocks; Strutfields and Monks Riding; Chappel Ascote; Wixford; Eathope; Aukskey; Sherbourne; Lillington; Merivale and Bentley; Fenny Compton; Willingbrook and Hopsford; Sutton Coldfield; Ansley; Baddesley; Ensor; Allesly; Shuttington; Elmden; Chilvers Cotton; Wolvey; Newton and Biggen; Rugby; Hill Morton; Cosford; Meriden; Binley; Newton Regis; Maxtoke; Churchover; Leek Wootton; Bourton and Draycote; Sheldon; Leamington; Hastings; Barford; Saint Nicholas, Warwick; Saint Mary, Warwick; Dunchurch; Wellesbourne; Hastings and Walton; Exhall juxta; Bishops Teachbrook, Bagington, and Sturchall; Wolston and Marston; Wolverton; Pellerton; Hersey; Arley; Willey; Nuneaton; Attleborough and Stockingford; Church Lawford; Bearly; Shustoke; Norton Lindsey; Hornley and Wroxhall; Leamington Priors; Kingsbury; Hurly and Dosthill; Barkswell; Bickmarsh and Bidford; Arrow; Studley; Exhall; Shotteswell; Charlecote; Stockton; Priors Hardwick; Butters Marston; Upper Shugsburgh; Priors Marston; Princethorpe; Whitchurch; BudBudbrook; Whitnash; Ansty; Moreton Morrell; Balsall; Newbold upon Avon; Grandborough; Caldecote; Weddington; Wellesbourne Mountford; Wyken; Farnborough; Grafton; Beausal; Bickenhill; Over Whitacre; Minworth; Haseley; Wolfhampcote; Great Alne; Marton; Chesterton and Kington; Newbold Pacy and Ashorne; Rowington and Pinley; Strutton upon Fosse and Ditchford; Bulkington, Barnacle, Bramcote, and Marston Jabbett; Barston; Eatington; Henley in Arden, Ullenhall, and Aspley; Compton Verney; Offchurch; Sowe; Kenilworth; Huningham; Thurlaston; Baxterley; Little Lawford; Brownsover; Nether Whitacre; Coleshill; Fillongley; Cubbington; Milverton; Beaudesert; Preston Baggott; Lighthorne; Alveston; Hatton and Shrewley; Salford; Combrook; Ilmington and Compton Scorpion; Shilton; Clifton upon Dunsmore; Harbury; Moreton Baggott; Whatcote; Oxhill and Radway; Halford; Compton Wyniates and Great Wolford; Idlicote; Burton Dassett; Mollington; Alcester and Kinwarton; Baddesley Clinton; Ipsley; Stratford on Avon, Luddington, Milcott, Old Stratford, and Drayton; Curdworth; Little Packington; and Tillington: and of inhabitants of Arlington, Barmbro', and Hickleton; Goldthorpe and Bolton; Braithwell Loversall; Rossington; Adwick-le-Street; Tickhill; and Armthorpe.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — I am happy to find that the farmers of Warwickshire have done their duty in coming forward to petition against the alteration or repeal of the corn laws. I have to present a petition to the same effect from a parish in the county of Sussex; and I hope the farmers throughout the country will follow the example, and will exert themselves to defeat the projects of those agitators who are inflaming the public mind on this question, and fomenting discord between the farmers and the labourers.

Petitions read, and severally ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE—NON-INTRUSION.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — My Lords, I have to present to your Lordships two petitions, from the towns of Hass and Huntley, complaining of an interdict issued by the Court of Session, prohibiting certain clergymen from preaching, and praying protection for the said clergymen, and for an adjustment of the question in dispute. I take this opportunity again to express my hope that some measure will speedily be provided to allay the excitement which now prevails in Scotland on this subject. I think that I shall best discharge my duty, as a country gentleman, by abstaining, for the present, from giving any opinion on the subject. When, however, any measure to remedy the existing evil shall be introduced, I shall give it my best attention, and state my reasons for the vote which I shall give.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — My Lords, I have to present three petitions on the same subject. They are from the minister, elders, and others of Barvas: from the minister, members of session, and congregation of St. Andrew's, Glasgow: from the presbytery of Nairn: and from the inhabitants of Moy and Dalarrossie. They are all in favour of the principle of non-intrusion; but by that phrase they all mean something different from each other. Your Lordships have, no doubt, lately heard a great deal about non-intrusion; yet I believe that few of your Lordships know exactly what "non-intrusion" signifies, — what meaning is attached to the term. I therefore will briefly explain to your Lordships what are the views taken in Scotland on this point by the leading portions, — by the great divisions of the Church; at the same time abstaining from giving any opinion as to the merits of the question. In the first place, there exists now, and always has existed, a numerous body who look upon church patronage as unscriptural, — as an abomination, — as an accursed thing, that ought to be abolished as soon as possible. The object of that portion of the Church is, the total abolition of patronage; and that abolition is prayed for in several of the petitions which I have had the honour of presenting. The next great division of the Church is composed of those who do not advocate the abolition of patronage, but who advocate the right of the people to have a positive veto on the presentation of a minister, without assigning any reason whatsoever for their rejection of him. That is the present law of the Church under the Veto Act, which was passed in 1834; and which your Lordships' House has declared to be illegal, and beyond the power of the General Assembly to enact. That, however, may be considered to be the opinion held by the majority of the Church in the General Assembly, and also by the majority of the presbyteries throughout the country. Those parties hold that the people have a positive arbitrary right to reject a presentee, without assigning any reasons, but merely on expressing a conscientions conviction of his unfitness for the office. The third class consists of those who agree that the people should have a right to make any objection whatever to a presentee, whether it be connected with his moral character, his literary acquirements, or any other point that might lead to their full conviction of his unsuitableness; on which objection, the presbytery of the Church would decide. They contend, that they may even object that they could not be edified by the presentee's ministry; and the presbytery of the Church has a right to decide on the propriety of this objection arbitrarily, although it might not, in any degree, affect the presentee's character or his acquirements. This class comprises a large and numerous portion of the Church. They do not pray that the Veto Act should be legalised, but that the people may have their right acknowledged to evict ministers for any reason whatsoever that appears sufficient to them. The fourth division consists of those from whom my Noble Friend has presented petitions, and who think that the power of rejection should only be allowed where objections to a minister, affecting his character, his doctrines, or his literary acquirements, can be legally sustained. This is, in numbers, the most limited of the classes, and they approve of the law as it has stood for the last hundred years. These, my Lords, are, I think, the four great divisions into which the Church is divided on the subject, although there may be other shades of difference. When I mention that division which prays for the total abolition of patronage, I wish your Lordships to understand that they do not wish the people generally to exercise the right of electing the minister; they would limit that right to those who are in full communion with the Church in the different parishes. By a recent Act, the right is confined not merely to communicants, but to such communicants only as are the heads of families. This seems to me to be an arbitrary limitation. I cannot conceive on what grounds those who are communicants, but not heads of families, should be deprived of their rights. However, it is necessary that I should call your Lordships' attention to the fact, that the manner of dispensing the holy sacrament is different in Scotland from what it is in England; nor does the communicant hold the same station in the two countries. The people in the former country are not allowed to go up to the table indiscriminately. Only those are admitted who are considered qualified to partake of the holy rite; and that after examination by the ministers and elders. Therefore, to a considerable extent, there is a certain guarantee as to the character of the feeling, and the disposition, of the persons called upon to exercise the privilege of rejection. Before I sit down, I have one word to say to the Noble Viscount opposite. I know that the Noble Viscount is much pressed from many quarters to bring forward a measure upon this subject, and that the Government are much blamed for the delay that has taken place. Now, I confess that I am more afraid of precipitation than of delay. But I earnestly entreat the Noble Viscount, before he is driven to adopt any measure, to consider the question calmly, and to deliberate maturely on the nature of whatsoever proposition he may be induced to bring forward. No Government ever had a subject more delicate or more difficult to legislate on, or one with reference to which there was a greater necessity for serious deliberation. Above all, it demands honesty of purpose. I will say, that if it were left to the unbiassed judgment of the Noble Viscount, I am not sure that we should have a wise measure, but I am quite disposed to think we should have an honest one; but, from what I see at present, I am afraid that his unbiassed judgment will not have fair play. I am perfectly aware of the immense difficulty and importance of the question; and therefore I would press upon the Noble Viscount the necessity of not introducing a Bill until it shall have been deliberately considered and carefully prepared.

Petitions read, and ordered to lie on the table.

NEWPORT CONVICTS.

LORD TEYNHAM. — My Lords, I have to present to your Lordships a petition from Newport, the scene of the late disturbances, signed by 1500 out of 6000 inhabitants, praying that this House will present an Address to Her Majesty for the free pardon of the three convicts, — Frost, Williams, and Jones. My Lords, I am confident that it would be impossible for this House, as the last resort of justice in the country, to let the petition lie on the table unnoticed. I have taken great pains to ascertain the character of the petitioners; and I find that they are all respectable, and owners of the houses which the convicts were punished for attempting to burn. I lament that the subject has fallen into such humble hands as mine. I hope that, after the Easter recess, the Noble and Learned Lord (Brougham), who has taken such interest in the subject, will again devote his attention to it. If not, I will, myself, as well as I can, bring the petition under the consideration of your Lordships.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— My Lords, I am quite ready to believe that this petition has been numerously signed; but I cannot think it has as many signatures to it as the Noble Lord has stated. Fifteen hundred is so large a number, that I think the Noble Lord must have been misinformed.

LORD TEYNHAM. — I can only say that I have taken every pains to ascertain that this petition is what it represents itself, in every particular. If the Noble Marquess wishes, he can take it home and examine it himself.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the table.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE presented a petition of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Leeds, alleging that the time allowed for revising the burgess lists is too limited, and praying for alteration of the law in that respect. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

UNION WORKHOUSES.

LORD REDESDALE presented a petition praying that they may be exempted from the payment of parochial and parliamentary taxes, — of the board of guardians of the Witney union. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The MARQUESS of BUTE, the EARL of GALLOWAY, and the Earl of ABERDEEN presented a petition from the reverend the presbytery of Meigle, objecting to the power exercised by the General Assembly in refusing to allow presentees to officiate without the sanction of the majority of the congregation, and praying for the adoption of some measure to settle the question: Also,

Petitions for non-intrusion, — from Muirkirk; Saint Vigean's, Forfar; Dornoch; Portpatrick; Panbride; Clatt; Benbecula and district of Jochdar; Loudown; King Edward, Aberdeen; Yester; Clyne; Girvan; Anderston; Cairne; Edderton; Cawdor; Auldearn; and Braccadale. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CITY OF LONDON CORPORATION.

Viscount Melbourne presented a petition of householders and occupiers of premises in the city of London and liberties thereof, praying for the reform of the municipal corporate institutions of London.—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CORN LAWS.

Lord Wharncliffe presented a petition for the repeal of,—of inhabitants of Fenton, in the Staffordshire potteries.—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

OPIUM TRADE.

Lord Ellenborough presented a petition from the St. George and East Smithfield branch of the East London and Tower Hamlets Auxiliary to the British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, praying that English ships may be prevented from smuggling opium into China.

HORSE-RACING ACT IN PART REPEAL BILL.

The DUKE of RICHMOND.—My Lords, I move that the Horse-racing Act in part Repeal Bill be now read a second time. As the Noble Lord on the woolsack thinks it would be better not to re-repeal the whole of the Act of the 13th George II., I now propose only to repeal the two clauses which have given power to informers to bring vexatious and frivolous suits.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday, and the Lords summoned.

EAST INDIA COMPANY.

On the motion of Lord Ellenborough, copies or extracts of despatches from the Government of India to the Court of Directors of the East India Company, relative to the appointment of a Committee for the purpose of investigating the operation of the sea and land customs throughout India, and reporting the progress which has been made in the improvement of the system of levying duties of customs at the three presidencies; together with the replies of the Court of Directors to those despatches: also, copy of any correspondence which may have passed between the Board of Commissioners for the Affairs of India and the Court of Directors on the same subject: and, also, copy of minute of the Governor General of India, on the cultivation of cotton in the East Indies, dated Timla, the 14th August, 1839.

Ordered to be laid before the House.

PAPERS, &c.

Account of the allowances, compensations, remunerations, and superannuations granted to officers and servants of the Board of Commissioners for the Affairs of India and of the East India Company, in 1839.—Delivered (pursuant to Act), and ordered to lie on the table.

Account of the quantity and value of all articles of the growth or manufacture of the United Kingdom imported into the territories under the government of the East India Company, in each year, from 1828 to 1838, inclusive; together with an account of the rate of duty levied upon the import of each article in each year: And, also,

Similar accounts of the imports from the territories under the government of the East India Company into the British colonies, and from the British colonies into the territories under the government of the East India Company respectively; showing, in all cases, the rate of duty levied upon the import of each article.

Delivered (pursuant to Order of the 20th of February last), and to be printed.

Reports respecting gaols (delivered the 18th February, 1839).—To be printed.

Reports respecting gaols (delivered on Tuesday last).—To be printed.

Return of the number of seamen and marines voted by Parliament for the service of the navy, in the year 1839. Also,

Return of the distribution of the ships of the royal navy in commission, for the month of December, 1839: Also,

Return of the number of officers, seamen, and marines composing the complements of the ships stationed on the coasts of Great Britain and Ireland, in the month of December, 1839; and, also, of the numbers actually borne on the books of the said ships on the 1st December, 1839: Also,

Return of the number of seamen and marines borne on the books of the under-mentioned ships (distinguishing supernumeraries, if any), on the 1st of August, 1839; and the war complements of the same ships, as established by Her Majesty's Order in Council:— Howe, Britannia, Impregnable, Melville: Also,

Return of all squadrons of ships of war (distinguishing the numbers of each class) assembled for the purpose of exercise in naval evolutions, between the 1st January, 1835, and 1st January, 1840; distinguishing the years, numbers of ships, and the length of time they remained at sea together: And, also,

Return of the names of all ships launched since the 1st of January, 1835; distinguishing the yards at which they were launched:

Delivered (pursuant to Address of the 6th of February last), and to be printed.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

The following Bills were severally presented, and read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time; namely, —

Torquay and Dartmouth Roads Bill. Leave to Committee to sit this day till five of the clock, during the sitting of the House.

NOTTINGHAM GAS BILL.

Petitions in favour, — from Nottingham (bearing 2000 signatures); Lenton; Sneinton; New Radford and Hyson Green; and Carrington.

SIR JOHN HOBHOUSE and another HONOURABLE MEMBER presented six petitions from Nottingham, against. — Ordered to lie on the table.

COLONEL ROLLESTON having moved that the Nottingham Gas Bill be read a second time, —

SIR J. C. HOBHOUSE said: — I have been instructed by my constituents to give to this Bill a decided opposition. The petition which I this evening presented against the Bill is signed by no less than 2000 of the inhabitants of Nottingham. One of the petitions presented in favour of the Bill, and signed by a similar number of inhabitants, is easily accounted for. They are persons who expect, naturally enough, that if there be two gas companies established in the town, instead of one, they will be supplied with gas at a cheaper rate. But such is not the case; for as the quantity of gas supplied would be divided between two establishments, the scale of profits must be increased in order to afford an adequate remuneration to each; so that, eventually, it would be dearer to the inhabitants than it is at present. I deny, Sir, that the promoters of this Bill have made out a case for a second gas company in the town of Nottingham. I have heard no complaints respecting the present supply of gas. It is sold at from 6*s.* to 8*s.* per 1000 feet; and, besides the supply which the company have engaged to give, they, without any profit, supply the public lamps. They also supply gas to the town clock gratis, at an expense to them of 50*l.* a-year. Their works are fully adequate to supply the present and any probable demands that may arise for gas, both in the town and suburbs adjoining it. Now, if another company be established, it is clear that the streets of Nottingham must be opened to lay down the mains; from which great inconvenience will necessarily result, and, more than that, great expense; for, as I am instructed, the streets of Nottingham have been newly paved. The only charge of any weight that I know of against the proprietors of the present company is, that they have sanctioned great incivility and want of attention in their servants. That is, no doubt, very improper; and if the charge can be substantiated, I am sure the proprietors will not hesitate to procure more civil servants; so that that evil may be remedied without breaking up the streets of the town. You say, " Let us go into a Committee, that we may see what is necessary to be done, and which of the two companies is likely to afford the greater degree of satisfaction." Sir, having had much experience of Committees, and especially of Nottingham Committees, I must object to that proposition. My Honourable Friend opposite knows what was the fate of the last Committee which sat in reference to the town and county of the town of Nottingham. After sitting several days, it came to the conclusion that no case had been made out; thereby throwing away a great deal of valuable time and money. I believe there are no less than six lawyers concerned in the present case; and I do not know that there is so much superfluous capital in Nottingham as to make it advisable that it should be expended in a similar way, and for the purpose of serving those gentlemen. Being of opinion, therefore, that there are no grounds to warrant the establishment of a second gas company in the town of Nottingham, which would require the streets of the town to be broken up, and much inconvenience and expense would be thereby created; while, on the other hand, the present company is able to supply all the wants of the town, with a quality of gas, and at such a price, as to leave no complaint against them, but that of incivility on the part of their servants, whom they can easily teach to be more civil in future; I feel it my duty to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

COLONEL ROLLESTON.—Sir, the Right Honourable Baronet, in the course of the speech he has just delivered, in accordance with the instructions which he received from a portion of his constituents, told the House that this Bill for the better lighting of the town of Nottingham is supported by a considerable number of the inhabitants; while he, at the same time, refuses to allow it to go before a Committee,—the only place where its merits can be truly and really ascertained. I believe that, twenty or twenty-five years ago, an Act was passed, and is now in force, for the purpose of lighting the town of Nottingham; of the efficiency or inefficiency of which I shall not now speak. I shall not follow the example of the Right Honourable Baronet, by alluding to any of the observations which have been thrown out in parliamentary papers, but confine myself solely to the subject before us. It must be known to most Honourable Members, that the town of Nottingham, at the period of the passing of the Act to which I have alluded, was in a very different state from what it is at present. The population of the town was then but 40,000; it is now upwards of 60,000. We must also consider that the neighbourhood has grown to such an extent as to be, in the eye of a stranger at least, completely connected with the town. As regards the working classes, and the usual intercourse that is carried on between the town and the neighbourhood of the town, they are quite assimilated. Those adjoining districts comprise a population of 30,000, which, with the increase of 20,000 in the town itself since the passing of the Act, leaves 50,000 to be added to the amount of the population at that period; which is thereby more than doubled. The manufactures of the place, let it be likewise recollected, have increased in an equal ratio. The House will, therefore, see that the supply of gas, which might at first have been abundantly sufficient, may now be totally inadequate. But the case does not rest here. A Bill was passed last year, for including about fifty acres of certain waste lands, which are about to be covered with houses. Neither to this, nor to other extra-parochial places, has any supply of gas been, up to this hour, afforded. The mills and factories of the place, with the exception of two, have never had any light from the present gas company. A petition has been presented to the House for fresh powers to supply the deficiency. The Right Honourable Baronet has made one statement, believing it to be true;—I, another, with the same impression. I do not ask the House to pass this Bill upon the faith of what I state, or to confer those fresh powers, in compliance with the prayer of the petition; all I ask is, to allow the case to be investigated,—to allow the Bill to be read a second time, and sent before a Committee. I believe it is very unusual to oppose a Bill at this stage, except upon some ground of objection to the principle, against which, however, in this instance, the Right Honourable Baronet has not said one word; choosing, rather, to enter into the details of the question. I would not have uttered a syllable in reference to those details, but for the speech of the Right Honourable Baronet, which was made up entirely of detail. The Right Honourable Baronet said that no complaint had been made as to the inefficiency of the present company; the only one he knew of being that of incivility on the part of the servants of the company. Now, I will mention one fact, which can be substantiated before the Committee, if a Committee be granted. Some short time since, the owners of a factory applied to the company to supply their establishment with gas. The company did so, but so inefficient was the supply, and so bad the light, that the contract was broken up; and those persons have since been obliged to try their own means, and at a heavy expense, to light their own factory. I do not wish to throw any blame upon the company; they have, I know, done their utmost; but their establishment is a small one; and I do not see how it is possible for them to afford a sufficient supply of gas to so populous a district as Nottingham has now become, — a district which, within the last twenty years, has, in the way I have shown, increased its population from 40,000 to 90,000. I therefore hope the House will not be induced to reject the Bill.

Mr. GALLY KNIGHT. — Having been a member of the Committee of last year, to which the Right Honourable Baronet has alluded, I must say, that, instead of being deterred, with the Right Honourable Baronet, by the experience of that Committee, from going before another upon this Bill, I am the more anxious, from my recollection of the proceedings of that Committee, that we should be permitted to do so, certain as I am, that, in this, as I conceive we did in the former case, we should come to whatever decision would be most advantageous for the town of Nottingham. I cannot but express my surprise at the quarter from which the opposition to this Bill comes. I scarcely expected to find the Right Honourable Baronet, who is known to possess such liberal principles, standing forward as the friend of monopoly, and attempting to keep in darkness, instead of enlightening, the good people of Nottingham. Alas! Sir, I am afraid that, after all, Liberals are but flesh and blood, and that, when shares of 50l. have risen to 115l., they are anxious, still, that they should get up to 150l. The case, Sir, has been so ably stated by my Honourable and Gallant Friend, that I do not feel myself called upon to go into it. I shall only observe, that the present company appears to me to be somewhat like the Tories of old; and that you can say of it what has been said of them, "that it has struggled long to keep those privileges for which it was wholly unequal, and that the time is at last come, when it must consent to admit others to participate in the work it has hitherto so inadequately performed."

Mr. M. ATTWOOD. — The argument of the Honourable and Gallant Colonel has mainly tended to this, — that we ought not to depart from the usual course of allowing the Bill to be investigated before a Committee. But, Sir, unless a strong case be made out, — which, certainly, has not been done in this instance, — I see no reason why we should not refuse to follow that precedent, and to take that course. What is the fact? The gas company of Nottingham have been placed, by the House of Commons, under certain regulations and restrictions. They were not given unlimited power to establish themselves in the town, and tax the inhabitants to any extent; but, in consideration of the power thus received, they were obliged to restrain themselves to a certain rate of profit; so that the charge to the inhabitants could not go beyond what would afford a moderate return upon the capital invested. When, therefore, an application is made to allow another company to be established, it is not to be treated as if it were an application to upset a monopoly. It is stated, in the petition which I presented this evening against the Bill, that, so far from the present company having heretofore had a profit of 10 per cent. on their capital (the amount to which they were restrained by this House), the whole profits had not averaged 6½ per cent. since the company was established. No one will say that that is more than an adequate return upon the capital from the time of its investment; and I certainly think it would be very unfair to allow another company to compete with it now that the town of Nottingham presents a more favourable prospect. The promoters of this Bill do not say that the present company have not fulfilled their obligations, or that they have supplied bad gas, or charged an immoderate price for it to the inhabitants. Great incivility on the part of the company's servants is their only complaint. The prices charged by this company are actually lower than the average prices throughout the kingdom. The company have, in every respect, acted up to the principles upon which they were established. The company it is proposed to establish may, no doubt, supply gas to certain districts, not included in the original undertaking of the existing company; but as that is the only additional advantage to be gained by the Bill, let the Bill be confined to that object, and then, perhaps, there will be no objection to it.

The EARL of LINCOLN. — The speeches of the Right Honourable Baronet and my Honourable Friend who has just spoken show, I think, how necessary it is, in all other cases, as well as in this, not to oppose the second reading of the Bill, but to send it before a Committee. My Honourable Friend, in the few observations he addressed to the House, made several misstatements, which, I think, I can very briefly refute. My Honourable Friend said, that the company has not failed in any one object for which it was incorporated. We do not say it has; but we do say, that, having been incorporated to meet the wants of 40,000 inhabitants, it is incompetent to supply those of 90,000. We admit that the company has done everything in its power; but we contend that it is inadequate to the necessities of the town. My Honourable Friend called upon the House not to sanction another company, now that the town of Nottingham presents a prospect of larger profits than the present company has hitherto enjoyed; which my Honourable Friend stated to have been only 6½ per cent. Now, if we are allowed to go before a Committee, I will undertake to prove a fact which, I think, will throw a very fair doubt upon that assertion. I will undertake to prove, that 50*l.* shares have, very recently, been sold for 115*l.*, at least. Surely, under such circumstances, the dividend must be greater than 6½ per cent.; and, surely, such a fact entitles us to call upon the House to allow this Bill to be sifted by a Committee. We do not complain of this company as a monopoly, but on account of its inability to do all that is requisite. We do not complain of its gas being bad; I know it is not so; but we complain of its not being able to supply all the inhabitants. As I have been informed, several manufacturers in Nottingham are, at this moment, manufacturing their own gas, at a great disadvantage and expense. Many of the suburbs, too, which, being united with the town, may be regarded as part of it, are without any light whatever. The Right Honourable Baronet alluded to the circumstance of lawyers being connected with this Bill. That I do not deny; but I deny, as he meant to insinuate, that it is a lawyers' job. A meeting, convened by advertisements inserted in both the Nottingham papers, was held at the Exchange, and was attended by persons of all ranks and politics; and the result of that meeting was the adoption of this measure. It cannot, therefore, be considered as one got up for the benefit of lawyers. I hope the House will consent to have its merits sifted before a Committee. Instead of throwing additional expense upon the parties, it may turn out to be a saving. If last year's Bill, for instance, had been rejected, as proposed by the Right Honourable Baronet (Sir J. C. Hobhouse), it would have been introduced this year again.

The House divided:—Ayes 58, Noes 59; Majority 1.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. ORD reported from the General Committee of Elections, —

> That the Committee have again taken into their most serious consideration the difficulties which have arisen in the course of their proceedings, and which were detailed to the House in their last Report.
> The Committee have already stated to the House their opinion, that it would be necessary for them, in consequence of those difficulties, to fix another and more distant day for choosing the Select Committee to try the Ludlow election petition; and, also, to make a corresponding change in the days fixed for choosing the Select Committees for the trial of election petitions standing on their list after the Ludlow election petition.
> After the fullest inquiry and most mature deliberation, the Committee have seen no reason to alter this opinion. They have accordingly directed notices to be given to the parties in the Ludlow and Ipswich petitions, that they will proceed to nominate the Select Committee in those cases on Monday, the 30th day of March instant; and to the parties in the Totness and Cambridge petitions, that they will proceed to nominate the Select Committees in those cases on Monday, the 6th day of April next. They have also directed a notice to be published with the Votes, according to the provisions of the Act, of the weeks appointed for the choice of Select Committees for the petitions above-mentioned, and of the panels from which Committees will be chosen to try such petitions; — viz., the Committees for the Ludlow and Ipswich petitions from Panel No. 1.; and the Committees for the Totness and Cambridge petitions from Panel No. 2.
> The Committee are persuaded that, in taking this course, they have not acted in contravention of the Act; but, considering the doubts expressed by high legal authorities in the House as to its construction, they have thought it right to report to the House the course which they have adopted, in order to give the House the opportunity, if it should think it necessary, of removing, by a legislative enactment, all doubts which may exist as to the legality of the proceedings of the Committee in the above cases.

Report to lie on the table, and to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS,

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act for naturalising Friedrich Ludwig Leopold Hausburg."

Also, a Bill, intituled, "An Act for naturalising August Wilhelm Bernhard Promoli."

FOREIGN POSTAGE.

Mr. H. FITZROY. — I wish to put a question to the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the subject of the new postage regulations.

I find that if a letter be sent to Dover, it is charged a penny; but if the letter be sent to Paris, the postage, as far as Dover, is charged, as formerly, 10*d.* I want to know the reason for this distinction. Again, I find, if I post the Votes of the House, and put my name on the cover, that they go free; but if I am away from London, I cannot receive them postage free. Now, I wish to ask whether Members will be allowed to receive the Votes alone free from postage?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The Honourable Gentleman is quite correct in stating that the home postage to Dover is a penny; but the postage on a foreign letter is fixed under a treaty; and by that treaty the postage to Dover is 10*d.* The subject of the foreign postages has not escaped the attention of the Government; and more especially with regard to France, with whom we are now in negotiation,—the object being to obtain from foreign Governments a reduction in their rate of postage.

Mr. H. FITZROY. — I beg the Right Honourable Gentleman's pardon, but he has misapprehended the purport of my first question. My question did not relate to the rate of postage on the other side of the water, but to the charge to and from Dover in this country; and I see no reason why the same rate should not be paid in all cases.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — That is just what I do not want to do. My object is, to have something to give the French Government in return; and both Governments are now, in a friendly way, settling what reductions shall be made. With regard to what the Honourable Gentleman has stated respecting the transmission of the Votes, I shall be very glad if I can find any one who will enter into an inquiry upon the subject with me, to whom I can explain the reasons for the regulations which have been adopted; but I am sure that when the privilege of franking was given up, it was never intended that it should be renewed for the benefit of this House alone.

OPIUM TRADE (CHINA).

Mr. HERRIES. — I wish to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman whether the accounts which have been sent into the Treasury by the merchants who claim compensation for the opium which was surrendered to the Chinese authorities at Canton, include any quantity over and above that which was delivered up to the superintendent in the first instance?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — No; only that which was surrendered in the first instance.

PRINTED PAPERS — MR. SHERIFF EVANS.

CAPTAIN POLHILL. — I do not know whether I am in order, or not; but I must throw myself on the indulgence of the House. The motion of which I have given notice, "That Mr. Sheriff Evans be discharged from custody on his parole," is the last on the list notices for to-day; but I do trust the House will grant its indulgence so far as to allow me to bring it forward now. The case is one of very great importance.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

Of course, if the House decide that my motion shall only come on in its rotation, I must submit. It is well known —

[" Cries of "Order, order!" and "Chair!"]

The SPEAKER. — If the House think proper to allow the motion of the Honourable Member to take precedence, undoubtedly it is competent for them to do so; but as the question to which the Honourable Member desires to call the attention of the House is not one of privilege, I apprehend that it can only be brought forward in its due course, except by permission of the House.

CAPTAIN POLHILL. — I am aware, Sir, that such is the rule; but I hope, in a case of this description —

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — Order, order!

CAPTAIN POLHILL. — Of course, if the opinion of the House be against me, I must bow to their decision.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. STEPHENSON — PLURALITY OF OFFICES.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET. — In rising to move for certain papers relating to the appointment of Mr. Stephenson to the offices of Commissioner of Arbitration and Commissioner of Excise, I will proceed to explain the reasons which have induced me to call for those papers. I am well aware that the motion I am about to submit to the House is not one involving great pecuniary considerations; it goes, rather, to an inquiry into the inefficient and improper system under which the revenues of this country are conducted, than to any specific amount. But, although the pecuniary amount be small, it yet involves questions of a serious nature, touching public economy and public justice; and, if I am correctly informed, the course which has been followed, in respect to the case which, by these papers, will be brought under the notice of the House, is so contrary to all the rules which have been laid down by all parties in the House, by Reports of Committees and other authorities, and to the practice of all other Commissions, that I feel it very difficult to bring myself to believe the facts are as they have been stated to me. Indeed, if I had not heard from the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, that Mr. Stephenson had received a salary of 1200*l.* a-year, as Commissioner of Excise, in addition to a salary of 1000*l.*, as Commissioner of Arbitration, the statement would have appeared so incredible to me, that I should hardly have felt myself justified in bringing forward this motion. The Right Honourable Gentleman, in reply to a question that I put to him, on a former occasion, said that Mr. Stephenson had been for two years concerned both as a Commissioner of Excise and a Commissioner of Arbitration, and had received a certain portion of the salary of each. This, as I understood it, was the statement of the Right Honourable Gentleman; and on that statement I proceed. By the Act which first authorised the appointment of the Arbitration Commission, under the sanction of the Great Seal, that Commission might consist of not fewer than five, or more than eight, Commissioners; but, whether more than five were appointed or not, three only could receive payment on account of the office; such payment being made under the orders of the Treasury Board. The five unpaid Commissioners, who were appointed on the establishment of this Commission, were, most of them, if not all, connected in some way with other official business; among them was Mr. Lefevre, the brother of the Right Honourable Gentleman who now so ably fills the chair of this House, Mr. Stewart, and others. There was, also, another gentleman, a Mr. Amyot, connected with the Commission, who received no salary as a Commissioner, but who also held the office of Registrar of Slaves, for which he was paid a salary of 800*l.* a-year. The Commission of which I speak was intrusted with duties of a more than ordinarily onerous nature, and with the most extensive, and what, in other cases, might be considered as extraordinary, powers. In the first place, they had to apportion the twenty millions of money that was granted by this country as compensation to the slave owners, first, to the various slave colonies, and then to the individual owners. They were, consequently, armed with very large powers, — they could compel attendance, — they could enforce an oath, which oath was liable to all the pains and penalties of perjury, — and, in short, their duties and their powers were so extensive as to place them more in the position and authority of both judge and jury than, perhaps, any other Commission. I make no complaint of the manner in which the Commissioners have performed their task. I believe that they have given general satisfaction. I have not heard one word against their decisions. The three paid Commissioners were, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Elwin, and Mr. Stephenson, up to the latter end of the year 1838, when one of those gentlemen (Mr. Stephenson) was appointed a Commissioner of Excise. The date of that appointment was, I believe, September, in that year. Now, the first and natural impression would be, that, on his appointment to the Commissionership of Excise, he vacated his place, as a paid Commissioner, at the Board of Arbitration; and that that was his own impression, there is every ground for supposing, from the fact that he immediately proceeded to take a formal leave of his brother Commissioners of the Arbitration Board. But even that is not all; for we find that, in the following month of October, in the same year, Mr. Amyot, who had, up to that period, acted as an unpaid Commissioner, received an official intimation that he was to succeed to the paid Commissionership vacated by Mr. Stephenson; and it appears, further, that Mr. Stephenson received, in October, 1838, the fraction of salary due to him, up to that time, as Commissioner of Arbitration. Subsequently, however, it appears, that Lord Glenelg was induced to recall his recommendation of Mr. Amyot. I say recommendation, because the Secretary of State had not the power absolutely to appoint,— he could only recommend to the Crown, I find that if a letter be sent to Dover, it is charged a penny; but if the letter be sent to Paris, the postage, as far as Dover, is charged, as formerly, 10*d.* I want to know the reason for this distinction. Again, I find, if I post the Votes of the House, and put my name on the cover, that they go free; but if I am away from London, I cannot receive them postage free. Now, I wish to ask whether Members will be allowed to receive the Votes alone free from postage?

APPOINTMENT OF MR. STEPHENSON — PLURALITY OF OFFICES.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET. — In rising to move for certain papers relating to the appointment of Mr. Stephenson to the offices of Commissioner of Arbitration and Commissioner of Excise, I will proceed to explain the reasons which have induced me to call for those papers. I am well aware that the motion I am about to submit to the House is not one involving great pecuniary considerations; it goes, rather, to an inquiry into the inefficient and improper system under which the revenues of this country are conducted, than to any specific amount. Now, the first and natural impression would be, that, on his appointment to the Commissionership of Excise, he vacated his place, as a paid Commissioner, at the Board of Arbitration; and that that was his own impression, there is every ground for supposing, from the fact that he immediately proceeded to take a formal leave of his brother Commissioners of the Arbitration Board. But even that is not all; for we find that, in the following month of October, in the same year, Mr. Amyot, who had, up to that period, acted as an unpaid Commissioner, received an official intimation that he was to succeed to the paid Commissionership vacated by Mr. Stephenson; and it appears, further, that Mr. Stephenson received, in October, 1838, the fraction of salary due to him, up to that time, as Commissioner of Arbitration. Subsequently, however, it appears, that Lord Glenelg was induced to recall his recommendation of Mr. Amyot. I say recommendation, because the Secretary of State had not the power absolutely to appoint, — he could only recommend to the Crown, which would, always, no doubt, act on his recommendation. Last winter, it happened that a sudden stoppage of the payment of the salaries of the Commissioners took place, and some inquiry was instituted which led to the knowledge of the fact that Mr. Stephenson was to receive the whole year's salary, from October, 1838, to October, 1839, as Commissioner of Arbitration: so that, in point of fact, he was in the receipt of 1200*l.* a-year, as Commissioner of Excise, and of 1000*l.* a-year, as Commissioner of Arbitration, contemporaneously. Now, if rumour can be depended on, the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite took the same view of this subject as I myself take, and made, at the time, the most vigorous, though ineffectual, efforts to withstand the pressure put on him to allow Mr. Stephenson the salary of 1000*l.* a-year in addition to his salary as Commissioner of Excise. Had Lord Glenelg's arrangement been adhered to, and Mr. Amyot's appointment confirmed, the country would have saved the salary of 800*l.* a-year, which that gentleman receives as Registrar of Slaves. It may be said, that Mr. Stephenson is a person of extraordinary powers and great aptitude for business; and that, therefore, he was fully equal to perform the duties of the two Commissionerships. I have already stated to the House what is the business of the Arbitration Board. It is, in every respect, judicial. The duties of that board consist in determining legal questions, — in the examination of witnesses, — in balancing the value of separate pieces of evidence, documentary and otherwise; and they consist, likewise, in the examination of witnesses vivâ voce. This statement is not founded upon mere matter of opinion, or of conjecture; it is a simple statement of facts notorious in every quarter where the proceedings of the Arbitration Board have ever become a subject of interest.

Now, I want to know how any one could possibly discharge such duties as those I have mentioned, and be, at the same time, constantly absent, which, as an Excise Commissioner, he must necessarily be, from that place, and that only place, at which they could be discharged? It might as well be said that the judges of the courts at Westminster could walk in and walk out while an important legal argument was going forward, and, after having been absent three parts of the day, walk in and sign an award in favour of one party or the other, — as that any person, efficiently and properly discharging the duties intrusted to Mr. Stephenson at the Board of Excise, could, at the same time, satisfactorily, either to himself or the claimants, pronounce upon questions of arbitration, under the Slave Compensation Act. It may be said that, as Mr. Stephenson was so well acquainted with all the questions which the Arbitration Board had to decide, he was the most proper person to be continued as a member of that board. But, admitting, to the full extent, Mr. Stephenson's ability, and the great value of his services at the Arbitration Board, I conceive that to be a reason why he should have been kept exclusively to that office, and why his time should not have been taken up, and his attention diverted, by the duties belonging to the office of an Excise Commissioner. The Government ought not, if there were questions still pending before the Board of Arbitration, in which Mr. Stephenson had taken a great interest, and the details of which he was better acquainted with than any other person, to have transferred his services to any other office, on account of any convenience or preference, on his part, until those questions had been decided. But let the House see the impossibility of any person performing the duties of the two offices contemporaneously. The hours of attendance to be given at the two places where Mr. Stephenson, according to the prescribed rules and regulations of his two offices, was bound to be present, are,—at the Excise Office, from ten o'clock in the morning till three in the afternoon; and at the office of the Commissioners of Arbitration, the hours of attendance were to be from eleven o'clock till four; consequently, Mr. Stephenson must have been often absent either from the one board or the other. It is clear that no person could, at one and the same time, discharge the duties of both. I apprehend that no man will attempt to say that the Commissioners of Arbitration ought, at any time, to be absent from their posts. Is the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, prepared to assert that the Commissioners of Excise have no duties to perform? Is it not, on the contrary, a matter well known to the generality of the Members of this House, that the duties of the Board of Excise are peculiarly onerous? And I believe I am quite correct in saying that no Government ever — openly at least — sanctioned such a combination of two offices so obviously incompatible with each other, before. To show the nature of the duties of the Excise Board, I need only refer to the Treasury Minute of 1835, the period when the present rate of salary of the Excise Commissioners was fixed. It is stated, in that Minute, that the complication of the law relating to that department of the revenue (the Excise) was such, and the number of traders who were constantly brought before them was so great, as to render the constant attendance of the Commissioners necessary. I may be told that it would have been very hard on Mr. Stephenson, an efficient and valuable public officer, to have deprived him — when the vacancy occurred at the Excise Board, where the salary was 200*l.* a-year more than he was then receiving as Commissioner of Arbitration — of the opportunity of transferring his services to a more lucrative office. That, perhaps, might be a good argument with the Government for giving Mr. Stephenson the appointment; but, if so, and they thought that his occasional attendance, for a short time, at the Arbitration Board was necessary, why did they not adopt that which is, I believe, the invariable course in similar cases, — pay Mr. Stephenson the salary belonging to the one office only? I ask the Government, on what public grounds they can justify their conduct in paying to a gentleman 1000*l.* a-year for the discharge of the duties of an office requiring his whole time and attention, at the same time that they were paying him 1200*l.* a-year salary on account of another office, which, also, required his full time and attention?

There is rather a curious point connected with this subject, to which I shall now take the liberty of directing the attention of the House. The Commissioners of Arbitration were (as Honourable Gentlemen are aware) appointed under an Act of Parliament. Had the Board of Treasury attended to the express provisions of that Act, the grounds of complaint upon which I rest my motion would, in all probability, not have arisen. If they had carried out, as they ought to have done, the provisions of that Act, one very remarkable feature would have been removed from the present case. In the same Act, in which there is a provision for the payment of the Commissioners, it is laid down that, every five years, an account shall be rendered to Parliament of the expenses incurred under the authority of that Act. But, notwithstanding the Commission has sat during five years, no such account has yet been rendered. I will not say that the account has been withheld for the purpose of effecting any such object as that which I now make the subject of complaint; but this I will say, that, if a job were intended, nothing could be more favourable to its accomplishment than the circumstance of the account never having been furnished. I repeat, that I impute the absence of the account to no such motive; but, nevertheless, I cannot help noticing the circumstance as exceedingly suspicious. I do not accuse Her Majesty's Government of intentional violation of an Act of Parliament; but I do accuse them of having neglected to comply with a clear and distinct, and, at the same time, a most important provision, of the Act of Parliament which has immediate and direct reference to the matter in question. The provision to which I have alluded was introduced for the purpose of checking improper and useless expenditure; and I must say, that the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer forgot his duty, when he neglected to resist the importunity of the First Lord of the Treasury to grant this 1000*l.* a-year to Mr. Stevenson after his acceptance of the seat at the Excise Board, in not impressing upon that Noble Lord the fact that there was an Act of Parliament in existence requiring them to lay an account before Parliament, which account would be open to question by the House of Commons. I am quite sure, if the Right Honourable Gentleman had made such a representation, the Noble Lord at the head of the Treasury would not have pressed his recommendation. I cannot help very much regretting that Mr. Stephenson should ever have been induced to accept the second situation; or, at all events, to have taken the additional salary. And, on the other hand, I think the Treasury are much more to blame for allowing it. I hope, however, that, as far as Mr. Stephenson is concerned, one advantage will arise out of this discussion; and that he will take a lesson from his own case, and never allow any one of his subordinate officers to hold two situations at one time, receiving a salary from each. But, as regards the Board of Treasury, I cannot but consider their conduct, in paying the money, as a monstrous dereliction of duty. I know of no greater fault that could be committed by them, nor do I know an instance in which less disposition has been shown to avoid an improper and needless expenditure of the public money; and that, too, not only against the often-declared principles of economy which the present Ministry profess, but against (as I contend it is) the express provisions of an Act of Parliament. If I am wrong in any of the statements I have made to the House in reference to this matter, — if it should be said by the Right Honourable Gentleman that the whole accusation has originated in a mistake, — then my reply will be, that the fault does not lie with me, but with the Treasury Board, in having neglected to comply with that provision of the Act of Parliament which requires that the information should be laid on the table of this House. Now, what is the real state of the case? In the first place, here is an often-declared and most important principle broken in upon, by permitting a member of that which is the highest paid of all the revenue boards to hold another office in plurality; and not only that, but you give him 1000*l.* a-year on account of such extra office, in addition to his salary of 1200*l.* a-year as an Excise Commissioner. Thus, assuming that Mr. Stephenson — who, as a Commissioner of Excise, is bound to dedicate the whole of his time and attention to the service of that department, consistently with a reasonable care of his own private affairs, and a fair allowance for recreation — had so much of spare time on his hands as to enable him to perform the duties of another important office, which duties had been estimated as of the value of 1000*l.* a-year; then, accordingly, Mr. Stephenson receives, for one year's services, no less a sum than 2200*l.* Never, since any attention has been paid by Parliament to the expenditure of the public money, — certainly never within the last five-and-twenty years, — has any similar case occurred. No doubt there have been instances of men holding more than one situation; but then they were situations in which the duties were small, and the emoluments small; therefore, the precedent which they supply can be of no value in the consideration of such a case as the present. Here you appoint a gentleman to a class of office which is paid at a higher rate than any other similar office in the country, on the ground of the onerous nature of the duties, and the full occupation of the time of the officer; and yet you give, in addition, to the same person, another office, also requiring the whole time and attention of the officer, with a salary of 1000*l.* a-year. I say this is contrary to all principle, and to all precedent; and I further maintain that, by reason of the non-compliance, on the part of the Treasury, with the Act of Parliament, in this case, the country is a loser to the amount of 800*l.* a-year, as I have already explained. But this, after all, is a matter of secondary importance to the principle which has here been infringed upon; namely, that, with regard to all the revenue boards, the members of those boards should devote, not merely the mere office hours, but their whole time and attention, to the making themselves masters of the business of their respective departments. In thus bringing the case under the notice of the House, I have studiously refrained from any exaggeration. I have endeavoured to state the circumstances as accurately as possible; but, in the absence of those official documents to which I ought to have access, I, of course, cannot answer for the correctness of every statement I have made. I trust, however, it will be felt that I have made out a sufficient case to justify my calling upon her Majesty's Government for some explanation of the circumstances I have mentioned, and also for the production of the papers for which I am about to move.

With regard to that portion of the Return which refers to the Marquess of Normanby, as Secretary of State, I will not press for that. I beg now, Sir, to move, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that she will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House a Return of all persons appointed to be paid Commissioners of Arbitration under the powers of the Act 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 73.; stating their names, the dates of their appointments, the salaries and emoluments to be paid to each of them, and the payments made to them, respectively, on account thereof; the dates of the said payments, and the authority under which such payments have been made:

Return of any other office (if any) in the public service held by each of the said paid Commissioners of Arbitration; specifying the date of appointment to each office respectively, the salaries and emoluments payable, and the salaries and emoluments paid, in consequence of such other office; together with the dates of payment in each case:

Copy of any warrant or warrants by which any payments have been made to Mr. Stephenson, as Commissioner of Arbitration, since the appointment of Mr. Stephenson to be a Commissioner of the Board of Excise:

Copies of any communications from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Lord Glenelg, to the Board of Treasury, or to the Board of Arbitration Commissioners, in reference to the appointment of Mr. Amyot to be a paid Commissioner of Arbitration:

Copies of any communications from the Secretary of State for the Colonies to the Board of Treasury or the Board of Arbitration Commissioners, in reference to Mr. Stephenson continuing to receive salary as a paid Commissioner of Arbitration, since Mr. Stephenson's appointment as a Commissioner of the Board of Excise."

Upon the question being put from the chair, —

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said: — The Noble Lord must be perfectly well aware that it is not my intention to object to the production of the Returns for which he has moved. Not only those, but every other document relating to the case to which the Noble Lord has directed the attention of the House, will, with the greatest pleasure, be laid on the table. But, notwithstanding this willingness, on the part of the Treasury, to produce all the information in their power, the Noble Lord has thought fit to argue the case in the absence of any kind of evidence. For my own part, I should have wished to have abstained from offering a single observation on the subject, until the House itself was in a condition to judge on this matter, with all the proper documents before it; but, as the Noble Lord has pointed his attack so particularly at me, I trust the House will permit me to make a short statement in reply; assuring the House that my statement will be fully outborne by the documents, when propuced. I wish, however, before adverting to the particular case which the Noble Lord has brought forward, to state what was the arrangement with respect to these Commissioners, — an arrangement not made by me, but by a Treasury minute. It was this: — the Commissioners were to be paid, not an annual salary, but a certain fixed payment, estimated according to the amount of the labour required, and the extent of the business to be done. When the Arbitration Commission was first appointed, the exact nature and extent of the business that would be brought before them could not be exactly calculated; but it was supposed that their labours would extend over a period of about three years; and the understanding was, that they should report from time to time to the Treasury the amount of business done; and upon those Reports the Treasury have been in the habit of issuing payment to the Commissioners, — not as salary, but pro ratâ, according to the work done. In this sense, Mr. Stephenson has been paid, on account of his labours in one year, the sum of 1000*l.*; but in this sense only: he cannot be said to have received 1000*l.* a-year salary. The Noble Lord has done no more than justice, in saying that the labours of the Commissioners of Arbitration have been well and efficiently performed; there is no one connected with the West India interest who would gainsay that statement: on the contrary, I am sure that the members of that body would be most willing to bear testimony to the truth of that observation. I believe there never was a Commission that had more delicate and more important duties placed in their hands, and who have attended more assiduously, and given more general satisfaction to the country than this; and I may here add, that a distinguished member of the legal profession has stated that the manner in which the Commissioners have performed those duties, and decided upon the difficult and often complicated legal questions that from time to time have been brought before them, might serve as an example to some of the courts of law. I will now proceed to state the case, as regards Mr. Stephenson. That gentleman was appointed, as has been stated, to the office of Excise Commissioner in the month of October, 1838, — he continuing to afford occasional assistance at the Board of Arbitration. In the autumn of last year, the Report of the Commissioners of Arbitration was laid before the Treasury, together with an application for such allowance to the Commissioners as the Treasury should think fit to grant. That Report brought two points to my notice. The first was, that the business of the Commission was in that state which I thought would justify me in recommending that the necessary notices should be issued, and the labours of the Commission brought to a close at an early period. Accordingly, I communicated with my Noble Friend upon the subject; and the result is, that notices have been issued, stating that the Commission will close on the 1st of January, 1841. The next point that was brought under my notice by the Report I have alluded to was, the fact that the name of Mr. Stephenson still appeared on the list of Commissioners. The Noble Lord opposite has been good enough to do me more than credit, in supposing that there was a contest on this point, and with regard to Mr. Stephenson, between me and my Noble Friend at the head of the Government. The Noble Lord is very much mistaken. The moment that the matter was brought before me, I felt the difficulty of permitting one gentleman to hold two high offices. I made inquiry into the subject; and I then wrote to my Noble Friend, stating my opinion that it should be put an end to for the future; and, so far from receiving a remonstrance from my Noble Friend, in favour of Mr. Stephenson, my Noble Friend desired me to proceed as I thought right and proper. I mention this, because the Noble Lord has imagined that I had some difference with my Noble Friend upon this point. I then sent for Mr. Stephenson, and told him of the objectionI felt,—that I did not think it right that one person should receive the salaries of two high-paid offices; and it is but just to Mr. Stephenson to state, that there never was a communication received in a more honourable or creditable manner. Mr. Stephenson entreated me to take the matter in my own hands, and he was ready to abide by my decision. He thought — and in that we agreed — that he should be allowed to bring to a close the labours of the Commission on which he had been so successfully engaged; and he stated that he was willing to continue his assistance as a Commissioner, either with the payment of any reasonable sum I might propose, or without any payment at all.

I will now state the grounds on which I determined for continuing Mr. Stephenson as a Commissioner. In the first place, the Commissioners were to be paid by the amount of the labours actually performed by them; and, upon inquiry, I found that which all must perceive on looking at the different years, that the duties of the Commission, up to the middle of the year 1838, had been of the most laborious and important character; and that, from that period, the labour had materially diminished, and would continue to do so to the close of the Commission. The great mass of the work had been already performed; and I saw clearly that, if Mr. Stephenson had then retired, the amount of time employed could form no criterion of the amount of labour that still remained to be done. It was not a question of salary that I was considering, but what was fairly due to Mr. Stephension, — not only for the remaining period of the Commission, but for the services he had already performed. I may have been wrong; but this consideration certainly influenced the decision to which I arrived. I also considered that it was an advantage to the public service, in a Commission which has to decide cases of a judicial nature, and which had hitherto proceeded to the public satisfaction, that Mr. Stephenson should give the aid of his continued services to the Commission; instead of appointing, in his stead, a stranger, who would either have to learn the duties from others, or who would sit by, a cypher, while the other Commissioners did the duties. Looking, then, to the labours which had been previously performed, and looking to the advantage of having the assistance of Mr. Stephenson for the remaining two years of the Commission, I thought I was fully justified in issuing — not 1000*l*. a-year, but — 1000*l*. I said to Mr. Stephenson, "I will not refuse to issue 1000*l*. in your favour; but it shall be the last issue, and upon the distinct understanding that you shall continue to perform the duties of a Commissioner of Arbitration until the termination of that Commission." I am bound to tell the House that I abide by that decision, and that I consider it but a fair and equitable settlement of the claims of Mr. Stephenson. If, then, I had to consider the case over again, my decision would be the same; but, suppose it an improper one, and that it was a case in which the appointment had been made, not by myself, but by my predecessor in office, — by the Noble Lord opposite, for instance, — I think my proper course would be to say, I will not act retrospectively in the matter, — I will not go back and undo that which my predecessors have done; but I will content myself with making provision for the future, so that such a case shall not occur again. That, I believe, has been the usual practice of former Governments. It is true, that my Noble Friend; Lord Glenelg, under a false impression that Mr. Stephenson was either about to resign or had resigned, wrote to Mr. Amyot, appointing him to the Commissionership; but that was under a misapprehension of the facts; and my Noble Friend, immediately on discovering his error, wrote an apology to Mr. Amyot, and begged to withdraw the letter of appointment. There are, I believe, some letters upon this point in existence, which will satisfactorily prove this part of the case. With regard to Mr. Amyot, I must beg to be understood as having no wish to draw a comparison between two public officers; but I may be permitted to say, that the cases which come before the Commissioners of Arbitration for their adjudication are of a peculiar and complicated nature, and such as require to be decided upon by persons cognisant both of the principles and practice of law. The Commissioners, in fact, sit as judges, and have to decide legal questions, and go into evidence on the various claims that are laid before them. Now, without wishing to speak of Mr. Amyot in any other than terms of the highest respect and esteem, I must say that I did not consider that gentleman, who had not had the advantage of a legal education, the fittest person to be appointed in the room of Mr. Stephenson; and if he had been appointed, he would have been placed in the position of deciding upon points of a legal nature, possibly to the dissatisfaction both of himself and the claimants; or, on the other hand, he must have sat at the board as a mere cypher.

The Noble Lord (Lord G. Somerset) has said that, from the nature of the business of the Board of Arbitration, it is necessary that Mr. Stephenson should be in constant attendance. But that is not exactly the case. When the board was first appointed, the amount of business that came before it certainly required the constant attendance of the Commissioners; but it is not so now. At present, the great majority of the claims having been already decided, the cases which Mr. Stephenson has to decide are principally upon the reports of the officers of the colonies; and, of course, as evidence is not taken, much less attendance, on the part of the Commissioner, will suffice. I am enabled to state to the House, on the authority of the other Commissioners, that not only is there no inconvenience experienced from the small extent of the attendance which Mr. Stephenson is now enabled to give; but that the business of the board has never been more effectually transacted than at the present time. The principle for which the Noble Lord contends, as I understand, is, that no salaried Commissioner should be allowed to hold two offices at one time, he receiving a salary from both; and that, for an Excise Commissioner to hold another paid office, is a principle that no previous Treasury Board had admitted. Now, I will confine myself to the department of the Excise, and refer to an authority for which the Noble Lord opposite (Lord G. Somerset) must entertain a great respect, — namely, a Return that was made during the period that my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Pembroke was a Lord of the Treasury. Now, I find, in the first place, that Lord George Seymour was appointed to the office of chairman of the Board of Excise Commission, while he held another office of great emolument, although the duties were very trifling, — the office of Chief Wharfinger of Ireland. Then the deputy chairman of the same Board of Excise, Colonel Sir T. Doyle, he also held, in addition, the office of Deputy Lieutenant of the Tower, at a salary of 765*l*. a-year; and that appointment was made in 1826, a time when the Noble Lord opposite was himself a Lord of the Treasury. Again, there was Mr. Greville, who had held the office of Comptroller of Excise and receiver of taxes for the county of Nottingham, — an office, the duties of which, above all others, should be performed in person: he enjoyed, in addition, the situation of Secretary for the Island of Tobago. But, I will not go beyond the department of Excise, — and the next name I find, is that of Mr. Finch Hatton, who, under the Administration of which the Noble Lord was a member, held the office of the inspector of teas in the Excise; — he filled, at the same time, the office of Commissioner of Stamps. Again, Mr. Jenkinson was Registrar of Excise — that is, registrar of the decisions of the board, when they sit judicially; also, a receiver of stamps, and Lieutenant of Dover Castle. Then there is the case of Mr. Wilmot, who was a distributor of stamps, in the Excise, at a salary of 1000*l*. a-year, and who held, in addition, the office of Receiver General of the Post Office, at a salary of 800*l*. a-year. All these appointments took place during the period in which the Noble Lord opposite held office. I quote these cases, not in defence of the principle, but to show that it is not one that has been introduced by the present Government; but that it was acted upon, in many instances, by their predecessors in office. I am quite sure, that when the papers shall be laid before the House, they will be found perfectly satisfactory to the Noble Lord, and that the pecuniary arrangement was made, not personally by me, but by a Treasury minute. I wish to produce all the papers connected with the transaction; and I will therefore add to the Returns for which my Noble Friend has moved, "a copy of any minute of the Board of Treasury in respect to the payment of any sums of money to Mr. Stephenson, as Commissioner of Arbitration since the appointment of Mr. Stephenson as a Commissioner of the Board of Excise, and in respect of the duration of the said Commission of Arbitration;" which I beg to move by way of amendment, in addition to my Noble Friend's motion.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

MR. GOULBURN. — As there is no objection to the production of the papers for which my Noble Friend has moved, I will not, on the present occasion, enter into any discussion upon the general merits of the case. But I cannot refrain from expressing my surprise that my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have thought it necessary to complain of the statement which my Noble Friend has made, in support of his motion. If my Noble Friend (Lord

G. Somerset) had merely brought forward the case, without stating grounds for so doing, he would have been open to the accusation of having submitted a motion for which he could not make out a case. My Noble Friend, therefore, was, in my opinion, fully justified in the course he has thought proper to pursue. My Noble Friend has stated, very explicitly and very accurately, the grounds of the charge against the Government; and I must, with all respect, add, that my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made a very feeble and insufficient reply.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I will state my reasons for saying so. If I correctly understand my Right Honourable Friend's argument, he does not deny that it is customary to allow to the Commissioners of Arbitration a certain amount of money, on account, in the month of October; and that when Mr. Stephenson applied to him, — he having been appointed to the Excise Commissionership in September, 1838, — my Right Honourable Friend considered that he was entitled to a larger proportion of remuneration, because the business of the Board of Arbitration, up to the middle of 1838, had been far more laborious than it could be from thence to the expiration of the Commission. I think this reply shows a sufficient reason for asking the grounds upon which the payment has been made. But the charge is, not that the Treasury have paid Mr. Stephenson for business done up to the middle of the year 1838, — important as every one admits that business to be; — the charge is, that, in 1839, Mr. Stephenson, being, in the mean time, in the discharge of his duty as a Commissioner of Excise, you (the Government) made him a further payment as a Commissioner of Arbitration. That is the charge; and to that, no reply has been given. The Right Honourable Gentleman has told us, that much inconvenience would have arisen if he had introduced, as the successor of Mr. Stephenson, at that subsequent period of the Commission, a stranger to the office. But Lord Glenelg guarded expressly against that contingency when he appointed Mr. Amyot, who was a man of great ability and talent, and in every way a most efficient person, and who had, moreover, been for some time acting at the board as an unpaid Commissioner. I therefore think, with Lord Glenelg, that Mr. Amyot was the person most calculated to supply the place of Mr. Stephenson; and, if he had been appointed, the country would have been saved a salary of 800*l*. a-year. But that was not done, and Mr. Stephenson was retained in his office, and is now receiving the double salary. The Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer has endeavoured to get rid of this by a sort of tu quoque argument, in saying that we (the Opposition) have done the same thing in our time. But the cases the Right Honourable Gentleman has quoted do not bear him out. Lord George Seymour certainly held the sinecure office of Chief Wharfinger of Ireland, in addition to the Commissionership of Excise. It was the custom, when those large sinecure offices existed, for them to descend in reversion to the children of the holders; and it was in that way that Lord G. Seymour held the office in question. Such was the custom at the period to which I allude. I am not maintaining that that custom was correct; I am merely showing that the sinecure office which I have named was given to the Hertford family — improperly perhaps — but like any other gift, — for length of service, or some particular cause. And the principle of sinecure offices was recognised by the Legislature, when they allowed compensation for the loss of them. But no analogy can be drawn between the cases of Mr. Stephenson and Lord G. Seymour; because, to the office which the latter held, when he was appointed chairman of the Excise Board, there were no duties attached. He had no occasion to go to Dublin, to attend to the duties of his office there; — he had, in fact, nothing to do.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

But if Honourable Gentlemen opposite are now to make the holding of such offices by public servants in former days a plea for conferring upon persons a plurality of offices at present, they will inflict a far greater evil on the public than was suffered under the old practice; because, at that time, the duties of the one office were efficiently performed: but, under the system the Right Honourable Gentleman would introduce, the duties of the one office would so interfere with those of the other, that it would be impossible for the officer to perform either well. With respect to Colonel Doyle, who has also been referred to by my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the office of Lieutenant of the Tower, which he held, merely required that he should reside in the Tower during a certain part of the year. And I might argue that, while residing there, he (Colonel Doyle) was very near to his duties in the Excise Office. But it is also to be remembered that the Lieutenant of the Tower is an officer appointed, not by the Crown, but by the Governor of the Tower; and Colonel Doyle was appointed to that office by Lord Hastings, who was the Governor at the time. I will merely ask, on this point, — Parliament, in its wisdom, having thought fit to abolish sinecure offices, — are you now prepared to establish a new precedent, by giving to one officer two appointments and a double salary, when, as I maintain, it is absolutely impossible for that officer to perform the double duty? I will not enter further into the discussion of the subject until the papers shall be laid before the House.

Mr. HUME. — The Right Honourable Gentleman who has just spoken is perfectly right in saying that the Government have no right to put forward, as a defence for their proceedings, now, that those who preceded them acted improperly. But, as I understand the Right Honourable Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), he did cause inquiry o be made into this matter directly it was pointed out to him. There are circumstances, however, connected with this subject, that, in my opinion, render fur- her inquiry desirable; but, until the apers shall be laid before the House, I do not think we can be in a condition to pronounce any opinion, either one way or he other. I think, however, that if, as as been said by the Right Honourable he Chancellor of the Exchequer, a Commissioner of Excise has sufficient leisure o enable him to perform the duties of nother office, it is a sufficient reason for educing the number of those Commis- oners. There are, now, seven Commis- oners in the Excise; whereas, I believe, at three would be found amply sufficient do the duty. I also think that the umber of Commissioners of Customs ight very well be reduced to three, and at the present number of Stamp Com- issioners might also very properly be re- ced by one half. There are now, I be- ve, in the three departments I have entioned, no less than twenty-two Com- issioners. I think that number ought be reduced to nine; and I am confident at the business would be much better ne by that reduced number of Commis- oners than it is at present; for I have ways found that the fewer the number persons in any office, the more effi- ently are the duties of that office performed. I believe that many of the appointments that have taken place in the various departments of the revenue, have been made on the ground of political influence, and not on the ground of fitness of the parties.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — As the facts connected with this case cannot be accurately collected from the statement of the Noble Lord, I feel called upon to address a few observations to the House. The Noble Lord opposite has stated, that Mr. Amyot was interfered with in his office by Mr. Stephenson. Now, what are the facts? The facts I understand to be these: — Mr. Stephenson at first stated, that he did not think he could go on with the business as a Commissioner of Compensation; and then Lord Glenelg appointed Mr. Amyot. But, upon further consideration, as the business of the Commission was proceeding to its termination, Mr. Stephenson thought that he could go on advantageously with the remaining business, to which he was accustomed, until the completion of the labours of the Commission. Upon this, a communication was sent by Lord Glenelg to Mr. Amyot, apprising him that his appointment was withdrawn. The Noble Lord has said, that intimation was not given to Mr. Amyot of his appointment being withdrawn till some considerable time after the appointment of Mr. Stephenson to the Board of Excise. Now, that was not the fact; for Mr. Amyot was informed, in the course of the same month, of the decision that had been come to. The Noble Lord was likewise wrong in observing that the decision in Mr. Stephenson's case was come to in October, 1839; seeing that, in fact, it was settled in October, 1838. Now, I do not agree with the Noble Lord in looking upon this case as the case of a person holding two offices. Mr. Stephenson had been appointed to a Commission, which had already gone through a very considerable portion of its business. It is an admitted fact, that Messrs. Lewis, Elwin, and Stephenson performed their duties as Commissioners of Compensation in a most effective manner. Compensation, involving an amount of 20,000,000*l*., has been efficiently settled between the years 1835 and 1840; and when I compare this with the delays involving all decisions respecting property in courts of equity and law, I consider that Lord Glenelg was perfectly justified in not deranging that Commission; but, on the contrary, in leaving them to go through with the remainder of the cases. Up to August, 1838, the number of contested cases disposed of by the Commissioners, was 3853, and there remained only 1117 to be decided. The Commissioners had gone through a great part of their duties. The Noble Lord appears to suppose, with respect to those cases, that it was necessary that Mr. Stephenson should be always present, and that he must, consequently, neglect his duties as a Commissioner of Excise; but, in this, the Noble Lord is mistaken. With respect to disputed claims in the various colonies, deputy Commissioners were appointed to investigate those claims, and to report upon them. These Reports were drawn up with so much ability, and so much copiousness of detail, that they left the Commissioners little more to do than affirm those Reports. But with respect to many of those claims, there was very great difficulty, as different systems of law prevailed in various colonies, — the English, French, Spanish, and Dutch laws. A notion may be formed of the extent of the labours of this Commission, when it is stated that, in little more than three years, the Commissioners have determined claims to the amount of nearly 19,500,000*l.*; and, notwithstanding this amount of property adjudicated upon, in so many cases, not more than three effective appeals from these decisions were made to the Privy Council. Under those circumstances, Lord Glenelg thought that it would be far more beneficial that Mr. Stephenson, having performed his duties, hitherto, so efficiently, should be allowed to conclude the duties of the Commission, which were to terminate at the end of 1840. With respect to the statement of the Noble Lord, as to Mr. Stephenson receiving the salary, both as the Commissioner of Excise and of Arbitration, that was not exactly correct; because Mr. Stephenson, in the most proper manner, stated his readiness to perform the duties of a Commissioner of Arbitration, leaving it to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give him any remuneration, or not, as he thought proper. As to what has been stated by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, who seems to think that the public service is greatly neglected by the public servants, I feel bound to say, especially with reference to those who fill the subordinate stations, that, instead of reproaching them for not giving sufficient time to the public service, such is their zeal and assiduity, that I am often obliged to remark to them that they are actually ruining their health by the attention and exertion which they apply to the discharge of their duties.

LORD G. SOMERSET. — I do not by any means deny that the attention given to their duties by the subordinate officers is deserving of great praise. There is one point which appears, however, to be overlooked. It was provided by the Act of Parliament that the expense of this Commission should be annually laid before the House; but this the Chancellor of the Exchequer has neglected to do. I hope, in future, however, that this will not be the case; and that we shall have the accounts annually laid before us.

Mr. JOHN IRVING.—I feel bound to state to the House that I have had large experience of the manner in which these Commissioners have discharged their duties. I have been extensively engaged as a receiver of moneys, under the compensation fund, for parties abroad. I have been a receiver for the Crown colonies, and more especially for the Mauritius; and I feel it my duty to say that there never was a Commission whose duties were discharged with more ability, with greater promptitude, or with more decided efficiency, than were manifested by these gentlemen in dealing with, and adjudicating upon, the conflicting claims that came before them. I believe that no Commissioners could have more ably discharged their duty, or are more entitled to the thanks of the country at large. As a proof of the estimation in which they are held by the parties on whose claims they have adjudicated, I understand that it is the intention of those parties to present the Commissioners with a piece of plate, and also to present a memorial to the Government, stating that the remuneration they have received has been quite inadequate for the services rendered; and I am sure that this House will have no objection to authorise the Government to increase that remuneration.

The motion, as amended, was then agreed to.

ABOLITION OF THE PUNISHMENT OF DEATH.

Mr. Ewart presented a petition from Cheltenham, signed by 1319 persons, praying for the abolition of the punishment of death.

Similar petitions were presented by Sir R. Price, Mr. Aglionby, and Mr. Jervis, — from Cockermouth; Ross (Hereford); Bourn; Hanley and Shelton; Rickmansworth; and Chester.

Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EWART.—I confess I do not rise to address the House, on the present occasion, and to make the proposition of which I have given notice, without feelings of considerable emotion. I am urged o bring forward this subject by two con- iderations,— firstly, an increased convic- ion on my own mind of the soundness of he views I advocate; and, secondly, by the act that I know I am supported in them by nany of the best and wisest persons in the ingdom. I beg, at the outset, to declare hat, in what I have now to say, I totally iscard the religious view of the subject; eligion being, in my opinion, an unfit ubject to be profaned by the heat and nimosities of a political assembly. I hall also discard the abstract part of the uestion, as taken up by philosophic riters on various occasions. I shall set ut with this proposition, that society has right to inflict such an amount of punish- ent for crimes as is necessary for the fety and preservation of the state;—and o more. This extent of punishment is, erefore, a quantity varying according to mes and circumstances; and what I ow would beg the House to consider is, hether the punishment of death, in ex- eme cases, is now justified by the crite- on I have just set forth. I will beg, at ce, to turn to the statistical view of this uestion; and endeavour to show that the itigations which have, at various pe- ods, been made in the severity of the iminal law, have not tended to the in- ease, but rather to the diminution, of e particular crimes to which that miti- tion has been applied. In the metro- lis, in the ten years antecedent to the st ten years, there were 221 persons crificed to the sanguinary laws that isted at that period; whilst, in the last n years, the number of executions has en only 21; and yet society is in a ore secure state. The House will re- llect that, in 1833, a considerable miti- tion of the criminal law took place; d the result was, that whereas, in the e years ending in 1833, the number of ecutions in England and Wales was 9; in the five years subsequent they re only 99: and to show that, contem- raneously, crime had not increased, I ll add, that, in the latter period, the mmittals for capital offences were 650 s than during the former period. In ndon and Middlesex, the effect was ll more surprisingly manifested; for hilst, in the three years ending 1830, the mber of executions had been 52, in e three years ending in 1836 there had en none. During the same period, so, the committals had diminished by 127. By the Bill of 1837, introduced by the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud, capital punishments were still further diminished; and the result was, that, whilst in the three years previous to 1837, the number of executions had been 85, in the three years subsequent they had been only 25. During the same period, also, the committals had decreased by 115. I will now proceed to show that the mitigation of punishment, as well as its total abolition, was accompanied by a due degree of effect in the diminution of crime. In respect to murder, which is now almost the only crime punishable with death, whilst, in former years, the average of executions in England and Wales was 15 every year, in later years, since mitigatory punishments have been applied, they have only been 7 in a year; and it further appears that, during the same periods, the average offences of this kind have diminished in the proportion of 64 to 70. This is the result in England and Wales; but, in London and Middlesex, they have fallen to the fourth part of what they were before. By a Return, which has been laid before the House within the last few days, as to the effect of a commutation of punishment in the offence of murder, the following gratifying result appears, — that, in nineteen counties, where, during five years, a mitigated and commuted punishment has been applied, the cases have been no less than 39; but that, in no single instance, has such mitigation been followed by an increase of crime in the following year; but that, on the contrary, the committals generally fell from 83 to 33. The next point I have to show is, that milder punishments are followed by greater certainty of punishment; and this principle has been laid down both by Sir W. Blackstone and Sir S. Romilly. To show this, I will refer to four crimes, to which the milder punishment has been applied by the Act of 1837,—namely, burning, attempts at murder, cutting and maiming, and robbery and burglary. In these offences, the number of committals has considerably increased, in proportion to what they had been during the twenty years previous, — in some cases nearly in a proportion of two to one. By a Return laid before the House during this week, it appears that, during a similar period, before and after the Act of 1837, whilst the executions had decreased from 85 to 25, the number of convictions had increased from 1536 to 1788. In murder, also, in particular, whilst, in the twenty years ending 1835, the number of executions had been 15, and the convictions 25, in the three years ending 1838, the executions had only been, on an average, 7; whilst the convictions had increased. I might go into many more details of this kind, but I do not consider it necessary. Indeed, the difficulty has been, with me, not to find matters in support of my case, but to make selections.

I will now beg briefly to draw attention to the case of France. The present enlightened King of that country, shortly after his accession to the throne, declared himself an enemy to capital punishments; and, in consequence, they have been considerably diminished. The effect on the offence of murder has been, that, whereas, in the two years ending 1837, the number of offences of this kind had been 124, in the two years subsequent they have been only 83. During the same periods, the convictions have increased in the proportion of 68 to 50. In Belgium, also, the same principles of leniency have been applied with similar results. In the four years ending 1829 there had been seventeen executions for murder; during the four years ending 1834 there has not been one; yet offences of this description have decreased from 45 to 41. But this is not a question involving the experience only of modern times; the principle of leniency had been acted upon before the end of the last century, and most successfully, by Leopold, Duke of Tuscany; and it stands recorded in his edict, that the effect of the abolition of capital punishments had led almost to the cessation of crime; that minor offences had considerably diminished in number, and that the more serious offences had become very rare. Subsequently to the French revolution, the punishment of death was again introduced in the Tuscan States; but we have the authority of a minister of that country for the fact, that the crime of assassination had been much more rare during the period of the suspension of capital punishments than it had been either before or after it. I will also refer to the splendid instance of the success of principles of leniency displayed during the seven years that Sir James Mackintosh was Judge of the Supreme Court of Bombay. It appears, from the farewell address of that great man, that, during the seven years he had presided over the Supreme Court at Bombay, 200,000 men had been governed for that interval without the infliction of capital punishment in a single case; and that the gratifying result was, that crime had very considerably diminished. I could adduce similar testimony from Sir C. Metcalfe, respecting another part of India, who, at Delhi, in 1835, stated that the punishment of death had never been inflicted, even in cases of murder; as to which the certainty of a severe punishment had operated more effectually than the possibility of capital infliction, the most uncertain punishment of all. But apart from these considerations, I must refer to the demoralising and unchristian-like effects produced upon the minds of the multitudes who are spectators of capital punishments. It is notorious that executions are scenes of profanity, impiety, and ribaldry, such as no other event in civilised society gives rise to; and when the effect of these "Saturnalia" upon the mind of youth is considered, I would ask, will you, and for what good purpose, continue such exhibitions? The effect upon criminals, it is proved, is to harden and brutalise, rather than deter by terror. I have the testimony of a very respectable clergyman for this fact,—that of 167 malefactors whom he had attended preparatory to their execution, 164 had been frequently present at executions. I mentioned this fact to Mr. Brewster and Mr. Cotton, of Newgate, and their own experience they stated to be similar. And it appears generally to be the case, that it is very rarely any person is executed who had not been frequently present at exhibitions of the kind. So much for the effect of example in deterring from crime.

I would remind Honourable Gentlemen that many, if not all, the great names of this country were the friends of mitigation of this punishment. Dr. Johnson,—the last man to be led astray by mere theory.—Burke, Canning, Wilberforce, Mackintosh, Pitt, and Romilly, all these men as remarkable for their enlightened understandings as for the largeness of their hearts and their benevolence of feeling, advocated a change in our criminal code. With these facts and authorities against them, the onus probandi of showing that the present system should be maintained lies on the supporters of capital punishment. I must be permitted to ask, why abolish capital punishments in other cases, and retain them in those to which they still apply? The abolition, in the former case, took place in consequence of the demand of public opinion; and the public voice in favour of abolition is not less strong when executions have become more rare. In former times, their frequency familiarised the minds of the people to them. The disgust at such spectacles is now increased in proportion to the fewness of them. But are we not in a better state for abolishing capital punishments now than we were many years ago? We have now an improved police, as well as an improved civil discipline; and we have extended far more largely than in former times the benefits of general education. These are so many safeguards of person and property, so many securities against violence and disorder. Why, above all, continue this punishment in the case of murder, the only case in which, virtually, it is now retained? The person who commits the dreadful crime of murder does so either from calculation or impulse. It may be generally concluded that the crime in most cases results from impulse. But take either of the two points of the dilemma. If the murderer acts from calculation, it is plain that capital punishment will not restrain him; for his very deliberation shows he sets it at nought. If the act, on the contrary, proceeds from impulse, it is plain that the person guilty of it overlooks the consequences of his deed. But the Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) may, perhaps, maintain, that before we proceed to the abolition of this punishment, we ought to have a substitute for it. I do not think this objection should stand in the way of the recognition of the general principle involved in this motion; for, suppose the abolition were at once resolved on, we could immediately find a substitute in imprisonment and transportation, and a substitute, too, as strong and effectual as exists in many foreign countries. It is the nature of the present punishment, and its irrevocable character, where it happens to be wrong, which shock the public feeling. Hence it is, that the juries of the country, which have been called the conscience of society, would object to bring in a verdict which would subject the party to death, when they would have no hesitation in inflicting what we might consider a more severe, but not irrevocable, punishment. The whole course of our present proceedings is swayed by the constant action of public opinion. From the commitment to the execution, the public feeling against capital punishment, goes to mitigate the sufferings of the offender before sentence is pronounced upon him. In the first place, the prosecutor is unwilling to prosecute, the witnesses to come forward, and the jury to convict. The judge may then have scruples as to a sentence involving this punishment; but when, having passed all these stages and interruptions of public justice, occasioned by the dislike of society to capital punishment, they arrive at the final decision for execution, even then the Home Office is besieged, petitions are crowded into this House, and, as a last resort, the Crown, itself, is petitioned for pardon. How can we continue the sanction of the old, obsolete spirit of revenge in this punishment, when all the late changes in our criminal law show we are bent on introducing a system of repentance and reform? My main argument rests on the sacred inviolability of human life. How can we expect the people to turn away from scenes of bloodshed that are constantly exhibited to their eyes? Let us abolish punishments of a dreadful description, and we shall abolish crime. Let us humanise our punishments, and we shall humanise the people. The practical operation of such a principle in legislation would guard the people equally against the evils of tyranny and disorder. Other states have partially and temporarily abolished capital punishments. Our nation should be the first to effect a change worthy of its character for morality and Christianity. Impressed by these feelings, I call on the House to resign that awful attribute of disposing of human life into the hands of HIM who gave it. I beg, now, to move the following resolution, — " That it is expedient that the punishment of death should be abolished."

. Mr. HAWES. — I beg to second the motion.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I am most ready to pay my tribute of respect, both to the motives which have actuated the Honourable Member in bringing forward this resolution, and to the ability which he has displayed in support of it; but, in so doing, I must state, with regard to the object the Honourable Gentleman has in view, that, in my opinion, he has not taken the proper course to effect his views, by moving a resolution upon the subject. In a matter of such great importance, the proper course to have taken would have been the ordinary course of asking for leave to bring in a Bill, so that the subject might have received the grave attention of the House. If the Honourable Gentleman should succeed in his legislation, he would have attained his end; but if the Bill were thrown out, there would have been a regular decision of Parliament upon it. Now, if this resolution should be carried, in so thin a House, while the hands of the judges, and of the Executive, would be considerably weakened, — while, in fact, no real step would have been taken,— the resolution would remain on the books to be pointed out, with great popular effect; but neither the judges, nor the Executive, would feel themselves bound to depart from the letter of the law. With respect to the motion itself, I certainly am very unwilling to enter into a discussion of the question, generally, against those arguments which have been adduced in favour of the abolition of capital punishment. Long prior to the present time, I have thought that the punishment of death should be very much diminished, and capital crimes in our statute book greatly lessened. I received those notions while sitting as a member of a Committee presided over by Sir James Mackintosh; and again in another presided over by Sir Samuel Romilly; and, with regard to the effect of the statistical details to which the Honourable Member has referred, it is so far consolatory, that they show the House that, in what we have hitherto done, we have not acted imprudently,—that the crimes for which the punishment has been lessened have not increased, and that the mitigation has not rendered less certain the infliction of punishment. Whilst these statistical statements prove thus much, I do not think that we are enabled to infer from them, that if we were to go on to abolish the capital penalty with respect to greater crimes, and more especially with respect to the crime of murder, the effect would be the same. It is to be remembered, that the crimes of sheep-stealing and larceny, and other crimes which were formerly punishable by death, are looked upon by the people as of a comparatively trifling nature, and greatly disproportioned to the punishment; but it is quite different with respect to the crime of murder, which excites the utmost horror in the public mind. The Honourable Gentleman has brought forward an argument, in which he is not at all borne out. "The crime of murder," says he, "proceeds either from calculation or impulse; and if from calculation, the existence of such laws shows that they are inoperative." Why, the same argument might be used as to any crime. It might be said, with regard to an offence to which the slightest punishment is affixed, that that punishment was improper, because the deed was continually committed; and it is therefore evident, that the offender from calculation is not deterred by the punishment resulting from his transgression. This argument does not, certainly, lead to the conclusion, that the present punishment ought to be abolished; for the Honourable Gentleman will hardly contend that the crime of murder could be at once done away with: and, so long as crime should continue, the same view would be urged against any substitute which the Honourable Gentleman might propose; and it would be said that it failed of its effect, because the crime still continued. But the real question is, whether the number of persons deterred by the fear of the punishment of death, from committing murder, at the present day, is greater than it would be if that penalty were abolished? This is a difficult question to decide: but my own opinion is that it is; and, therefore, is in favour of the salutary impression produced on that portion of society who are likely to be influenced by such considerations. This conviction is founded on my own observation of society; and though, of course, its correctness is incapable of strict proof, yet I believe it is in unison with that of the most deserving and best informed individuals. We know, Sir, that individuals likely to commit the act of murder are aware that the penalty of death is fixed by law; that the juries by whom they are to be tried will not be likely to sympathise in their crime; and that, if convicted, an unpitied and certain fate awaits them. Take the case of Greenacre, for instance. Was there any sympathy observable in the public mind in his case? There is, at all times, a certain portion of the community opposed to the infliction of the punishment of death, from conscientious motives; but, with that exception, the general feeling, in his case, was, that the murderer was justly and properly punished with death, in order to deter other persons who might be tempted to commit similar offences. But the word "murder," in our language, comprises offences of very different magnitude; and I wish it were possible to frame a law by which the more atrocious cases could be distinguished from offences more nearly approaching to manslaughter. There are cases which have come under my consideration, in which, though a verdict of murder was found, the crime was obviously different from deliberate murder, committed from deep-seated revenge, and malignant passions, the hope of gain, or the execution of a plot and conspiracy to plunder; and, by taking away the life of the victim, thereby destroying the evidence of the crime. I should rejoice if I could come to the conclusion, that society would be protected against such crimes, by not taking away the life of the offenders; but, if I thought that I should be leaving the innocent portion of the community more exposed, and increase the number of victims, by such a change of the law as is now proposed, it would be unwise in me to assent to the proposition of the Honourable Gentleman. Let the House recollect that we have made, in the course of no great number of years, an immense change in the character and severity of punishments. In 1818, the number of persons executed in England and Wales was 97; in 1828, it was 59; in 1838, only 6; being one tenth of the executions in 1828, and one fifteenth or one sixteenth of those in 1818. Now, this is an immense change to effect in a country, in the short space of twenty years, in favour of humanity, and, as I think, of moral improvement. And when my Honourable Friend says that the spectacle of public executions brutalises and demoralises the people, I think that this change in the number of executions makes a great difference in that respect; and that, though the frequency of such spectacles may be said to brutalise and demoralise the people at large, yet, when executions are reduced to a small number, the effect may, in the end, be more salutary, and the solemn award of the law make a grave and serious impression. The Honourable Gentleman says, that the persons who go to see executions often indulge in disgusting gaiety on those occasions. I cannot dispute this fact: but I cannot believe that the executions themselves have the effect of encouraging such a disposition; but, on the contrary, I think, that if that feeling were not manifested on those occasions, it would be manifested in other places. Whatever, at the same time, may be my opinion, with regard to the total abolition of capital punishment, I am far from saying that I indulge no hope that the condition of society may not, hereafter, be so much improved, and that the aversion to blood may not gain so much strength, that we may be enabled, at some future time, without danger to the innocent inhabitants of this country, entirely to abolish the punishment of death. I do not think, however, that, at the present time, the effects of such a measure would correspond with the expectations of the Honourable Gentleman; and I put it to him, and to the House, to consider the peril that would attend an unsuccessful experiment on such a subject. The Honourable Gentleman has told us — and it is a great satisfaction to me to know it — that the friends of humanity, and the enemies of capital punishment, have no reason to regret the experiments hitherto made; but serious danger might ensue, if capital punishments were entirely abolished. Some cases of atrocious murder, some revolting offence, might occur, occasioning a revulsion of public opinion, and a hostility to the entire abolition of capital punishments — arising from an impression that we had gone too far — which would throw us back again, perhaps farther than the point from which our humanity had started, and render it necessary to restore the punishments we had abandoned. For these reasons, I cannot agree, at once, to a resolution in favour of the abolition of capital punishment. I regret to be obliged to come to a decision that may appear opposed to the feelings of so large and humane a portion of the community as I believe to advocate the principle involved in this motion; but I think it better rather to pause, than to decide at once upon so important a question.

DOCTOR LUSHINGTON. — Sir, I agree with my Noble Friend that it would be better to proceed, in this matter, by legislative enactment; and I am clearly of opinion that any motion on this subject should be for leave to bring in a Bill for the abolition of capital punishments; and I shall conclude with moving an amendment to that effect. I will now address myself to some of the arguments of my Noble Friend against this motion. There is a considerable body of persons in this country who hold that it is contrary to the law of God to execute for any offence at all. With that theological argument, however, I have nothing to do; my argument to the House of Commons will be founded upon very different grounds. I see no reason for any punishment, but the prevention of offences and the reformation of offenders; and I will take, first, the argument in favour of capital punishment for murder to be, that it prevents the offence. Now, what says my Noble Friend on this head? My Noble Friend has referred to the fact of the readiness of juries, at present, to convict, and rests his argument on that single ground. I agree with the Noble Lord, as to this fact; but I draw from it a very different conclusion. I believe that it is one of the worst effects of our present system, that if you show to a jury the atrocity of an offence, there is a disposition, generally, to convict, whatever the offence may be. I have been told, by one of the most learned judges on the Bench, Mr. Baron Gurney, that, in proportion to the atrocity of the offence, there is always a facility of conviction. But in those very instances where conviction is easy it may, perhaps, be obtained by defective evidence; and, although the feeling of juries may be in favour of conviction, that, certainly, is not the feeling of witnesses. No witness ever comes up to the box to give testimony, in a capital case of murder, who would feel themselves bound to depart from the letter of the law. With respect to the motion itself, I certainly am very unwilling to enter into a discussion of the question, generally, against those arguments which have been adduced in favour of the abolition of capital punishment. Long prior to the present time, I have thought that the punishment of death should be very much diminished, and capital crimes in our statute book greatly lessened. Let it be proved that it is for the benefit and protection of the people of this country that capital punishments should exist, and I will say that, although it is, indeed, a calamitous state of things, yet I am under the painful necessity of sacrificing life for the chance of protecting the community. But where is the proof that such is the case? The evidence is the other way. Not many years ago, our scaffolds were deluged with blood, and the people, from day to day — from hour to hour — were brutalised by the spectacles of execution. By slow, and very slow degrees, gradually, capital punishments have been abolished; and I ask, has the experiment failed? Has it not, on the contrary, been crowned with great and signal success? We have thereby prevented impunity for crime, protected the innocent, and saved the country, to a great extent, from those brutalising spectacles; for, let my Noble Friend say what he will, no execution takes place in England, at which it does not happen that a number of persons are prepared and hardened for the commission of fresh crimes.

There is not an individual, now, who refuses to prosecute; no witness hesitates to come forward; and forgery, comparatively speaking, has ceased in the city of London. If we make an experiment upon the good feeling of the people of England, in favour of human life and humanity, why should we be afraid that they will turn round upon and blame us for making such an attempt? What is the public feeling, now, with respect to executions? Is there ever an execution takes place, for whatever crime, that the respectable people of the neighbourhood in which it is to occur do not remove their wives and children out of the way, for fear they should be disgusted, shocked, and demoralised at the sight? If, then, the House refuses to abolish the punishment of death, will it not, rather, have the people against it? It is true, as the Noble Lord has said, that the feeling with which people hear of the commission of any offence is in proportion to the measure of the atrociousness of the offence; and that the true way to extinguish crime is to prevent it. Let the House keep its eye on that truth; but, on what principle it can be maintained, that, if we abolished the punishment of death for murder, more murders would be committed, I confess I am at a loss to tell. It is said that there would be no control, in that case, over persons who were determined to commit this horrible crime; but all this depends on a question which, would to God, the House of Commons would more seriously and earnestly entertain. but the mischief which ensues ow that there are, as the Noble Lord has shown, only about six executions in the year — is, in proportion, worse than when they occurred more frequently, if the effects I have just mentioned are the consequences of them; — if, as I have said, the lowest classes of society still flock to these spectacles, and indulge in the most horrid depravity. Look at the case which occurred the other day, in which a woman went to witness an execution, and in the very following morning committed an act of the grossest perjury. I am ready to maintain that every execution does harm; that it defiles the purity of the well-disposed and innocent portion of the community, while it renders the impure still more depraved and demoralised. It is well known that there have been cases in which persons have attended executions for forgery, and have gone and committed similar offences within forty-eight hours afterwards. No, Sir, if our object be the prevention of crime, it is the certainty, and not the extent, of the punishment, that is calculated to deter offenders. I ask any man in this House to tell me, upon his honour, would he not, if he were sitting as a judge, require far stronger and more complete evidence where the life of a fellow creature was at stake, than he would if the punishment of transportation were substituted for that of death? I ask him, too, with respect to the certainty of punishment, whether I have not demonstrated that the ends of justice would be best carried out by apportioning to every crime, of whatever character, that degree of punishment which may best elicit true and fearless evidence, rather than, as at present, is too frequently the case, lead to torturing of evidence in every possible manner, and using every means to find or make some flaw by which the necessity of taking away the life of a criminal may be avoided? If the principles I have here urged are true, I implore this House to adopt them; and I press these considerations upon them, not so much for the sake of saving the lives of the class of offenders who commit crimes, of which the punishment is now capital, as for the sake of the innocent portion of the community, who suffer from the existing state of the law, ordaining, as it does, capital punishments so much beyond the necessities of cases in general, that they are much less frequently inflicted, even where guilt is morally unquestionable, than any other description of penalty which could be substituted for them would undoubtedly be. I shall therefore move, as an amendment to the motion of the Honourable Member for Wigan, for leave to bring in a Bill for the abolition of capital punishments.

Mr. EWART. — I will, Sir, with the permission of the House, withdraw my motion, and allow the amendment of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman to stand as a substantive motion.

Original motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I think, Sir, that in the eloquent appeal which the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman has just made to the House, he has mixed up two distinct questions; and that he has made a considerable impression on the opposite side of the House, by what he has said on that part of the subject which has, in my opinion, no immediate bearing on the main question at issue. The Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman has attempted to show that there was a fallacy in the argument of his Noble Friend, "that the bad effect of executions is lessened by their reduction in number;" but I must confess, that I agree with the Noble Lord rather than with the Right Honourable Gentleman, and think that his arguments afford as conclusive an answer to those of the Right Honourable Gentleman as they do to those of the Honourable Gentleman who originated this motion. I agree with the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, that does not, to the utmost of his power, modify his evidence in favour of the criminal, from the sense that the life of a fellow creature depends upon his words. But, if these are the feelings of witnesses, what are the feelings that actuate the judges? Look at the responsibility of a judge. He knows the frailty of human evidence, and in how many instances it is fallacious; and, in summing up, he employs — (and who can blame him?) — all his astuteness in suggesting to the jury points which will justify them in bringing in a verdict of "not guilty," where life is in danger, which he would not do if the punishment were less than death, and time were allowed for examining the evidence, and remedying the consequences of false testimony. He knows that the sentence he may pass, when once put in execution, admits of no alteration; and with a laudable desire to save the life of an individual, he endeavours, if possible, to escape from the calamity of being the instrument of taking it. I know of one trial at the Old Bailey, where two persons, capitally convicted before Mr. Justice Best, received a free pardon, as being perfectly innocent, the evidence that was produced against them having been given through mistake or falsehood. But, knowing the frailty and uncertainty of all evidence, the law, nevertheless, now shuts the door against further investigation, and says, — "the criminal shall be executed on such testimony as we have." Let it be proved that it is for the benefit and protection of the people of this country that capital punishments should exist, and I will say that, although it is, indeed, a calamitous state of things, yet I am under the painful necessity of sacrificing life for the chance of protecting the community. But where is the proof that such is the case? The evidence is the other way. Not many years ago, our scaffolds were deluged with blood, and the people, from day to day — from hour to hour — were brutalised by the spectacles of execution. By slow, and very slow degrees, gradually, capital punishments have been abolished; and I ask, has the experiment failed? Has it not, on the contrary, been crowned with great and signal success? We have thereby prevented impunity for crime, protected the innocent, and saved the country, to a great extent, from those brutalising spectacles; for, let my Noble Friend say what he will, no execution takes place in England, at which it does not happen that a number of persons are prepared and hardened for the commission of fresh crimes.

My Noble Friend says that if we depart from the present system at once, we may run the risk of failure and of having public opinion and prejudice against us. But what of that? Have we not been fighting against prejudice for years, on many other points, and with success? The same argument was used against us when, after having had our tables loaded with petitions upon the subject, we abolished the punishment of death in cases of forgery. We were told by the bankers and merchants of London, that property would be more insecure than ever, and that the crime of forgery would be greatly increased, if we passed the Bill to abolish the capital punishment for that offence. But what has been the consequence of that measure? I, not long ago, put that question to one of the most eminent bankers in London, and his answer was, "We know of no such thing as forgery, now, in the city!"

There is not an individual, now, who refuses to prosecute; no witness hesitates to come forward; and forgery, comparatively speaking, has ceased in the city of London. If we make an experiment upon the good feeling of the people of England, in favour of human life and humanity, why should we be afraid that they will turn round upon and blame us for making such an attempt? What is the public feeling, now, with respect to executions? Is there ever an execution takes place, for whatever crime, that the respectable people of the neighbourhood in which it is to occur do not remove their wives and children out of the way, for fear they should be disgusted, shocked, and demoralised at the sight? If, then, the House refuses to abolish the punishment of death, will it not, rather, have the people against it? It is true, as the Noble Lord has said, that the feeling with which people hear of the commission of any offence is in proportion to the measure of the atrociousness of the offence; and that the true way to extinguish crime is to prevent it. Let the House keep its eye on that truth; but, on what principle it can be maintained, that, if we abolished the punishment of death for murder, more murders would be committed, I confess I am at a loss to tell. It is said that there would be no control, in that case, over persons who were determined to commit this horrible crime; but all this depends on a question which, would to God, the House of Commons would more seriously and earnestly entertain. If we wish not for the punishment, but the prevention of crime, we must look for the means of effecting our object in the education of the people, and in the inculcation of the sacred doctrines of the Christian religion. Whatever we may do for the prevention of crime is safe and sure as a gradual means of extinction; but the severe punishment of crime is found to go but a small way in deterring from the commission of it. I agree with my Noble Friend as to the dreadful effects of frequent executions, and I agree with him, too, that the public mind is thereby greatly brutalised and debased. This is unquestionably true. For what is the case when an execution takes place now-a-days? If it is in the country, the lowest kind of people come from one end of the district to the other to witness it; they become familiarised to the sight of blood; and it is mischievous in the highest degree. The Noble Lord says, that this evil is greatly reduced, now that executions occur so seldom. But the mischief which ensues — now that there are, as the Noble Lord has shown, only about six executions in the year — is, in proportion, worse than when they occurred more frequently, if the effects I have just mentioned are the consequences of them; — if, as I have said, the lowest classes of society still flock to these spectacles, and indulge in the most horrid depravity. Look at the case which occurred the other day, in which a woman went to witness an execution, and in the very following morning committed an act of the grossest perjury. I am ready to maintain that every execution does harm; that it defiles the purity of the well-disposed and innocent portion of the community, while it renders the impure still more depraved and demoralised. It is well known that there have been cases in which persons have attended executions for forgery, and have gone and committed similar offences within forty-eight hours afterwards. No, Sir, if our object be the prevention of crime, it is the certainty, and not the extent, of the punishment, that is calculated to deter offenders. I ask any man in this House to tell me, upon his honour, would he not, if he were sitting as a judge, require far stronger and more complete evidence where the life of a fellow creature was at stake, than he would if the punishment of transportation were substituted for that of death? I ask him, too, with respect to the certainty of punishment, whether I have not demonstrated that the ends of justice would be best carried out by apportioning to every crime, of whatever character, that degree of punishment which may best elicit true and fearless evidence, rather than, as at present, is too frequently the case, lead to torturing of evidence in every possible manner, and using every means to find or make some flaw by which the necessity of taking away the life of a criminal may be avoided? If the principles I have here urged are true, I implore this House to adopt them; and I press these considerations upon them, not so much for the sake of saving the lives of the class of offenders who commit crimes, of which the punishment is now capital, as for the sake of the innocent portion of the community, who suffer from the existing state of the law, ordaining, as it does, capital punishments so much beyond the necessities of cases in general, that they are much less frequently inflicted, even where guilt is morally unquestionable, than any other description of penalty which could be substituted for them would undoubtedly be. I shall therefore move, as an amendment to the motion of the Honourable Member for Wigan, for leave to bring in a Bill for the abolition of capital punishments.

Mr. EWART. — I will, Sir, with the permission of the House, withdraw my motion, and allow the amendment of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman to stand as a substantive motion.

Original motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I think, Sir, that in the eloquent appeal which the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman has just made to the House, he has mixed up two distinct questions; and that he has made a considerable impression on the opposite side of the House, by what he has said on that part of the subject which has, in my opinion, no immediate bearing on the main question at issue. The Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman has attempted to show that there was a fallacy in the argument of his Noble Friend, "that the bad effect of executions is lessened by their reduction in number;" but I must confess, that I agree with the Noble Lord rather than with the Right Honourable Gentleman, and think that his arguments afford as conclusive an answer to those of the Right Honourable Gentleman as they do to those of the Honourable Gentleman who originated this motion. I agree with the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, that the prevention of crime, and not its punishment, is the object to be attained; but I feel that his reply to the argument of the Noble Lord, on the advantage to be derived from the sight of executions seldom occurring, is quite fallacious. But the effects produced by public executions are not necessarily connected with the question which we are now called upon to decide. The same punishment might be inflicted in a different manner. The punishment of death might still be maintained, and yet public execution be entirely done away with; and the injurious effects which it is said by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman are thus produced would be destroyed with it. If the commission of the crime of murder is only to be prevented by the punishment of death; and if it is at the same time found that the public execution of such punishment creates other crimes, not equal in atrocity, perhaps, but still most serious and most to be abhorred, and, if possible, prevented, it is the duty of the Legislature, then, to continue such punishment, although it may carry it into effect in a different manner.

The question is one of reasoning and calculation, and one on which we are bound to come to no hasty conclusion. We are called upon to consider whether the punishment of death is the only sure means of diminishing the crime of murder. My own opinion — and it is formed on no hasty grounds, and not without serious and mature deliberation, though I had not intended, previously to coming down to this House, to have occupied your time by its expression — my own opinion entirely concurs with that of the Noble Lord. Such being the case, I will take the liberty of making a few observations on the arguments which have been so ably and so eloquently adduced by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman in support of his view of this question. I will state to the House the grounds on which he has failed to satisfy me either of the humanity or policy of the measure which he has proposed. He began by telling us, that he fully agreed with the Noble Lord that the crime of murder stood on an entirely distinct and different footing from all other crimes; and that, from its atrocity, there was not that unwillingness on the part of juries to convict as in other offences. He said, that the shocking and fearful nature of the charge which was brought before them for their decision, and the revolting circumstances which the evidence unfolded to them, caused a feeling of hatred and detestation against the prisoner — the most dangerous and improper. Experience certainly proves it to be true, that when the circumstances are more than usually aggravated, there is less reluctance on the part of jurors to convict offenders. On this account, the Learned Gentleman contends that parties charged with the crime of murder are more often improperly convicted than for any other offence. If this were true, however, — and admitting it to be an evil of no slight nature, — the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman himself adduced an argument which proved that its injury is counteracted. He says, that jurors are so affected by their feelings of horror that they are ready to convict on any evidence; but he says, also, that witnesses, who are aware that the life of a fellow creature has been barbarously taken away, come before a jury with no such horror of the crime, — no such thought or feeling of compassion for the individual thus suddenly bereaved of life, or for the distress and agony of his family, — but looking only at the punishment which, in all probability, will be inflicted upon the unhappy culprit. This argument, I confess, I cannot understand. If we are to suppose that jurors actually come to their decision and send the prisoner to the scaffold actuated by a willingness to convict, I cannot understand on what principle it is that we are to suppose that the witnesses are influenced by entirely opposite and different feelings. It is only possible to judge of the feelings of another by the feelings of oneself; and, for my own part, I should say, that if I were placed in the position of a person whose bounden duty it is — as I believe it is the wish of every person so situated — to blend mercy with justice, I should feel, in a much greater difficulty, in a case involving criminal punishment, were I in the position of a juror, than in that of a witness solemnly sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. The Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman further says, that judges are influenced by similar feelings, and that the punishment is sometimes improperly acted upon, the crime not being proved by the evidence brought forward. I, however, cannot readily believe that this can be the case. To get rid of this supposed evil, the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman proposes to remove and altogether abolish the punishment of death; and he asks the House to make an experiment in favour of human life. Now, this seems to me to be entirely begging the question. Whether the experiment be in favour of human life, or whether it be opposed to human life, depends altogether upon the success of the proposed change. If it should turn out, that it gave encouragement to the fearful crime of murder, so far from being favourable to human life, the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman must himself admit that it would be strongly and decidedly unfavourable to it. The Right Honourable Gentleman is now an advocate for the remission of capital punishment in all criminal cases; and I have listened with great attention and pleasure to the arguments which he has brought forward in support of his views; but I think that there is some difference, and also some inconsistency, between the arguments now adduced by him and those he has adopted on previous occasions. The House will remember that when, formerly, he supported the abolition of capital punishment for robbery in dwelling houses, the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman used this argument:—"that, in consequence of the similarity of the punishment for that offence and the deeper and more heinous crime of murder, the law gave to the criminal an inducement to the commission of the latter offence." This was the argument then used by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, and a most forcible and conclusive argument it was. But I would now ask the Right Honourable Gentleman to look how that argument operates with respect to his present proposition. I have lately seen in the newspapers an account of a murder committed under most aggravated circumstances, the sole object of the murderer doubtless being to obtain possession of the property of the murdered man, who was an humble cottager. As the law at present stands, if the robbery alone had been committed, and the party robbed left uninjured, the punishment by death would not be inflicted. There could be no stronger temptation to murder than if the law were to give the same punishment to the murderer as to the robber, and to visit equal penalties on very different and far less criminal offences. By the proposed change, my belief is, that we should, instead of preventing murder, be holding out the strongest inducement for its more frequent occurrence. By the doctrine of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, he takes away the natural feelings of mankind, from that maxim which has been given to us by the highest authority, that " Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." It is principally, then, for these reasons, that I am induced to concur with the views held on this subject by the Noble Lord. I come to this conclusion from the conviction—a conviction arrived at by the application of my best intellects to this important subject—that, by the remission of the punishment of death for murder,—the single case we are now called on to consider,—we should run the risk of augmenting and increasing that fearful crime,—of creating through the country the repetition of that offence, thereby lowering, degrading, and brutalising the feelings of the community.

Mr. HOBHOUSE.—The speech of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman who proposed the motion on which we have now to express our opinions, is, in my opinion, so learned, so able, so eloquent, and so convincing, that any observations from me must appear to be altogether useless; but I cannot refrain, notwithstanding, from making a few observations on the speech of the Right Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down. That Right Honourable Gentleman has attacked the proposer of the present motion with some inconsistencies in the arguments he has brought forward. I think, however, Sir, that he was himself guilty of equal, if not of greater, inconsistency. I fully agree with the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman that it is advisable for all parties, in cases like the present, to avoid reference to religion; but, as the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite has quoted scriptural authority, I feel myself bound in some measure to answer him. He said, in the words of Scripture, that " whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." But I contend we cannot—that it is not intended that we should—take that text in so perfectly literal a sense, as that we should apply it at all times and in all cases. The object of that text was to remind us of the punishment which awaited the first murderer; and that, I think, is a sufficient answer to any argument to be derived from that quotation. In the next place, the Right Honourable Gentleman has told us that it would be a great encouragement to crime if there were no greater punishment for murder than for robbery. I have yet to learn, however, that there could only be one punishment, if that of death were abolished. I have yet to learn that, exclusively of capital punishment, there is only one class of punishment; and that, if the punishment of murder was not death, it must be the same as the punishment for robbery. I have yet to learn that there is no gradation of imprisonments, no gradation of the terms of transportation.

This argument, then, of the Right Honourable Gentleman, I consider, has entirely failed him. With respect to the observations of the Noble Lord, I am well aware how unpalatable statistical information is to the House; yet, as there is no other mode of answering the objections he has made to this motion, I trust that it will excuse its production. The Right Honourable Gentleman, adopting the remarks of the Noble Lord, contends that juries are not less willing to convict, in cases of murder, because the punishment is capital. Unhappily, the examples are so few of the entire abolition of capital punishments, that we have no data precisely to the point. But taking the next best evidence, that which is founded on the effects of a commutation of the sentence of death, I find reason to differ from the Noble Lord. Not only, Sir, have the convictions for murder increased, as the capital sentence has been less frequently carried into effect, but the House will learn with pleasure that the commitments for that offence exhibit, under the same circumstances, a material diminution. From a Return lately laid on the table of the House, this last fact is apparent. In the five years ending with 1838, the commutations for murder were no fewer than 39, occurring in nineteen counties. The commitments for murder, in the same counties, during the years of commutation, amounted to 88; while, in the years next succeeding the commutations, respectively, they were only 33. So far is remission of capital punishment from increasing murders, that they have diminished to this vast extent under its influence. Coming, now, to the verdicts of juries, as to which this paper affords no evidence, I affirm, in opposition to what has fallen from the Noble Lord, that convictions for murder have increased as the execution of the capital sentence has diminished. May we not, therefore, infer that the abolition of the punishment of death would be attended with the same effect as its commutation? Sir, this point is remarkably illustrated by the Returns for London and Middlesex. In the twenty-one years ending with 1830, all the persons convicted of murder were executed, without a single exception. In this period, the proportion of convictions to commitments was 18 per cent. In the following eight years, ending with 1838, only one half of those convicted suffered death. What was the effect on juries? Why, the proportion of convictions, which before was but 18 per cent., now rose to as much as 82 per cent. If, then, the commutation of the capital sentence has had a beneficial influence in disposing juries to convict for murder, why not the abolition? I think, then, that the time has now arrived, considering the free state in which we live, when we might repeal the fearful punishment of death. I have seen the benefits which have been derived, and the good effect produced, by diminishing the rigour of the criminal law; a boon to the country granted by the Noble Lord himself: and if we consider the nature of the punishment of death, and the effect produced on the multitude, by its execution—when we uniformly find that the feeling which is aroused among the spectators and witnesses of the awful scene, when the last and the most severe penalty of the law is carried into effect, is not merely one of horror and of fear, but one by which they become more hardened, and acquire a taste for blood,—surely the time at length has come when this punishment ought no longer to be continued.

But there is another view of the subject, which has not been taken, and which I am desirous of impressing upon the feelings of the House. If we decide that death is no longer to be a punishment for murder, it will show the country the sacred estimation in which we hold human life. If the experiment were made, I feel the greatest confidence that it could be made with safety. I hope that I shall not be considered pedantic if I refer to one example of antiquity—so bright an example, indeed, that when I reflect on the wisdom of the passage which I am about to quote, it is with difficulty I can believe that it was written two thousand years ago. The Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, who is the representative of one of our universities, may remember, that, in the history of Thucydides, it is recorded that the punishment of death was about to be inflicted on the inhabitants of Mitylene.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!" and laughter, from the Opposition benches.]

The Honourable Gentlemen opposite seem to despise the lessons of antiquity. I am surprised at this, for I have always understood that the great Conservative doctrine was founded on obedience to, and reverence for, the opinions of our ancestors.

[Laughter.]

I, however, will proceed with the narrative, as contained in the history,—from which it appears, that——

[Cries of "Read it in Greek!" and laughter.]

Honourable Gentlemen need not be afraid; I am not going to quote Greek. The passage I refer to occurs in a speech of Diodotus, the whole of which applies very well to the question of capital punishments. The Athenians, whom the orator addressed, had, in a transport of passion, decreed sentence of death against the citizens of Mitylene, for a revolt. But, the question being a second time submitted to the people, it was resolved not to execute the sentence. Diodotus, opposing the punishment of death, is thus reported to have spoken by the profound and eloquent historian: —

> For we contend not now, if we be wise, about the injury done by them, but about the wisest counsel for ourselves. For how great soever be their fault, yet I would never advise to have them put to death, unless it be for our profit; nor yet would I pardon them, though they were pardonable, unless it be good for the commonwealth. And, in my opinion, our deliberation now is, of the future rather than of the present. And whereas Cleon contendeth, that it will be profitable for the future to put them to death, in that it will keep the rest from rebelling; I, contending, likewise, for the future, affirm the contrary. * * * I say, therefore, that death hath been in states ordained for a punishment of many offences, and those not so great, but far less, than this. Yet, encouraged by hope, men hazard themselves. Nor did any man ever yet enter into a practice which he knew he could not go through with. * * * For men have gone over all degrees of punishment, augmenting them still, in hope to be less annoyed by malefactors; and it is likely that gentler punishments were inflicted of old, even upon the most heinous crimes; but that, in tract of time, men continuing to transgress, they were extended afterwards to the taking away of life; and yet they still transgress. And, therefore, either some greater terror than death must be devised, or death will not be enough for coercion. For poverty will always add boldness to necessity; and wealth, covetousness to pride and contempt.

Now, the question, Sir, as stated in this passage, is the question which we have to decide; and I would be contented to have it decided on the grounds therein taken. The question is, not whether the criminal deserves the punishment, but whether the punishment, on the whole, tends to prevent a repetition of the offence. The public mind is now accustomed to have public executions withdrawn, and the time is most opportune to advance one step further, and to abolish capital punishment altogether.

Mr. PLUMPTRE. — I merely rise to say, that I voted with the Honourable Gentleman in 1837, though, I own, with some doubt and difficulty, when he proposed that death should cease to be the punishment for any crime except murder; but, as he now proposes that capital punishment should be abolished for murder also, — a proposal of a very different nature, — I am compelled to disagree with him, and feel bound to vote against that motion.

Mr. MUNTZ. — I wish, Sir, to be permitted to say a few words on this subject; and I will first state, that I altogether agree with the accomplished author of Paul Clifford, that the worst use you can make of a man is to hang him. From conversations I have had with different persons upon this subject, and from some of the arguments which have been used against the motion of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, the punishment of death seems to be defended upon the principle, that it is inculcated in a divine ordinance, transmitted to us by divine authority. But if this argument is to hold good in the case of murder, why not assign to adultery, and many other crimes, the punishment which the same divine authority awards to them? But, Sir, we live in different times from those in which these divine ordinances were inculcated, and under a system that does not demand the return of evil for evil, unless some imperious cause or urgent necessity call for it. But the punishment of death is not the severest punishment which you can inflict upon man. There are daily instances to the contrary; as in cases of suicide, which are caused by a fear of life, not by a fear of death; or, again, in the cases of those who, having taken away the life of a fellow-creature, are still condemned to live on in a state of bitter and heart-biting remorse; to whom life is a misery, and death would be a comfort. I would ask the House — I would ask the country, how we can justify ourselves in taking away every opportunity for that repentance which is needful to all, but especially necessary to him whose hands are stained with the blood of his fellow? I shall, then, with these views and considerations, give my cordial support to the motion of the Right Honourable Gentleman.

Mr. HENRY FITZROY. — I cannot consent to the abolition of punishment by death, in all cases, and only regret that the Honourable Gentleman who originated this motion did not confine it to all cases except murder; as, in that case, I should, perhaps, have been enabled to have supported the proposition. With respect to the present motion, however, in spite of the commentaries of the Honourable Members for Rochester and Birmingham, respecting the scriptural text already quoted, I must say, that I consider that I am only performing my duty in obeying the law it inculcates. Under such circumstances, there is no other course I can conscientiously pursue than to vote against the motion.

Mr. BROTHERTON.—I wish to know, Sir, if we are to carry out the principle of the text so often quoted, where it is to end? I rose, however, chiefly for the purpose of recording my sense of the humanity and expediency of the abolition of capital punishment in every case. I have always upheld that man has no right to deprive another of his life; and every one who entertains sincere religious opinions must agree with me. The text that has been so often alluded to ought not to be taken literally; and the words, in the original, I have been informed by Mr. Bellamy, who has spent fifty years in the translation of the Bible, will not allow of this construction. I contend that the law of God is, "Thou shalt not kill;" and I am convinced that, until our bishops and clergy turn the attention of the people more to this commandment, they will never do what they ought. I shall certainly vote in favour of this motion.

SIR ROBERT H. INGLIS.—I cannot pretend to understand the speech of the Honourable Member for Salford; neither can I, desirous as I am, that neither in peace nor by war one human soul should be sacrificed, agree with him in the conclusion to which he has come. The simple question is, what lives we can spare with the greatest regard to the safety of the rest of the community? I admit that, formerly, great excesses were committed by the punishment of death, under pretence of judicial sentence; but now all such gross abuses of the law have ceased, and to the proper use of it I, for one, cannot object. Considering the improved and the still improving state of feeling that exists throughout the country, I think that no legislative measure is now necessary upon the subject. Great changes have taken place within a few years, and the rigour of the law has been considerably diminished. In the memory of some, and during the lifetime of all, who hear me, a woman was sentenced to be burnt to death for coining. The sentence was passed, and the woman was executed. By what I may call the hazardous mercy of the executioner, the sentence was not, however, literally carried into effect; for the woman was dexterously strangled; but the body was afterwards burned; and thus, as far as the spectators were concerned, the execution was carried into effect. I merely mention this to show to how great an extent the national feeling of mercy and humanity has advanced. I think that we may safely leave the law, as it at present stands, to the improved state of public feeling. I am not disposed to consent to a change by which we should deprive the Crown of its brightest prerogative; and by which we should also deprive those men who, possessed of criminal thoughts and intentions, are deterred from the commission of crime by fear, from the benefit of such salutary experience. Independently of these considerations, the proportion of commitments, as compared with punishments, during a very short space of time, has decreased in very nearly the ratio of ten to one. I take the five years before 1838, the five years before 1833, and the five years before 1828, and I find that during those periods the proportion is very nearly what I have stated it to be. There has been no alteration of the law; but there has been an alteration in the feelings of the people, which almost supersedes the necessity of the measure suggested by the Honourable Member for Wigan; and this has been caused by the gradually increasing sense of the value of human life, on the one hand, and the insufficiency of capital punishment to repress crime, on the other. Under such circumstances, I cannot but feel that discussions like the present, without a moral certainty of their being successful, are detrimental to the good government of the country; for denunciations against the administration of justice are calculated to diminish the reverence that ought to be felt for the law. I trust the House will effectually resist the present motion; because, whilst I am certain that it ought to be the object of every man to save human life as much as possible, there is only one instance, in any state of society, in which the punishment of death has been absolutely and completely abolished. Diminish the frequency of that punishment as much as you please: diminished it has been, to an extent which no one could have anticipated thirty years ago; for, at the present time, not more than six capital punishments are inflicted in the course of a year; whereas, formerly, twenty-five persons have been executed at one period of the year. Still, I think the complete removal of the punishment itself, without any reservation as to the crime, on which the words of Scripture are imperative, would be very injurious to society. I am not one of those who wish to introduce scriptural discussions into this House; but, as the Honourable Member for Salford, and my Honourable Friend near me (Mr. Fitzroy), have referred to certain words, I cannot but make one remark in reply. Whatever construction may have been put upon those words, and however it may have been argued that the Almighty Legislator himself did not personally inflict the punishment which they imply upon the individual who was first guilty of murder; still it cannot be denied, that under the code which He himself prescribed for his own chosen people, there were such instances of the infliction of the punishment of death, as must for ever xclude from any censure any legislators who, hereafter, upon that authority, may nflict such punishment. I only ask, that hose who inflict that punishment may not e considered guilty of an offence, when hey only follow the authority of the inpired word of God.

[Cries of "Divide, divide."]

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I will detain the Iouse only a few minutes, after the lengthned discussion which has already taken lace. I do not think that the Honourble Baronet paid himself any great comliment in saying that he was not the erson who would unnecessarily put any ther person to death. I should be surrised to hear any one in this House say at he would unnecessarily put a peron to death. I submit to the Honourble Baronet that he has no right to put a erson to death unnecessarily; and that would be murder to do so. What the lonourable Baronet and the Noble Lord Lord John Russell), and others who ink with them, have to prove, is this, — at it is necessary to put a man to death r murder. The burden of proof is upon em; and, before they defend such a nishment, they ought to demonstrate e absolute necessity of it. They have t done so, but directly the reverse; cause they admit, as far as proof can , that, wherever the severity of the law s been mitigated, it has been followed a diminution of crime. The only oof that can be adduced is, the proof forded by experience; and the probality is, that what has happened already ill occur again. And what has resulted om the diminution of the punishment of ath? Why, it is proved to demonstran, that wherever you diminish the punhment of death, you diminish criminal habits, and the crimes consequent upon them; you mitigate the evil tendencies of the human mind; you ameliorate the human disposition; and, by the example you show of respecting humanity, even in its worst form, you make the worst form of humanity respect human life. The Noble Lord admits that we have thus far been successful; but he says that we may not succeed hereafter. Now, that argument ought not to have the least weight in the decision of the present question. You have the fact one way, and the doubt of the Noble Lord the other; and I think the House will have very little difficulty in deciding between them. I am extremely sorry to hear theological arguments brought forward, and texts of Scripture quoted in this House; because I do not think this a proper arena for discussions of that kind. But, I may remark, that Honourable Gentlemen are not consistent when they make such quotations. If the words of the text be imperative that where human life is taken human life shall be sacrificed in retaliation, the Honourable Member for Lewes does not go far enough in principle; for, instead of agreeing with the Honourable Baronet, who raises the prerogative of mercy, he ought to take away that prerogative, as directly at variance with the injunctions of Scripture. Nay, more; the principle thus advocated ought to apply also to manslaughter, which is a criminal shedding of man's blood. To be consistent, therefore, the Honourable Member should bring in a Bill to take the prerogative of mercy from the Crown, and abolish the distinction between murder and manslaughter. But I would remind Honourable Gentlemen, that we are not now living under the Jewish dispensation; and that, even under that dispensation, the punishment was not always inflicted; for, although Uriah was murdered, under circumstances of great atrocity, the murderer was not put to death. We are living under another and a more benevolent dispensation, — a dispensation of God's word, inculcating charity, the forgiveness of injuries, the total abolition of revenge. Our present dispensation is not mixed up with the harshness of the Jewish one, but is founded on charity and benevolence; and, instead of sanctioning and directing the shedding of human blood, it prohibits every species of injury from one human creature to another. The Honourable Baronet has talked of the mitigation of the law on this subject. Why, every mitigation of the law affecting the punishment of death was opposed by grave and reverend persons in this House, who contended, that there would be no effectual check against the most atrocious crimes. But I am happy to say, that the advocates of that punishment are now willing to abandon it on all occasions, except in cases of murder; and I trust that, ere long, they will give way on that point. Revolting as is the punishment of death, it has this additional depravity and wretchedness in it, — that it allows short time for repentance, and even less for the detection of error in the conviction. Many instances have occurred of persons being executed for crimes which they never committed. Within my own experience, a man was convicted at Limerick of murder, and sentenced to death. With great difficulty I obtained a respite for a week; and, during that time, facts came to light which established the complete innocence of the convicted man, and his life, in consequence, was spared. I may also mention the case of the three gypsies who were tried at Monmouth for a highway robbery. They were convicted, and sentenced to transportation. Whilst they were on their passage to New South Wales, however, their innocence was discovered; and they had scarcely landed at Sydney before the order arrived for their recall. Now, if the punishment of death had been inflicted in that case, the law would have been a murderer. By leaving the power in the discretion of the judge, you might as well throw dice for human life; for one judge will execute where another will act quite in a different manner. You ought to take away the punishment of death altogether. Your experiment has hitherto been successful, and you ought not to stop in your career of amelioration, unless it should turn out that danger is likely to arise from it. In the name of justice and humanity, I conjure the House to suffer the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman to bring in his Bill.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

CAPTAIN JONES. — I will not trespass on the attention of the House further than to mention one fact which has a bearing on the subject now under discussion. Some years ago, I was detained at a foreign port for the purpose of quarantine, and whilst there, I had an opportunity of noticing many of the slaves who had been condemned to the galleys. The commandant pointed out to me one man who had, the night before, murdered two of his comrades, and who had been sent to the galleys, in the first instance, for having murdered a monk at Rome. I expressed a desire to know what was to be done with the culprit, and was informed that he was then undergoing the highest punishment which the law inflicted. This fact convinces me that if the punishment of death be abolished, it will be extremely difficult to find any sufficient secondary punishment. I certainly do not advocate the continuance of this punishment except in cases of murder; and one reason why I would not altogether abolish it is, that if a near relative of a murdered person should be conscious that the murderer would not suffer death, he might be tempted to take the law into his own hands.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

LORD WORSLEY. — I regret to say that I am unable to support the motion of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman; because I think the abolition of the punishment of death would at present be a very dangerous step, considering the state of education amongst the people. I believe that transportation is not sufficiently dreaded by that class of offenders who are likely to be guilty of the most atrocious crimes.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

Mr. EWART. — With reference to the remark of the Honourable Member opposite (Captain Jones), I beg to state that there are Returns before the House showing thirty-nine commutations of sentences for murder in two counties; and that not a single attempt at revenge has been made by the families of the individuals who have been deprived of life; and, in the course of the five years during which no execution took place, no assassination was heard of. Before I sit down, I would suggest to those Honourable Gentlemen who do not go the length of supporting my resolution, that they may safely vote for the introduction of the Bill, because they will have the opportunity of making whatever alterations they please in Committee.

The House divided: — Ayes 90, Noes 161; Majority 71.

PRINTED PAPERS.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I have to present a petition from Durham, praying for the liberation of Mr. Sheriff Evans, and of all the other individuals who have been committed by order of the House.

Ordered to lie on the table.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — In bringing forward the motion of which I have given notice, "for the appointment of a Committee to consider and report to the House what steps should be taken in order to guard against the proceedings of the House which it may think it necessary to publish, containing matter criminatory of individuals; and whether it is expedient to discontinue, or to place under any and what restrictions, the sale of such of the proceedings of the House as may be published," I had intended to lay before the House a succinct view of what formerly had taken place with regard to the publications of the House, and the operation of the practice, and what had latterly taken place, and the operation of that practice, in order to show the absolute necessity of adopting some new rules, with a view to such publications, not unnecessarily, at least, containing matter injurious to individuals; and that it required great consideration whether, consistently with that view, there could or could not be a safe sale, by the House, of copies of its proceedings. If you could so guard your publications that they would not contain matter criminatory of the character of individuals, of course they might be safely sold. But I am rather deterred from entering upon the discussion, by the mode in which the Noble Lord (Lord John Russell) has given his notice, which is to move, as an amendment to my motion, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to give summary protection to persons employed in the publication of parliamentary papers. The Noble Lord has thus taken me rather at a disadvantage, in making his motion as an amendment to mine; because they were altogether consistent with each other, so far as I can understand them. My motion is intended only to facilitate any measure of legislation that may be deemed necessary; or, if legislation be not resorted to, to give the public all the benefit, without the injuries, which may result from publication. I cannot, of course, anticipate the course which the Noble Lord is about to take. If it be to provide against any injury being done to individuals by the publication of papers by the House, whether by sale or not, — and that provision be accompanied by a protection of the officer of the House in the sale of such publications, — then the Noble Lord will not find in me an opponent; but if the Noble Lord is going to ask the Legislature to give to this House greater powers than it now possesses in the publication of its papers, leaving the resolutions of 1837 altogether untouched, by which the House claims the right to declare what shall be its privileges, and makes it a breach of those privileges for any court of law to entertain any action with reference to that question; and leaving, too, the assertion of the powers of the House, as against the question of law, untouched, — and making no provision that, in the publication of our papers, we shall take care not to injure the character of individuals; — then I at once declare that the Noble Lord will not have a more strenuous opposer of his Bill. The object of my motion is, to clear away the difficulties which surround the question; but I shall, perhaps, consult the convenience of the House by now postponing my own motion, and giving the Noble Lord an opportunity of bringing his intended amendment before the House, as a substantive proposition. I have no wish to embarrass the House by the simultaneous discussion of cross motions; and, as the Noble Lord's Bill may, perhaps, render it inexpedient for me to bring forward my proposal for a Committee, I will postpone my notice till this day se'nnight, when I certainly intend to bring it forward, if the Noble Lord intends, by his Bill, to take greater powers, without giving additional protection to the people. My object may be accomplished by the Committee which is now sitting, from which I have withdrawn, in consequence of the detention of the sheriff; and also because I have little confidence in them; seeing that, out of the twenty-one members, of which it is composed, seventeen have declared their concurrence in the measures hitherto taken by the House. I will now, with the permission of the House, withdraw my motion.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — The Right Honourable Gentleman having declined, at the present moment, to bring forward his motion, perhaps the House will allow me to state the proposition which I intended to move as an amendment; and what the Right Honourable Gentleman has said in favour of his own proposition has only confirmed me in the opinion that I ought to introduce a Bill on the subject now under discussion. The Right Honourable Gentleman seems to think that we ought to examine our right of publication, with the view of restraining it by some legislative measure.

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN. — I did not contemplate a legislative measure.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I thank the Right Honourable Gentleman for the correction; because it appeared to me that the Right Honourable Gentleman evidently expected that the Bill would contain some restriction on the publication, and on the sale of parliamentary papers. It is my opinion, however, that we ought not to place any restriction on the right of publication possessed by the House, whatever determination we may come to as to the mode in which that publication should be made. I have no hesitation in saying, that, if it can be shown that the mode of publication adopted in 1835 has led to the distribution of papers, wantonly calumniating any individual, I shall be perfectly ready to listen to any remedy that may be proposed within the House itself, to prevent such improper and calumnious publications. At the same time, I know not of any more difficult subject to be undertaken, because many of those publications contain Reports of evidence, and accounts of proceedings, which, though not intended injuriously to affect individuals, yet incidentally bring in the names of many parties, and which are necessary, as the foundation of Bills to remedy those general evils, the existence of which is proved by particular cases. It must, however, have become evident, whatever opinion may be entertained with respect to the power and the privilege of the House to regulate its own publications, that it is desirable to provide some more immediate and more effectual means of exercising its powers. My own opinion is, that the powers of the House are very large; and that, if they are used to their utmost extent, they will be found quite commensurate to effect an observance of the law of Parliament; but the mode in which we can exercise those powers is liable to great objection; and, when put into practical operation, it produces considerable inconvenience. Let me take the case that has now occurred. Suppose that, during the recess, an action should be commenced, and there should be no defence; judgment would at once be given, and the sheriffs would proceed, without delay, to levy the damages. We should be bound, on re-assembling, to direct our immediate attention to the proceedings, to send for the sheriffs, and to punish them for the breach of privilege; and yet such a course is liable to this defect,—that it does not stop the action; and we are forced to deal with officers who have been no parties to the proceedings, until they are brought before the courts of law; and these are the only officers with whom the House can interfere to prevent the full execution of the judgment.

With respect to any action that may be brought during the sitting of Parliament, there is a more immediate remedy by proceeding against the parties. We may commit the plaintiff and the attorney before they have gone far enough to entitle them to call upon the sheriff to execute the writ; but in the latter case, also, it is impossible to exercise the powers of the House without having the attention of Parliament occupied by motions relating to individuals who are endeavouring to oppose the orders of the House. I do not think, that if we had to deal with persons who were bonâ fide seeking the protection of their character, who really considered themselves aggrieved, we should experience much difficulty; for they would submit themselves to the authority of the House, when they were told that any action they might bring would be a breach of privilege; and we might give such redress as to the House should seem proper for the damage which they might have sustained; but we must recollect that the persons with whom we have to deal, in cases of this kind, are not of that character; that, like Mr. Stockdale, having been mentioned in the Report of persons acting in the execution of their duty, they may immediately seek to derive some advantage by entering into a contest with the House, and by vexatiously continuing to bring actions against its officers. In such cases, although we may punish the individual, yet serious inconveniences must necessarily arise from the consumption of the time of the House, which is so valuable, as well in regard to all measures of legislation, as to the control that is to be exercised over the executive administration; and the whole Session might be occupied in discussions on the cases of individuals — on questions whether we should or should not commit this or that officer, or whether we should or should not discharge this or that prisoner. That, of itself, is a great public evil.

But there are other evils with which we have not yet had to contend; but with which, if we are determined to use our powers to the utmost, we must contend. It would be a great evil, for instance, if we were forced to come more directly into collision with the courts of law than we have hitherto done. Differing, as I do, from the opinions of the judges, in the case of Mr. Stockdale, — conceiving, as I do, that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench is altogether erroneous, and that it is not founded upon a correct notion of the privileges of Parliament, — I must say, upon public grounds, if the House of Commons is to be respected, on the one side, and Her Majesty's judges, on the other, are to be held in that estimation and veneration which is necessary to add weight to the administration of the law; great evil would arise from a more direct collision; and any proceeding calculated to cause two parties in the community to take opposite sides, so that one party shall vindicate the House of Commons, whilst another shall adhere to and defend the judges, would be a great misfortune in a public point of view. I think these are sufficient reasons why, at this period,—having shown that we are determined not to part with any of our necessary powers,—we should attempt, by the aid of legislation, to prevent a recurrence and a continuance of those evils to which I have adverted. I feel, at the same time, that there is great force in the objection, that any legislation whatever may add strength to the arguments of those who contend that the privileges of the House will be weakened by any enactment requiring the consent of all the branches of the Legislature to that which is the inherent privilege of this House. Still I cannot but see, that at all periods in our history, whatever may have been the subject; whether it has regarded the privileges of Parliament, or the rights of the Crown, or of any of the constituted authorities,—whenever any great public difficulty has arisen, the Parliament, in its collective sense,—meaning the Crown, the House of Commons, and the House of Lords,—have been called upon to solve that difficulty. This was, as I conceive, the original intention of the constitution of Parliament. I am far from thinking that the constitution of Parliament, as it originally stood, rude as were its general provisions, did not exhibit great sense in the general distribution of power. . It was among the functions of Parliament, not only to provide for the executive administration of the country, and to pass such laws as should be from time to time required, but also to declare, by some unanimous resolution, the state of the law existing at any particular period; which declaration was taken as a law for ever afterwards. That was done at a remote period, as a part of the inherent power of Parliament; and although it may have been little used lately, yet it is both within the power and the duty of Parliament to meet any great evils or difficulties of this kind, and to provide for them by its general authority.

With respect to cases of privilege, it cannot be denied that when difficulties have occurred, Parliament has provided for them by some enactments or declaration of the law. In the commencement of the reign of James I., when it was found that the warden of the Fleet was unwilling to discharge from prison a Member of this House, being fearful that he should have to pay the penalties for an escape, although the House of Commons interposed, and obtained the release of the Member, it did not think it inconsistent with the maintenance of its privileges, nor a dereliction of its high duty, as one branch of the Legislature, to pass an Act, providing that all suits brought against Members should revive when Parliament should cease to sit; and, secondly, that no sheriff or other officer should be liable to any punishment for discharging from custody a Member entitled to privilege. After the Revolution, when the Members of the House, and even the Speaker, had become liable to actions and prosecutions for doing their duty in the House, Parliament declared, by legislative enactment, that no person should be called in question for any proceeding within the walls of Parliament. So likewise, when it was found, in the course of experience, that the personal privileges possessed by Members, such as the exemption of their servants from suits for the recovery of debts, could be dispensed with, without doing the least injury to the efficiency of Parliament, the House agreed to several Acts, the latest of which is the 10th George III., which allowed the suits to proceed, and which limited those personal privileges of the Members. All this shows that, when there has been sufficient cause, the House has not hesitated, upon all suitable occasions, to limit its privileges. It may be said that, when we enter upon a course of legislation with respect to one privilege, various other privileges may be attacked, and we shall be ultimately obliged to resort to legislative enactments for all. I do not feel certain that such attacks will not take place; but none of our privileges are so much exposed to attack as this particular privilege of publication; at all events, that is the privilege now called in question. On many of our privileges I find, by the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, there is no difference between the House of Commons and the courts of law; several of them have been generally allowed; and Chief Justice Pemberton admitted certain privileges of the House of Commons when he was called to our bar. If, however, the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench should not be disposed to allow that the House has the right to decide what its privileges are, I shall be prepared to maintain, in that case, as I have done in the present, that the House is, and of right ought to be, the judge of its own privileges. The Right Honourable Gentleman opposite (Sir E. Sugden) differs from me upon that subject. It is one on which there has been a great deal of popular misapprehension. It is said that the House can declare anything that it pleases to be privilege; and it is presumed that it may claim the most extravagant power as a privilege. This is a most exaggerated way of putting the question. It was said, equally extravagantly, by counsel, before Lord Ellenborough, "Does your lordship mean to say that the House might take any person into the lobby, and there execute him?" To which Lord Ellenborough replied, "In such case, the courts would do their duty." If a person convicted of a capital crime was sentenced to death, there is no doubt that he might be legally executed; and the counsel might just as well have asked, whether a person not legally convicted could be executed?

I contend that the House ought to have the power to judge of its own privileges, because it can best judge what privileges are necessary to enable it to discharge its duty. If I am asked what there is to check and to limit this power, I must answer, that there is the same check and the same limit as there is upon all the different bodies in the state; — there is the same check and the same limit as there is on the prerogative of the Crown, on the power and authority of the House of Lords, or the Court of Chancery, or the courts of common law,—namely, that, having certain powers necessary to maintain their particular functions, it cannot be supposed there will be any extravagant assumption of powers beyond the necessity of the case. If this be so, the case is clear; and there is no difficulty in deciding the question, whether the House of Commons or the Queen's Bench is the proper judge of what is necessary for the due performance of the duty of the House. I have no hesitation in saying that the House is the proper judge, because it is perfectly conversant with the business which it has to perform; it is aware of what is necessary to perform that duty; and it is more likely to come to a correct decision upon this question than the Court of Queen's Bench. It will probably be said, that the House of Commons may carry the power of judging what are its own privileges to an excess; but it may just as well be said that the Court of Queen's Bench will be anxious to limit what is really necessary. It seems to me, therefore, that, whatever we do, we cannot relinquish the power of declaring what is essential to the due performance of our functions. Elected, as this House is, by the people, I do not think that it will ever exercise any act of exorbitant tyranny in defence of its privileges.

I now come to the proposition which I have to submit to the House. I do not intend to propose a measure that shall impose any restrictions on the power or right of publication by the House: on the contrary, I shall take care to state, in the preamble of the Bill, that the privileges of the House, as well in this as in any other respect, are only known by the interpretation of the House itself. I intend to propose that publications, authorised by either House of Parliament, shall be protected; and that, upon the production of a certificate of such publication,—signed, for the House of Peers, by the Lord Chancellor, or by the Speaker of that House, and for the House of Commons, by the Speaker of this House,—in any court of common law, any proceedings which may have been commenced, in respect of matter contained in any such publication, shall be stayed. I will not now enter into any explanation of the mode in which this is to be done; because, if I were to attempt to do so, I might probably lead Honourable Members into error. I therefore think that it would be better to introduce the Bill, and let Honourable Gentlemen have an opportunity of examining its details. The object of the Bill, I repeat, will be to give protection, in a court of law, to the publications of either House of Parliament, not merely during the time Parliament is sitting, but during a recess or dissolution. I do not propose to limit the right of publication; for, as I said before, it is essential that we should maintain it to the fullest extent. And I am anxious to keep that authority within the House itself; because I consider its functions too important to be submitted to any other tribunal. I now ask for leave to bring in a Bill, hoping that it will be the means of putting an end to the evils which are now experienced, on this subject, by the House; and, after what has passed, I do not think it too much to ask the House of Lords to concur with us on this subject. That House must be aware that the conflict in which we are engaged may be injurious to the other branch of the Legislature; and, with regard to the publications of the other House, although they have not been called in question, it should be recollected that one of the publications for which we were threatened with an action was a reprint of a document of the House of Lords, containing the evidence given before a Select Committee of Lords on the state of New Zealand. That investigation was gone into for the purpose of obtaining correct information as to the state of that country, for the guidance of those individuals who might be desirous of emigrating; and the information thus acquired was not intended to be confined either to the House of Lords or the House of Commons. It, undoubtedly, might have been made a ground of action against that House, as it was threatened against this House, that the publication containing this information involved a libellous attack upon individuals. With respect to the motion of the Right Honourable Gentleman, I think the Committee lately appointed on the subject of the printed publications of the House will, in its Report, state all the facts of the case; and I believe that the House will be satisfied that means have been taken practically to place some check on the publication of works of a libellous character, printed under the authority of the House. I am anxious that the House should be fully aware of the manner in which these publications are corrected, before an order is made for their printing; and when this information is before the House, it will be for Honourable Members to say whether these checks are effective or not. I will not occupy the time of the House at greater length; but conclude with moving, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to give summary protection to persons employed in the publication of parliamentary papers."

The motion having been seconded, —

SIR E. SUGDEN said: — I will not detain the House for more than a few minutes, while I express my opinion on the motion just submitted to the House. I am not at all satisfied with the explanation of the Noble Lord as to the course he proposes to adopt with reference to the publications of the House. The Noble Lord concluded by telling the House that the Printed Papers Committee will report all the facts to the House. Now, if my motion had not been intercepted by that of the Noble Lord, I would have shortly stated those facts, which, indeed, are already pretty well known to the House. But the Noble Lord has not stated that the Committee are prepared to recommend any measure which shall give greater security against any attack on private character than that which already exists. The Printing Committee only consider what papers are to be printed, and the number, and they do not inquire into the character of the publication; so that whatever we print we publish, and whatever we publish we sell. Now, I should have been able to show that the primary object of ordering the sale of parliamentary papers was, to save expense, without regard to the character of the publication. The Noble Lord has completely misunderstood me as to the right of publication. I never disputed it; all that I wish to see is, the publication of papers placed under the greatest possible care, and within the strictest forms. I am afraid the public will think that we do not intend to assert or adhere to any such principle, and that we have no regard to anything like a proper or sufficient caution in the publication of our papers. The Noble Lord states, that there are many mistakes out of doors as to the power claimed by the House; and he says all that he requires is, that the House shall be the judge of its own privileges, so far as is necessary to carry on the business of the country. The resolutions of the House in 1837 do not state any such condition. What are the words of that resolution: —

> That, by the law and privilege of Parliament, this House has the sole and exclusive jurisdiction, to determine upon the existence and extent of its privileges; and that the institution or prosecution of any action, suit, or other proceeding, for the purpose of bringing them into discussion or decision before any court or tribunal elsewhere than in Parliament, is a high breach of such privilege, and renders all parties concerned therein amenable to its just displeasure, and to the punishment consequent thereon: That for any court or tribunal to assume to decide upon matters of privilege inconsistent with the determination of either House of Parliament thereon, is contrary to the law of Parliament, and is a breach and contempt of the privileges of Parliament.

There is no limitation, here, of the right of publication; but there is a positive declaration of the House that they have a right to publish what they think fit; and it is of this assumption of right that the people of England are afraid. It is not fair to the public that this extraordinary claim of the right of publication by the House of Commons should be sanctioned, or that merely an announcement of it should stop all proceedings in any court. I admit that, in extraordinary cases, where the liberties of the country may be in peril, the extreme right of publication may be necessary; but it never was the law of Parliament, or the law of the land, — of which the law of Parliament is a part, — to deal with these extreme cases as of common occurrence. I object to the present proceeding on this ground, — that whilst the Noble Lord endeavours to explain away this resolution, he leaves it still in force, pregnant with all the dangers that appear on the face of it. I have no doubt the Noble Lord's Bill will be opposed on very different grounds from those on which I shall oppose it; for some Honourable Members may think that, by this course, the privileges of the House may be put in peril. Now, I have no such fear. There is no one more ready than myself to maintain the privileges of the House; and I am not aware that any are in peril except that to which, by law, we are not entitled. I do not object to a legislative measure on that ground; but I do object to give this great power until we have framed satisfactory restrictions to guard the public against the injury which may result from our publications. I think Mr. Stockdale was very unhappily advised to try this question. No person supposes that he considered himself aggrieved by what he called a libel, but which the first jury decided to be no libel; and if the House had again submitted the case to a jury, I have not the least doubt that the same verdict would have been returned a second time. I entertain no sympathy whatever for Mr. Stockdale; but he, unfortunately, in this case, represents a great principle, for which I contend. I think the point between the Noble Lord and myself is now very much narrowed, and I do not apprehend that I shall be an opponent of the Bill, if, before it arrives at a second stage, he shall have provided the guards to which I have referred. I am, however, afraid that the Noble Lord has no such intention, because, from the mode in which he has brought forward his motion, I consider that he intends to stifle my attempt to obtain a Committee for the purpose of ascertaining the best means of carrying a satisfactory measure into effect.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I rise in order, Sir, to state the grounds on which I feel it my duty to oppose the motion of the Noble Lord; and I believe the House will give me credit when I state, that all my inclinations and wishes are to support the Noble Lord and the Government of which he is so distinguished a member,— more particularly as I have so lately been called upon to take office: but I feel that my duty, as a Member of Parliament, is paramount to my duty as an humble member of the Government. It is, therefore, under the influence of an imperative sense of duty, that I am about to state my objections to the course now proposed. I cannot but be sensible of the extreme difficulty of the situation in which the House and the Government are involved, in connection with this subject; for it is the duty of the latter to maintain, in every possible way, the privileges of the House. I am anxious, while endeavouring to guard against doing anything prejudicial to the public interests of the country, to abstain from offering anything likely to embarrass the course of the Government; but, after reflecting on this subject, I cannot but feel the most painful apprehension as to the result that I fear will follow the course proposed. I believe that the Government are mistaken on this subject; and that the measure just proposed, so far from relieving them from the embarrassment in which they are placed, will tend greatly to aggravate and increase that embarrassment, and also to inflict a deep and permanent wound on the privileges of this House. The proceedings which have taken place, on the part of Stockdale, the House has no means of arresting, except by the power of commitment; and that is the only way in which the privileges of the House can be asserted; but I do not think this is the proper time to enter into an argument upon the existence of the privilege now claimed. I feel great respect for the opinion of my Right Honourable and Learned Friend opposite; but I am sure that my Right Honourable Friend will excuse me for saying, that, having paid some attention to the subject, I cannot help entertaining the opinion that the resolutions which have been alluded to are well founded, and essential to the House; and when the proper time for their discussion arrives, I shall be prepared to show that they are well founded upon parliamentary law, — that they are supported by constitutional writers of the greatest authority, — that they are essential to the due discharge of the functions of Parliament, — and that they do not, in their terms, go one iota beyond what is absolutely necessary. Gentlemen must not limit themselves to the terms of these resolutions. They ought to look to the proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench, which gave rise to them. They must look to what was the power denied, — they must ascertain what the House was called upon to do, and consider whether these resolutions are just in principle, and that they did not exceed the necessity of the occasion, which would have been exceedingly unwise and imprudent. I will pass them by for the present, and consider whether the Bill proposed by the Noble Lord is calculated to relieve the House from the difficulty in which it is placed; and whether, if it accomplish that object, it is not at a price far beyond anything that can be gained by it. I believe that it will not produce that advantage, but that it will be deeply and permanently injurious to the privileges of the House, and to the public interests. The House thought it right to present, by way of plea in bar to the first action brought by Mr. Stockdale, a statement that the acts of which he complained had been done under the authority of the House. By the judgment of the court, that plea in bar was overruled. I entertain great respect for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench; but, as an independent Member of this House, forming an opinion on part of the law of Parliament, I do not hesitate to express a confident belief that that judgment was wrong and unfounded. I am therefore anxious that the House should not do anything that may appear to adopt or sanction that judgment. That court has determined that the order of the House, upon a matter of privilege, is no defence, — that it cannot be used as a plea in bar to an action. I therefore caution the House to take care, since that judgment has been pronounced, not to adopt any course calculated to be decisive against itself, in pronouncing such an opinion as may admit, in any way, the validity of that judgment.

The Bill proposed by the Noble Lord has for its object the stopping, by a summary proceeding, any actions that may be brought for publications authorised by the House. Do you, then, admit that the privilege of this House is no bar to an action? Are you prepared to admit that the Court of Queen's Bench were right in overruling a plea which is the third step only in the prosecution of the action? I say, that legislating to stop the proceedings summarily, while this judgment stands in its present position, leads necessarily to the inference that the House admits that it cannot set up its privilege as a plea in bar, but that it requires some additional legislative aid in order to make this privilege effectual to stop such an action. I am sure that the Bill which the Noble Lord proposes will not, in its precise terms, affect the privileges of the House; but by resorting to a legislative measure, in the face of that judgment, leaving it altogether unimpugned, passing it by, without venturing to assert the existence of the privilege which is denied by the Court, you will own that that judgment is right, and that the House is wrong, — that there is no stability in its judgment, and that it looks back with some degree of doubt on its former proceedings. The inevitable conclusion will be, that this House could not so speedily have resorted to legislation after this judgment, without impugning it, if it had been prepared to dissent from it. Therefore I contend, that the introduction of the Bill into the House will only tend to increase the present embarrassments. The Bill, as it appears to me, when I consider the nature of the judgment of the court, is calculated to increase, and encourage, and give rise to attacks on the other privileges of the House. I do not believe that many Members of the House are precisely aware of the numerous instances in which their privileges are now conceded, and of which the public have the benefit, but which may be called in question. How many important acts of legislation in this House have passed by small majorities? The Act of Settlement passed by a majority of one. How easy would it be, when an important debate was likely to take place, if Members of Parliament were liable to be subpœnaed to the counties of Northumberland or Cornwall, to withdraw a few of the most efficient Members? How often would one person or another be disposed to summon some Right Honourable Baronet, or some Noble Lord, to a distance, on certain occasions? It is not disputed now — the question has not lately arisen, regarding the exemption of Members of Parliament from answering such summons. But Members may be called to serve on juries; they may be made liable to serve the office of sheriff. There is an infinite variety of offices from which they are exempted by parliamentary privilege, — not for the individual benefit of the Members, but in order that the public service may proceed. In every one of those instances, the question of privilege may arise, and on the most important occasions. You have a right to call for papers — you have a right to summon witnesses. It is endless to repeat the innumerable instances in which questions of privilege may arise. A witness refuses to answer a question, or a party refuses to produce papers, or refuses to attend. All this might give rise to discussions in courts of law, whether or not they are to judge of the necessity of the examination of the witness, of the relevancy of the papers, and of every other circumstance connected with the discharge of parliamentary duty. Do not fancy that, while Parliament has been deemed paramount, — while that has been conceded for ages which the Court of Queen's Bench have now denied, — conceded, too, by the brightest names that adorn English history, — do not fancy that, while the House of Commons was deemed co-ordinate with the House of Lords, superior to the courts of law, and judges of their own privileges. what has been conceded under these circumstances will remain when your position is changed; — do not fancy that you have a fee simple to all your privileges, when you are only tenants at will of this one. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench has displaced the constitutional position of this House. This House is no longer, according to that judgment, a co-ordinate authority with the House of Lords. That balance and constitutional check, which have been the pride of those who have investigated and expressed opinions on the British constitution, is gone. If this House may have every one of its privileges decided by the House of Lords, its independence, its honour, and its authority, as a legislative body, are diminished.

It is important that respect should be paid to the courts of law that execute the law. It is not less important that respect should be paid, and dignity enjoyed, by those who make the law. I only regret, when I look back to the language expressed in the House, to see that those who value old institutions, who value institutions intimately connected with the most valuable parts of the British constitution, should have forgotten that the House of Commons is one of these. With a House of Commons subordinate to the House of Lords, the constitution has lost one of its best safeguards, — a safeguard by which our liberties were convoyed through times of the greatest danger and difficulty, in which the constitution would have perished, but for the authority of the House of Commons. You are about passing an Act of Parliament, leaving untouched the judgment which has displaced you, which tends to destroy the respect that gives effect to your acts, by making you subordinate to the lowest court of justice in the kingdom. What is it that invites such men as the country has reason to be proud of — men who adorn the House — to become its Members? It is the rank, the station, and the authority of the House. Alter the constitution — change the condition of the House— and it will cease to invite men of that class. It is from its importance, its rank, and station, that all men are ambitious to become Members of the House. But, whatever may be its present condition, let but a short time pass, and let the judgment of the court receive the sanction of this House,— let it become subordinate to the House of Lords, — remove it from being what it has ever been — the check, control, and balance of the other powers of the State,— and it will sink in esteem and dignity, as it must do when every one of its own resolutions regarding its own powers is liable to be reversed by the lowest court of justice in the kingdom. My objection to the Bill is, that, when you do not venture to assert your privileges, — when you do not express the slightest dissent from the judgment pronounced by the Court of Queen's Bench, — you will, in effect, affirm that judgment for practical purposes. I know very well that there is no reason to hope or believe, at the present moment, that a Bill which is not open to these objections will pass both Houses of Parliament. That, in my mind, is the reason why you should not legislate at all. I am anxious — most anxious and desirous, if possible, to put an end to the present state of difficulty and embarrassment by legislation, if a settlement can be obtained consistently with the usefulness — (by which I mean the authority, the dignity, and the station) — of this House. I believe that no such Bill can be framed; but I will not, on that account, take a Bill pregnant with more difficulty and danger than that under which we are now suffering. I therefore say, that no man can look at the state of circumstances which now exists, without perceiving that the price you are going to pay for this legislative measure must most seriously affect the permanent station and character of the House.

I have before occupied the attention of the House at such length, that it is my most anxious desire to spare its time on the present occasion; and therefore I only wish to allude to those matters which impress my own mind, and which induce me to think that I am only discharging my public duty in opposing the bringing in of this Bill. I conceive that you are doing a great evil in bringing in such a Bill. In the first place, I do not believe that it will pass, even in its present form. I believe it will undergo alterations which, in all probability, will render it more objectionable; and I do not think that the Noble Lord himself will receive it in its altered shape. I cannot consent to send up a Bill which I know will be the subject of discussions not calculated to increase the dignity of this House, not calculated to put down resistance to this House, but calculated, rather, though no such intention may be entertained, to stimulate resistance, and to encourage defiance in those who are disposed to resist the authority of this House. I consider, therefore, that, in the present divided state of the House, if we send up a Bill on the subject of our privileges, it will give rise to such discussions as will not tend to ease or terminate our difficulties, but to increase them. But I will suppose the Bill to have passed in a shape which the Noble Lord, consistently with his anxiety to preserve the honour and usefulness of the House, would recommend to the adoption of the House. If I am at all right in the consequences which I assume as likely to follow this Bill, you will have announced by it that you require other powers than those which you possess, to maintain your privileges; and my opinion is, that you are asking this in respect of the privilege least likely to be called in question.

My Right Honourable Friend has addressed the House with the caution that belongs to his intelligence, regarding these publications; and much has been said with respect to the want of care on that subject. But those who make such charges will do well to remember that no complaint has been made in the course of 200 years, the House having, during that time, passed through inquiries of the most important, and, in many cases, of the most distressing nature: having examined into the abuses of the South Sea scheme, of the slave trade, of municipal corporations; and having published so many voluminous papers, containing matter of the most criminatory nature, with a view to legislation. Surely something may be said on behalf of the House, when it appears that the only individual who, in the course of 200 years, has complained of its publications, is Stockdale; regarding whom a verdict has been found, that all that was said of him was true. I cannot help thinking that this circumstance gives pretty good assurance that there has not been so much falsehood, that there has not been such an over abundance of slander published by the House, as some folks are apt to imagine. I can conceive very many privileges much more likely to be attacked than that of publishing parliamentary papers, — such as that of examining witnesses, or calling for papers. Let us see how we stand with respect to these. The Court of Queen's Bench has placed the House in a new position. Three of the judges have said, that what is necessary for the discharge of the duties of the House is a privilege. Mr. Justice Coleridge, however, says that it is not enough to make out that it is necessary — you must, also, show that it has been allowed — by allowed, meaning anciently allowed; so that the House is in this situation, that it is told by one of the judges, that it has not the power necessary for the discharge of its functions; and, by the other three, that, though it has the power, without which it cannot perform the functions that belong to it, yet that these three learned judges, and their brethren, are to decide whether it be necessary or not. I have taken the opportunity of moving for a Return, for the information of the House, of the writs of error brought against the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in the last five years; and I find that there have been twenty writs of error brought in that time; and ten judgments reversed, in which the court had been unanimous. What a bonus does this hold out to those who are disposed to enter into a legal contest with the House! What uncertainty will attend the decisions of the court; and what an opportunity of accomplishing their ends will be afforded to those who are disposed to resist the House! It is no matter about the result — whether the court would sustain your privilege or not — for the time would be gone by when it would be of any use, and the House would be compelled to act without it. The evil of uncertainty must attend every step of your proceedings; and a great bounty will be afforded to persons to resist the House in the hope of succeeding, by the judgment of some court or other in the kingdom. You are, therefore, not certain of any of your privileges; and a privilege so little questionable as that of the publication of papers having been attacked, it is reasonable to expect that your other privileges will be called in question. I think such attempts will be encouraged by the Bill, because it will have the effect, to a very considerable extent, of confirming the judgment. But suppose you stop Mr. Stockdale's action in the manner proposed, by lodging a certificate; and forthwith, under the authority of the Act, legal proceedings are stayed. How do you stand now? Mr. Howard has brought an action against the Sergeant-at-Arms will the Bill stop his action? I do not so understand it; and if Mr. Howard's action still remains, you will have all the difficulties, all the embarrassment, all the waste of time, in discussing and maintaining your privileges, which you had without the Bill. You will be relieved from none of the discussions which, for great public purposes, you wished to avoid by the Bill.

But I cannot help thinking that Mr Howard's will not be the only action which will be brought. Whether the occasions exist at this moment which may give rise to actions, I cannot say, but the first attempt at coercion which the House is called upon to adopt in the discharge of its duties, will be met by opposition and resistance, and will lead to that violent contest with the House of Commons, which the sooner you meet and show your determination to put an end to, the better. You are travelling on, and it is of no use to delay what cannot be avoided. It is better to show at once, by your conduct, that you are determined to exert the owers which the constitution has vested n you. I will only repeat, regarding uch powers, that there is not a court of ustice in the kingdom that can exist rithout them; and the Houses of Parliaaent have only existed by them. The ressure of personal imprisonment is the aost important and extensive means by rhich they are protected. To say it is ot sufficient, with regard to the House, s, to speak contrary to experience, rhich has manifested its sufficiency in he House of Commons hitherto, as well s in every court in the kingdom. The uestion is, whether—(now that you are avolved in this difficulty, not by any ult on the part of the House,—for the Iouse could not avoid it in the discharge f its duty, with respect to the publication f papers)—the House had any reason o expect that an attack would be made n it by the Lord Chief Justice of the ueen's Bench. When that attack was ade, the House had no choice, no reource, but to meet it by a prompt declaation. To judge how far I am right, let e House look to the grounds on which e court pronounced its judgment? lainly, they rest upon the dicta of other dges, uncontradicted by the House. hey say it is impossible that Parliament ould have passed them by, unless it had een satisfied that they were correct; and you pass by the striking judgment of e Lord Chief Justice in this case, will not be a ground for asserting, that it is orrect, also? The House only came forard when its privileges were attacked; nd entered upon its present course of roceeding from a sense of duty to the ublic, for whose benefit the privilege ists,—yet most of whom little perceived at the question was, whether the indeendence and efficiency of the House of ommons should continue to exist. But t them look to the effect of making one ranch of the Legislature subordinate to nother, and to all courts of justice; and ey will then perceive the true character f the contest. I say the House is not to lame in this matter. It has acted as nderly as it could do, in the maintenance f its privileges. It has not, in any one ommitment, gone further than former ouses of Commons have gone, and those ot in bad times

SIR E. SUGDEN.—Hear, hear!

The SOLICITOR GENERAL.—The ight Honourable Gentleman cheers. Thether that cheer would have deterred rmer Houses, which saved the constituon, I do not know. I do not know whether the public place less dependence upon it, now, than formerly; but this I will venture to assert, that its efficient existence was never more seriously threatened than at this moment. I repeat, that I shall be ready, on a proper occasion, to meet the Right Honourable Gentleman, and show that the House has acted tenderly in the course which it has pursued. Upon the ground, therefore, that you cannot legislate effectually, even for your own views,—that you cannot, by legislation, relieve yourselves from the embarrassments in which you are involved,—that you have no resource but a firm reliance on your own power and authority; and upon the ground, that this Bill, while it will relieve you from none of your difficulties, will greatly increase some, and create new ones,—I submit to the House, that it is inexpedient to attempt to meet the present difficulties by legislation. It is a course which presents only fallacious hopes of escape. In this instance, as in most others, the most direct and firm mode of meeting the difficulty is the surest path to safety and honour.

LORD STANLEY.—In the course of the discussions which have taken place on the subject, I have not at any previous time felt justified in trespassing on the attention of the House, even by a single observation; but, although silent, I have by no means been an inattentive or unanxious auditor of what has taken place. The hour of the night, and the deference which I feel for the Honourable and Learned Gentleman who has just sat down, admonish me to be as short as possible in stating to the House the grounds of the vote I am about to give in favour of the measure which the Noble Lord has proposed to introduce. I am well aware that the motion is liable to attack from both sides of the House; and I have not listened to these discussions, and still more I have not attended the Committee which has been sedulously and laboriously investigating the case upstairs, without perceiving distinctly how many plausible arguments, how many sound reasons, may be urged on the one side and the other; and how deeply important it is, for the best interests of the country, that we should come to a sound conclusion, free from passion and prejudice, on the subject; and, at the same time, how difficult it is,—nay, how daily and hourly it is rendered more difficult, by circumstances pressing upon us, irritating our feelings and warping our judgments,—to come to such sound, unprejudiced, and impartial conclusion. The Noble Lord's proposition will be attacked by Gentlemen sitting upon both sides of the House, upon most opposite grounds, and by arguments of the most conflicting nature. It will be opposed alike by those who wish to preserve, and by those who wish to abandon, the privilege of publication; and it is really most difficult to frame arguments to meet the opposite views of Gentlemen with such different notions. I confess at once, without any hesitation, that I feel as strongly as the Honourable and Learned Member can do the absolute necessity of maintaining the privilege of publication, and of preserving it in full action, — subject only to that discretion and restriction which the House may think fit to impose upon its own powers of publishing information on those subjects which, being the grounds of legislation, it is its duty, as a representative and legislative body, to place before the cognisance and the judgment of the public. No man will contend more strongly than I am prepared to do for the full maintenance of the privileges of this House; and if I thought, with the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, that the adoption of the Bill of the Noble Lord would tend to destroy those privileges, to defeat our own objects, and to superinduce greater and more prejudicial consequences, the House would find me as fully prepared to oppose the Noble Lord as I am now prepared to support him. At the same time, I do not agree with my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Ripon, that it is unfortunate that the case of Mr. Stockdale should have been the one on which the question of privilege has been brought to issue; because, if Mr. Stockdale's case had not been brought practically to issue, we should have been told, "You are arguing on extreme cases; in such a case no jury could award damages, nor could the Court of Queen's Bench rule against the power of the House of Commons." For this reason, I rejoice that the question has been brought to issue upon precisely such a case as the present. The House is proceeded against by a man of notoriously exceptionable character, on account of statements published in a Report ordered by the Queen to be laid before both Houses; a Report of Commissioners who had investigated gross abuses, in answer to allegations that such abuses did not exist, and to a challenge to produce the facts in proof of such allegations. Was the subject of these investigations an unimportant one? No; for it related to no less a subject than the management of the principal prison of the metropolis, and whether it was conducted in a manner that entitled it to be exempted from legislation. What was the effect of the Report? That in the hands of the prisoners had been found obscene books. Did the matter rest there? No; for a public body came to this House, with an allegation denying the facts, and questioning the Report of the Commissioners: and, in consequence of that denial, the Commissioners made a further Report, in which they vindicated the accuracy of their former Report, and stated that an obscene publication, by a person well known, named Stockdale, had been found there. Upon this justificatory Report of the Commissioners, proceeded subsequent legislation. If, then, in a case so strong as this, the Court of Queen's Bench has thought fit to step in and to say, "We do not admit the authority of the House to publish, — we do not allow the House a discretion as to what it shall publish, — but we claim, on the part of the court, the right to inquire, as in the case of ordinary libels, whether the publication is justifiable or not;" — if each individual case of such publication is to be subjected to the investigation of any tribunal in the world, there is an end, and for ever, of our independence.

With every respect for the law of the land, and for the authority of courts of justice, I, at the same time, entertain a respect for the authority of Parliament, and for the privilege which its exercises, not for individual advantage, but for the instruction of the people, to whom it is most essential to know on what grounds their representatives legislate in their behoof, and for their benefit. Of the privilege of publishing information to any extent which the House may think fit, I will not abate one jot; — I will maintain the rights and privileges of Parliament, in that respect, to the utmost. But, while I do this, do I deny that Parliament ought, at the same time, to exercise the strictest vigilance with respect to the use which it makes of that privilege? I maintain that the House of Commons ought to have the privilege of publishing defamatory matter, where the publishing of such matter is for the public good, in the same manner that a person giving a character of his servant is protected from any consequences, even if that character be libellous, because such statement comes under the class of privileged communications. Why, Parliament may be and is called upon to become a wholesale libeller, in consequence of the duties it owes to the public; and it must be protected against the consequences of any pain so inflicted on individuals.

not maliciously or wilfully, but in the discharge of a public duty. Nay, I maintain that the duties of Parliament cannot be performed without this privilege; for our most important Acts are frequently founded on a succession of libels, in which individuals may be subjected to injury. Shall I, then, submit such a privilege to the judgment of any court in the world? With every possible respect for the judges now presiding in the Court of Queen's Bench, shall I subject a privilege of such high importance to the possibly political views of any particular chief justice? I agree with the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, that, if we were to make any concession of that kind, an attack might next be made on our freedom of speech; and, afterwards, all the other privileges which we enjoy, in order the better to enable us to perform our duties to the public, would be impugned. But I do not agree with the Right Honourable Member for Ripon that no care has been taken by Parliament to impose a check on the possible undue exercise of the power of publication. The Right Honourable Gentleman has, to-night, given notice of a motion for the appointment of a Committee to inquire whether any restriction is imposed upon the publication of printed papers by this House. This is an alteration of his original motion; for, on a former day, the Right Honourable Gentleman gave notice of a motion to rescind the order for the publication and sale of the printed papers.

Now, I am not about to argue with the Right Honourable Gentleman that the public and general sale, indiscriminately, of the printed papers of this House, does not produce an effect upon the public mind, with regard to the bearing of this question. But the Right Honourable Gentleman will not deny that, as regards the strictly legal offence, such an offence as constitutes a pretext for the interference of a court of law, the publication by public and general sale, indiscriminately, does not at all differ from the practice existing prior to the year 1834, when any Member could obtain half-a-dozen copies of any publication and send them down into the country. I quite admit the distinction in the popular sense; but I maintain that, in a legal sense, the old and the new mode of publication are one and the same. I regret the course taken by the Right Honourable Gentleman, in giving a notice, which is only for the present suspended, for a Committee to inquire into the practice which has existed and does exist, the restrictions which have been imposed, and the restrictions which it may be advisable to impose. It is only a few days since the Right Honourable Gentleman withdrew from a Committee, one of whose objects is, to inquire into the same subject; and if he had remained on the Committee, he would have known that they have given the subject their especial attention, and that they intend to lay a full Report before the House, in order that the House and the public may decide upon what has been done, what remains to be done, and what ought to be done. The Right Honourable Gentleman does not object to the Bill, provided some restriction be placed on the sale of the printed papers; — but that is nothing less than begging the whole question. But, suppose such a restriction to be imposed by the present House of Commons, what is to prevent some future House of Commons from withdrawing it? The Right Honourable Gentleman says, — "I do not intend to impose the restriction by parliamentary enactment; but when you have rescinded the practice, I will not object to an Act." But, the next House of Commons, maintaining the Act, may alter the practice, by its own authority, and again revert to publication and sale. Whatever may now be the popular impression on the subject, I do not doubt that when the Report of the Committee in question is published, they will see that every possible precaution has been taken to prevent the infliction of unnecessary pain upon individuals. No man can feel more strongly than I do the evils inflicted on individuals by some of the statements contained in the printed publications of the House; but, at the same time, I must say, on balancing the evils, I cannot but think that the injury to individuals is outweighed by the advantage conferred upon the public generally by the exercise of the privilege of publication.

I will now turn to the argument of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite, with whom I am prepared to assert, to the fullest extent, the principle of publication. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman called upon the House not to pass the Bill — first, because it will not produce the advantages expected from it; and, secondly, because it will produce ulterior and injurious consequences. The Honourable and Learned Member says that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench is wrong. I hesitate to pronounce any opinion upon the judgment of those who are so much better qualified than I am to form a correct judgment; but, if it be right, it is a judgment most fatal to parliamentary privilege, and even to the existence of this House as a representative and legislative body. I am tempted to hope and believe, sanctioned by the opinion of many eminent authorities, that that judgment was as wrong in law, as I believe it to be unsound in constitutional doctrine. "But," says the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, "take care that you do not, by your proceedings now, confirm that judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench." The Honourable and Learned Gentleman, however, has failed to show how the Bill proposed to be introduced by the Noble Lord tends to confirm that judgment. There is not in the Bill any affirmation of the law contained in that judgment; nor is there any denial of it. The Bill of the Noble Lord simply affirms the importance of maintaining the privilege of publication enjoyed by the House of Commons; and gives the House certain powers which will enable it to exercise that privilege, without running the risk of inflicting unnecessary hardship upon individuals. Nothing can be more imperatively called for than such a measure, in order to put an end to the necessity of keeping the sheriffs in confinement. While I admit the necessity of the vote, I must say that I voted with the greatest reluctance for the commitment of two gentlemen of unexceptionable private character, against whose general conduct no charge has been made, but who, from being placed between two jurisdictions, could not escape the dilemma in which they were placed. Why did I vote for their confinement? Because it was necessary, in support of our authority, to give that practical proof that it was coequal and co-ordinate with the courts of law. You may say it is hard to commit gentlemen for not obeying you, under such circumstances. But I contend that we should have ceased to be co-ordinate and co-equal with the court if we had departed from enforcing the rule from which the court, so far as it is concerned, says there shall be no departure.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — Hear, hear!

LORD STANLEY. — The Right Honourable Gentleman cheers; but does he mean to say, if there be a contest between two co-ordinate authorities, one of whom has imprisoned the servants of the other, that, if one of those authorities, from a desire not to inflict hardship on individuals, give way, such conduct will not be an abandonment of its authority by the party yielding? Will it not subject the party so giving way to contempt? Why, this ground of hardship to individuals, alone, is reason enough for the interposition of the Legislature to prevent the repetition of such occurrences.

The Honourable and Learned Gentleman says that our other privileges will go, and that we are only tenants at will. Now, I do not admit that we are tenants at will, and I do not believe that the Noble Lord proposes to abandon one iota of the privileges which we now possess. At present, though our privileges and powers are great, our power of enforcing them is very limited. During the Session, we have the power of imprisonment; but when the Session closes, that power is at an end. We have no effectual power for the protection of those who obey our orders. We may commit those who commit them; and we shall thus be gradually approaching that point where law ceases, and the dominion of force begins. The continual exercise of the power of imprisonment can lead to nothing else; and it is because I see that point at no remote distance,—because the most serious consequences must follow the conflict of two co-ordinate authorities, with powers pushed to the extreme,—that I support the Bill of the Noble Lord, and am anxious to seize the opportunity of legislating on the subject. Do I propose to sacrifice our privileges? Not one of them. Do I affirm the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench? Not at all. I believe it is not the intention of the Noble Lord to insert anything in the Bill which may contravene the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, and place us in collision with the highest court of law in the kingdom; but, if the Noble Lord introduce anything to affirm the judgment of that court,—if he do not seek to give effectual protection to our privileges,—I shall give the Bill my decided opposition. But what is the case with respect to our privileges during the recess? In what manner can you prevent actions from being brought, and parties from recovering and receiving damages? And what can you do? You can interpose your authority when Parliament meets. And how? By committing every person who has been at all instrumental in bringing or conducting the actions,—the plaintiff, the solicitor, the barrister, and, ultimately, the judges themselves; and, after all, you will be reduced to this disagreeable alternative,—you must suffer your officer to be plundered of the full amount of the damages obtained against him, or you must propose a vote to indemnify him, out of the public purse. While punishing with the one hand, you will be paying damages with the other. This is your present power of enforcing your privilege! And what says the Bill of the Noble Lord? It provides for a due investigation into the nature of the papers published, so as to prevent the abuses that are likely to arise from the indiscriminate publication of parliamentary documents; while, at the same time, it reserves within the breast of Parliament the right to decide what the extent of that restriction shall be. The Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for Ripon does not see that the Bill provides for the exercise of that restriction; but the effect of the Bill is to enable the House to impose certain restraints, to be decided on by itself, upon the exercise of the privilege of publication. Now the main effect of the Bill is, to maintain your privileges, by an effectual interposition, at the first step of any proceeding; and this will remove one of the great objections of the people of England and the courts of law to the exercise of this privilege, — the impossibility of duly supporting it without inflicting undue hardship on individuals who may be placed between two jurisdictions. The Bill, by confirming — not giving — the powers claimed by the House of Commons, will give to the people the security that your privileges are recognised by the law of the land; and, at the same time, it will give the judges a locus standi. They will be able to say, "Here are privileges asserted, confirmed, and supported by law; and a course laid down, which we are bound to obey;" and then will be removed the most formidable objection that has been raised against this privilege. I ought to apologise to the House for having taken up so much of its time on the present occasion. I have looked at the question with the most intense interest, from the commencement of these proceedings; and I hope that we are likely to effect such a settlement as shall prevent any further interference with the public business, and put a stop to contentions, which must eventually lead to the interruption of the closest social ties. Whatever may be the result of this Bill in another place, — and God forbid that there should not be sufficient temper, good sense, or candour to deal with in the earnest desire to come to a satisfactory settlement of it, — it is our duty, while we maintain and enforce our privileges, to seek, at the same time, honestly to enforce them, and to place them on the basis of satisfactory legislation.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Sir, I think the subject now under discussion is so important, that it cannot satisfactorily be concluded at this late hour; and I shall therefore move that the debate be adjourned.

Debate adjourned till this day.

BOROUGH WATCH RATES.

On the motion of Mr. Baines, Act (2 & 3 Vic.) read; Bill to amend, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Baines and Mr. Lascelles.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

On the motion of Sir George Clerk, Select Committee appointed, "to consider in what manner the regular service of the notices required by the Act to amend the jurisdiction for the trial of controverted elections may be best secured, and to report their opinion thereupon to the House:" — Sir George Clerk, Lord John Russell, Sir Robert Peel, Sir James Graham, Lord Viscount Howick, Sir Thomas Fremantle, Mr. Ord, O'Conor Don, Mr. Greene, Sir George Grey, Mr. Sanford, Mr. Solicitor General, Sir William Follett, Mr. Strutt, Mr. Wilson Patten. — Power to send for persons, papers, and records; five to be the quorum. Minutes of evidence taken at the bar on Friday last, referred to the Committee.

UNION WORKHOUSES.

On the motion of Mr. John Parker, Bill for the exemption of union workhouses from the payment of rates and taxes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Parker and Mr. Solicitor General. — Bill subsequently presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Monday next, and to be printed.

FACTORIES ACT.

LORD ASHLEY. — I beg to nominate the following Committee on the Factories Act: — Lord Ashley, Mr. John Fielden, Mr. Strutt, Mr. Hindley, Mr. Greg, Mr. Brotherton, Mr. Robert Steuart, Mr. Pakington, Mr. Baines, Mr. Aglionby, Mr. Brocklehurst, Sir Edward Sugden, Mr. Sheil, Mr. Fox Maule, and Sir George Strickland. — Power to send for persons, papers, and records; five to be the quorum.

On the question being put, —

LORD TEIGNMOUTH said: — I have no doubt that the intentions of the Noble Lord are most benevolent, and that, at some future day, he will be enrolled amongst the best benefactors of his country; but there are some clauses in this Act, to which I regret the Noble Lord has not paid sufficient attention;—I mean the education clauses,—in which the most important principles are involved. These clauses I consider to be of much greater importance than those which refer to the time of labour; and I have no doubt the country would entertain the same opinion, if the question were fully understood. I wish to call the attention of the Noble Lord to the fact, that, out of the fifteen Gentlemen selected by him, there are no less than twelve who, on the great question of education, directly committed themselves against those principles which are deemed paramount, on this side of the House. Then, with respect to the remaining three. Of my Noble Friend himself, I believe this; — no one will act more strictly up to the principles which he professes; but I expected that he would have proposed some Honourable Members who were on the Education Committee, of which the inquiries went to the root of the factory system. I have no doubt that the other two Gentlemen entertain the most conscientious opinion on the subject of education; but they were not on that Committee, nor did they express their opinion, in the course of the debates which took place on that subject. I lament to say, that, in the factories, the system of education is most unsatisfactory; and I could state such facts as would completely astonish the House. I will, however, only mention one. In company with a clergyman, I visited the factory of Mr. M'Connell, which has been held up by Mr. Inspector Horner as a model of perfection. A variety of questions were put to the children, which they answered most admirably; but when questioned on the subject of religion, they were utterly ignorant of the simplest points. The reverend gentleman asked Mr. M'Connell if he had not a New Testament in the school? and he replied in the negative; stating that there were the children of Socialists in the school, who objected to its introduction. The Report stated that the system of instruction was a general one; but not a word was said on the subject to which I have alluded. I believe it stated that music and geography had been introduced: but Mr. Owen went farther, for he introduced dancing; and, no doubt, the children would hear blasphemy from the same lips.

[Cries of "Question!"]

DOCTOR LUSHINGTON. — I do not wish to enter into any debate on this subject; but I must enter my protest, in the strongest manner, against such an attack on Mr. Horner, in the present state of the House, and when no debate was expected to arise. That gentleman is well known to many Members of the House; and, I believe, has never before been accused of a neglect of religion; and I have not the least doubt, when an opportunity shall occur for the vindication of his character, that he will be proved to be entirely free from all blame.

LORD TEIGNMOUTH. — The Right Honourable and Learned Member has taken upon himself to accuse me of coming forward, at a late hour, to make a statement relative to Mr. M'Connell: I beg to say, that I entered into the subject at greater length, last year, in a House of not less than 120 Members; and from that time to the present, I have not heard of any counter statement. I am ready, at any time, to prove the truth of what I have stated.

Mr. HINDLEY.—The education clauses are not in accordance with the wish of the manufacturers, who object to a principle being applied to them, which is not applicable to the country at large.

LORD ASHLEY. — I must say, that I have been taken completely by surprise, by the observations of the Noble Lord, from whom I did not expect any such reproof. I think the Noble Lord has totally mistaken the object of this Committee. It is, to inquire into the operation of the Act, in order to see how far its provisions have been efficient; and, above all, to ascertain whether two hours have been set apart for the purpose of education. When the Act was originally passed, the quality of the education never entered into the consideration of the House. It was left to the option of the master and the parents of the children. With respect to the construction of the Committee, I do not think there is any cause of complaint; for no difference of opinion can be entertained on the subject of their inquiries.

Committee nominated.

MR. SHERIFF EVANS.

CAPTAIN POLHILL. — Since I gave notice of a motion for the discharge of Mr. Sheriff Evans, I have been informed that the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke intends to bring forward the subject in a manner which will be more in accordance with the wishes of the House. I have seen the sheriff in the course of the evening; and he expressed his wish to be set at liberty on parole; but if the House will not consent to do so, he is ready to give bail to any amount. I understand that the proposal of the Right Honourable Baronet is, to liberate the sheriff on bail; and I trust the House will agree to it, nemine contradicente. I now beg to withdraw the motion of which I had given notice.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — After the conversation which took place the other night, I was in hopes that the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland would have given notice of a motion for some relaxation in the custody of the sheriff. I understand that the Noble Lord has no such intention; and therefore I beg to give notice that, to-morrow, upon the Order of the Day being read for going into Committee of Supply, I shall move "That, on consideration of the evidence of Mr. Freeman and Dr. Chambers, given at the bar of this House, with respect to the present state of the health of Mr. Sheriff Evans, who is in custody, the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House do take such bail of Mr. Sheriff Evans as shall be approved by Mr. Speaker, for the attendance of Mr. Sheriff Evans on the House of Commons during the present Session of Parliament, whenever he shall be thereunto required by any order of this House; notice in writing of such order being left at the dwelling house of Mr. Sheriff Evans; and that Mr. Sheriff Evans, upon giving such bail, be discharged out of the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House."

PERRY'S DIVORCE (INDIA) BILL.

Read a second time, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

DEANE'S DIVORCE.

A Bill, "to dissolve the Marriage of Joseph Groome Deane with Rachel, his now Wife, and to enable him to marry again; and for other Purposes therein mentioned."—Presented (on petition), and copy of proceedings in Ecclesiastical Court delivered (on oath); Bill read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Tuesday, the 24th instant; and the Lords summoned, and the usual orders made.

CORN LAWS.

The DUKE of BUCKINGHAM.—My Lords, I hold in my hand petitions from certain owners and occupiers of land in the parish of Hurst, and in Waltham, Saint Lawrence, in Berkshire, against any alteration in the corn laws. I trust I need not say that I cordially support the prayer of these petitions; and I hope that the exertions of that unholy league—the anti-corn law league—will be defeated, and meet the fate they deserve.

LORD DE VESCI.—My Lords, I have to present a petition to the same effect, signed by the high sheriff of the county of Clare, on behalf of magistrates, gentry, and clergy of the county of Clare, assembled at a public meeting convened by him. The petitioners most earnestly deprecate any change in the present system of corn laws, and represent, in strong terms, the way in which any change in that system must affect a country in which there are few manufactures, and where, consequently, agricultural employment forms the principal resource of the population. I trust that your Lordships will not regard this petition the less because it has come from a country so situated. In Ireland, it is not only the interests of the landed proprietors which are involved in the question of a protective duty on corn, but the very subsistence of the great body of the people depends on its maintenance.

Petitions severally read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The EARL of ABERDEEN presented petitions in favour of the principle of non-intrusion, — of ministers, elders, and others of Brownfield, Glasgow; and Peterhead: of members and hearers of Hope Street Gaelic Church, Glasgow: and of inhabitants of Arhilor; Carnoch; Portsoy; Holytown; Leswalt; Aberdour; Lochcarron; Inveraray; and Iona. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The DUKE of RICHMOND presented a petition complaining of an interdict issued by the Court of Session, prohibiting certain clergymen from preaching, and praying protection for said clergymen, and for an adjustment of the question in dispute, — of inhabitants of the parish of Kennethmont. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH CHURCH.

The MARQUESS of BUTE presented a petition for the further endowment of, — of inhabitants of Aberdour. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

The DUKE of BUCKINGHAM presented a petition against any further grant of money for the support of, — of members of the Bath Church of England Lay Association. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CORN LAWS.

LORD REDESDALE and the EARL of ABERDEEN presented petitions against alteration, — of inhabitants of Heanton Punchardon; Sandford; and Marwood.

Petition for repeal of, — of the town council of Hawick.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CHURCH EXTENSION.

The EARL of ABERDEEN, in the absence of the EARL of DEVON, presented petitions in favour of, — from Middle Chinnock and West Chinnock. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

BERGARA CONVENTION.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — I wish to ask the Noble Viscount opposite when the papers relating to Bergara will be laid on the table? also, whether the Government has received any information from our ambassador in Spain relative to the state of siege in which the capital of that country appears to be at present? and, also, whether they have received any communication from our ambassador in Spain on the subject of the very flourishing state of the finances of that country, described in the Queen of Spain's speech to the Cortes? If that description be correct, the Spanish Government, surely, can now afford to pay the comparatively small sum due to the legion.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I beg to inform the Noble Marquess that the papers relating to Spain will be presented as soon as they possibly can be made out. With reference to the second question, I believe the Government are not in receipt of any information respecting late events in Spain.

LIVERPOOL EAST INDIA WAREHOUSE COMPANY BILL.

Brought from the Commons, and read.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON THE PETITION OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY FOR RELIEF.

Henry Gouger, Esquire, of Chester Square, ordered to attend on Monday next.

HORSE-RACING ACT IN PART REPEAL BILL.

On the motion of the DUKE of RICHMOND, Order of the Day for the House to be put into committee, and the Lords to be summoned, read: House in committee accordingly, and went through the Bill without amendment: amendments made; Bill to be ingrossed; and to be read a third time on Monday next; and the Lords summoned.

PAPERS, &c.

Correspondence relating to China, delivered (by command), and ordered to lie on the table.

Reports of the Assistant Handloom Weavers Commissioners (parts 2. and 3.); (delivered by command, on the 3d of February last). — To be printed.

Account of the number of motions heard by the Lord Chancellor, during four years ending 22d November, 1834: Also, an account of the number of orders on petitions, during the same time. — Delivered (pursuant to order of the 20th of January last), and to be printed.

Adjourned.

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE.

Resolutions reported —

1. That, in the case of the Old Brompton (Victoria) Kensington roads petition, the Standing Orders ought not to be dispensed with.
2. That, in the case of the London and Greenwich Railway Station petition, the parties be permitted to proceed with their Bill.
3. That, in the case of the Bolton Small Debts petitions, for additional provision, the Standing Orders ought not to be dispensed with.
4. That, in the case of the Port Talbot Harbour petition, the parties be permitted to proceed with their Bill, on inserting forthwith the notices in the Gazette required by the Standing Orders.

6. That, in the case of the Cheshire coroners' petition, the parties be permitted to proceed with so much of their Bill as does not give any power to make compensation to the present coroners, upon giving forthwith such notices as are required by the Standing Orders; and that the Committees on this and the preceding Bill do examine, in the first place, how far such orders have been complied with, and do report the same to the House on the Report of the Bill.

Second, fourth, and fifth resolutions agreed to.

Report to lie on the table.

GLASGOW, PAISLEY, KILMARNOCK, AND AYR RAILWAY BILL.

Motion made, by LORD JAMES STUART, and question proposed, " That it be an instruction to the Committee on the Glasgow, Paisley, Kilmarnock, and Ayr Railway Bill, to hear William Macdowall, Robert Wylie, the magistrates and council of the burgh of Prestwick, Alexander Murdoch, and William Henry Duke of Portland, upon their petitions respectively, by themselves, their counsel, and agents, against such parts of the said Bill as affect their several rights and interests."

MR. GREENE. — I am sorry, Sir, to be obliged, so often, to come forward in opposition to motions of this description; and never have I done so in a case where the parties claiming to be heard have shown so little ground in support of their application, as in this. They really do not put forward, in their petition, one single good ground for being heard. They complain that they live at a distance. Why, Sir, that is a very easy complaint to make. Distance is only a comparative term; and every one may consider himself at a greater distance than enables him to comply with the order of the House. They also complain that they were taken by surprise. I cannot understand how that can be; for every possible notice was given. The House is aware that ten days must elapse between the presentation of the petition for the Bill and its first reading; and, in this case, the parties had from the 14th of one month to the 5th of the next, to inform themselves upon the subject of this Bill. If our rules are worth making, they are worth standing by; and I hope, therefore, that the Noble Lord will not press his motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Twelfth Report brought up and read. — To lie on the table, and to be printed.

MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS.

Palmer, and other Honourable Members, against repeal, — from Newbold upon Avon; Thurlaston; Newton and Biggen; Hill Morton; Dunchurch; Frankton; Cosford; Churchover; Clifton upon Dunsmore; Church Lauford; Brownsover; Baddesley Clinton; Bilton; Little Packington; Over Whitacre; Bourton and Draycote; Lea Marston; Nether Whitacre; Middleton; Minworth; Maxtoke; Curdworth; Corley; Wishaw and Moxhill; Coleshill; Shustoke; Bickenhill; Princethorpe; Ryton upon Dunsmore; Stretton upon Dunsmore; Willoughby; Berkeswell; Fillongley; Boxford and other places; Chaddleworth and other places; Waltham St. Laurence; East Ilsley; Kintbury; Stanford; Compton and Aldworth; East Garston; Faringdon; Wantage; Shalbourn Ham, Buttermere, and Tidcombe; Hungerford; Bradfield; Englefield and other places; Chieveley; Hampstead; Aldermaston and other places; Thatcham; and Hurst.

Queenborough Corporation, — By Mr. Bernal, — of free burgesses of Queenborough, complaining of abuses in the constitution of the corporation of that borough.

China, — By Lord Sandon, — of the Committee for Suppression of the Culture and Sale of Opium, for suppression of the traffic in opium to that country.

Newport Riots, — By Mr. Hume, — from Kirkaldy, praying for a free pardon to Frost, Williams, and Jones.

Universal Suffrage, &c., — By Mr. Hume, in favour, — from Robert Whyte; and cotton spinners in Calton of Glasgow.

Sale of Beer Bill, — By Mr. Hume, against, — of James Ayliff.

Copyright Bill, — By Mr. Hume, against, — from St. George in the East, London.

Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues Bill, — By Sir J. Walsh, — from Risley and Breaston, suggesting alterations.

Printed Papers, — By Sir R. Inglis, Sir E. Sugden, and Mr. Pattison, for discharge of the sheriff, — from Thrapston; ward of Aldersgate, London; London merchants and others; and West Haddon.

By Mr. Vernon Smith, — Petition of the mayor of Northampton, in support of privileges.

By Sir E. Sugden, — of John Joseph Stockdale, against any Bill to give summary protection to persons employed in the publication of parliamentary papers.

Medical Profession, — By Mr. Hume, — of William and James Cooper, for reform.

Church Establishment (Colonies), — By Mr. H. J. Hope, — from Cheltenham, for extension.

J. F. F. Wright, — Of John Faithful Fortescue Wright, complaining of his dismissal from the marines, and praying for inquiry.

Stade Duties, — By Mr. Baines, — from Leeds, for the removal of the Stade duties, imposed by authority of Hanover on the navigation of the Elbe.

Newport Riots, — By Mr. T. Duncombe, — of Arthur Dyson, for inquiry into the nature of the imprisonment and state of health of Henry Vincent, now confined in Monmouth gaol.

On presenting this petition, —

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE said: — The petitioner describes himself as the friend of Vincent, and states that Vincent is very ill; and that, as the House has liberated Mr. Sheriff Wheelton from confinement on the ground of ill health, — and as he is sure that the House would not wish to make a distinction in the administration of the law between the rich and the poor, he prays that it will adopt such steps as it may deem fit to procure the release of Vincent.

Designs Copyright Bill, — By Sir R. Peel and Mr. G. W. Wood, — three petitions from Manchester, in favour. — Referred to the Select Committee on the Bill.

Railways. — Petitions for relief from the tax on passengers, — from the Edinburgh and Dalkeith Railway Company; and the Arbroath and Forfar Railway Company.

Petition of William Joseph Curtis, for the adoption of measures for reducing the risk and promoting the convenience of travelling by railways. — Referred to the Select Committee on Railway Communication.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND) BILL,

"To amend the laws relating to the registration of voters in Ireland." — Presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Wednesday, the 25th of March, and to be printed.

PAPERS.

British Guiana. — On the motion of Mr. Emerson Tennent, Address for —

Copy of, or extracts from, the memorial of Mr. Schomburgk, who lately explored the interior of British Guiana, under the directions of the Geographical Society of London, addressed to the Governor of that colony, and laid before the Court of Policy at Demerara on the 1st day of July, 1839, relative to the grounds of the claim advanced by the state of Venezuela to that portion of British Guiana situated between the rivers Oronoco and Marocco, on the west, and to the claim of the Brazilian Government to that portion lying between the Essequibo and the Rio Branco on the south and west:

Also, a copy of, or extracts from, any despatches received by Her Majesty's Government relative to the invasion in 1838 of that portion of British Guiana lying on the eastern side of the river Tacutu, by a detachment of Brazilian militia under the command of Senhor Duarte, and the forcible deportation into slavery of a body of Indians residing under the protection of Great Britain, on the pretext of impressment for the Brazilian navy; and the dispersion, in 1839, by a Brazilian force, under Senhor Pedro Ayres, of the Protestant mission under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society of England, established at Pirara, a village of the Macusi Indians, within the territory of British Guiana.

Greenwich Hospital. — Annual Return — presented, for the year 1839 (by Act). — To lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS,

That they have agreed to Wolverhampton Chapel Bill, with amendments.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

SIR GEORGE SINCLAIR. — I rise to give notice of my intention, on the motion for the third reading of the Irish Municipal Bill, to move that it be read a third time that day six months. Perhaps the Noble Lord will say whether it is his intention to move the third reading on Monday?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Yes; the first thing on Monday.

SALT DUTIES.

CAPTAIN CHARLES HOPE. — If the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer were in his place, I would ask whether, among the new taxes to be imposed, it is intended, by the Government, to put an additional duty on salt? I do not expect the Noble Lord will answer the question; but, perhaps, he will state at what period the House may expect the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make his declaration as to what new taxes are to be imposed.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — The subject will be brought forward immediately after Easter.

CONSTABULARY.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET. — I beg to ask the Noble Lord whether he can give me any information with respect to an order of this House for a Return of the number of counties and districts which have adopted the constabulary force? That Return, I believe, has been laid on the table of the House of Lords; and I cannot understand why it has not been laid on the table of the House of Commons. I wish, also, to know whether the Noble Lord has any objection to a Return of the expenses incurred by the Act, and the probable addition that will be made to the county rate?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I do not know why the first Return alluded to by the Noble Lord has not been laid on the table of the House. To the other Return I have no objection; but some time would be required in making it.

UPPER CANADA.

Mr. HUME. — I beg to ask whether the situation of Chief Justice of Upper Canada is vacant? because I understand that the Chief Justice has not been for the last year and a half in that country. From the situation in which the province of Upper Canada at present is, it seems to me important that the Chief Justice should be there; or, if he be not wanted, that the office should be abolished, to save the salary.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I recently represented to the Chief Justice that it is very desirable that he should proceed to Canada with as little delay as possible; but, in consequence of a death in his family, he is unwilling to leave this country until early in April, when it is his intention to proceed to Upper Canada.

Mr. HUME. — I wish to know if the Habeas Corpus Act is still suspended in Lower Canada?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — An ordonnance was passed for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, under the government of Sir John Colborne, and I believe that it has been since renewed.

CHINA.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM. — Not seeing the Noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department, or any Honourable Member connected with the Admiralty, in his place, I beg to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies a question relative to the Chinese papers which were laid on the table at a late hour last night. I do not find in those papers any account of some most important transactions mentioned in the last accounts received in England, — namely, that the port of Canton had been declared in a state of blockade by Captain Elliott; that a remonstrance had been made on the part of certain American merchants against the blockade of the port of Canton; and, also, that an action had taken place between certain Chinese vessels of war and some of Her Majesty's fleet. I wish to know whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of any information with respect to the blockade or the action to which I allude; and, if so, whether it is their intention to lay it upon the table?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — No official account has been received of the naval action, or of the transaction to which the Right Honourable Gentleman alludes. Private letters, only, have reached this country from Captain Elliott and Captain Smith. When any official accounts are received, there will be no objection to lay them before the House.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM. — I have been informed that a letter was addressed by Captain Elliott to the late Admiral Maitland, giving an account of the blockade, and that that letter was transmitted, by the late Admiral Maitland, to the Admiralty. Surely that is an official communication to the Government; and I presume Her Majesty's Government will not object to lay that document before the House.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — There were letters of that kind; but they are not letters that contain any narrative of the transaction; and I do not think they are letters that can be laid before the House. However, I will not give a positive answer without referring to the letters themselves.

EXCHEQUER BILLS.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I beg to ask the Secretary for the Treasury, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not present, whether it is true that the interest on Exchequer bills has been raised from 1¾*d*. to 2¼*d*.? There is such a report afloat; and I think it is important that the country should know whether there is any truth in it, or not.

Mr. E. J. STANLEY. — I presume the statement to be correct; but I cannot, in the absence of my Right Honourable Friend, give a positive answer.

PRINTED PAPERS.

Order read, for resuming the adjourned debate on question (5th of March), "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to give summary protection to persons employed in the publication of parliamentary papers."

Question again stated.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — The House having already heard at length the various opinions entertained upon this subject, I shall trespass but a very short time upon its attention. The plan of proceeding which is now proposed by the Noble Lord is not, in my opinion, consistent with the honour, the dignity, or the safety of this House; and I therefore enter my solemn protest against it. Let it be remembered, that that for which we are struggling is the power of giving information to the public — of giving to the public the grounds upon which the proceedings of this House are carried on. We claim nothing for ourselves; our entire struggle is for the public. It ought, then, to be a popular struggle; and, once it is properly understood, it necessarily will be so. It cannot but be regretted, that persons who stood forward at one time as the champions of the liberty of the press — who would have it secured from prosecutions by ex officio informations, and free from prosecutions by the Crown, — it must be regretted that there should be seen men of that stamp now taking part against the House of Commons in the right that it is contending for. What we are contending for is that which, under every variety of circumstances, we have enjoyed for 200 years; namely, a right of publishing, where a party's proceedings render it necessary, defamatory matter. That we have been publishing for 200 years, not only with impunity, but unassailed. The public acquiesced in the propriety of publishing that information during the whole of that period, although hundreds and thousands of persons must have been affected by it. Various persons must have been accused of crimes and misdemeanours in these publications; and yet, until Stockdale was produced, nobody ever thought of assailing the right. Stockdale has been the first man who, for 200 years, ever engaged in a prosecution against us. That, we should distinctly understand. Thus, then, stands the question: — First, that for such a length of time we have enjoyed the privilege entirely unimpeached; secondly, that it is the opinion of this House, pronounced almost unanimously, — it may, indeed, be said unanimously, — that such a privilege should exist; and that we cannot perform our duties fully, efficiently, or satisfactorily, without the enjoyment of such a privilege. An overwhelming majority of the House has affirmed the latter position; indeed, it is scarcely contradicted even by those who are opposed to our manner of enforcing it. One portion of our antagonists dispute the mode of enforcing it; a second is opposed to the privilege itself. We find the privilege itself maintained by almost all the great leading men of the House, on both sides; and by almost all who call themselves Radical Reformers. The privilege is not controverted, — it is not opposed by reasoning, or anything in the way of logic; the only contest then is, as to the mode of vindicating it. And here I must observe, that a gross mistake is made by Gentlemen who are opposed to the mode adopted for the vindication of it; and who complain of the imprisonment of the sheriffs, they having been guilty of no moral crime. But, when it is admitted that the sheriffs have committed no moral crime, Gentlemen seem to think that the House, in punishing those who are innocent of crime, is acting unjustly. The House is influenced by no feeling of vindictiveness, and by no desire of vengeance; but the sheriffs lie in the way of the execution of the privilege of the House. The sheriffs are the instruments to prevent its efficiency; and the House removes the sheriffs out of the way, in order that the privilege may have effect. Has the House the right to do this? Why, certainly, if we are the judges of our own privileges. Of what value would those privileges be, if other tribunals are to have the right of deciding on them? In that case, we would have them not. The privilege of publication we cannot have, if we have not the power to enforce it ourselves, but must go as complainants to other tribunals, where, if we fail, that privilege is lost.

One argument that has been raised against the exercise of this privilege is, its inconvenience. I admit that there may be many inconveniences in it; and that we can, in argument, suppose many monstrous cases, apparently coming within the principle. But these and such other inconveniences can also be attributable to the exercise of the judicial functions. For instance: a judge might sentence a man to be executed, even though he had been acquitted by a jury; a judge, too, might send a man to gaol for contempt, because his countenance displeased him; and a judge, too, might fine him 50,000*l.* Still, nobody apprehends that the judges would go to that extent. And yet the judges are independent for life,—perfectly independent; while the Members of this House cannot be said, even assuming the longest period, to be independent for more than seven years. There is a constant appeal from the Members of this House, if they misconduct themselves; whereas there is no appeal from the judges, in the exercise of their privileges. This House and the Legislature, alone, can check the abuses of the judges. The public at large can check the abuses of this House. We have public opinion to control us in the mode that is most efficacious—namely, our total exclusion, if we abuse the power intrusted to us. The argument, then, that we may commit an excess of our privileges, is much weaker than when applied to the judges, or any other body.

I take it, therefore, that we must be the sole judges of our own privileges. By what mode, then, are we to vindicate them? The Bill proposed is founded upon the supposition, that we do not, at present, possess the power to vindicate them. We have the course of imprisonment, which may, I admit, be made a nullity, if we encourage the notion, that men are, upon slight pretence, not to suffer for violating our privileges. But such excuses are never urged against the execution of the privileges of the courts of law and equity. The House has the same mode that those courts have of vindicating its privileges; and that mode is—imprisonment. Whoever violates these privileges shall be subjected to imprisonment, which lasts as long as Parliament sits; and which, by adjourning over the Session, may be continued for a longer period than the mere sitting of Parliament. This method has been found efficacious in the courts of law and of equity; and it has been so in this House until the present moment. That being the case, I ask, have we a right to go any further, or shall we submit ourselves to the other House of Parliament and the Crown, in order to obtain something further? I say we have a right to go further; and my first objection to the Bill is this,—that we should first try the efficacy and the extent of our power in maintaining this privilege of publication. One of the sheriffs has been discharged; not—as the Right Honourable Baronet (Sir James Graham), by the notice he has given for this day, proposes to discharge the other sheriff—upon bail,—but absolutely and entirely. That, I think, was a fault. I think, also, that the House has acted with weakness, and with too great lenity, in the case of the sub-sheriff, who is allowed to go at large, although he is still acting in violation of our privileges. In my opinion, then, we have not gone far enough. In former periods, I need not tell the House that we did not stop with the inferior officers; and I therefore arraign those who are bringing in and supporting this Bill, of a want of political courage. Why should counsel be permitted to violate our privileges with impunity? Why should judges be allowed to violate our privileges with impunity? If we are right, let us "be just, and fear not;" and let us not ask assistance from the other House, until we shall have tried all the powers we already possess.

It is said that the judicial opinions of the Queen's Bench are to be treated with respect. But what respect can be excited by the course of proceedings adopted by the Court of Queen's Bench in this matter? Their decision—of course I do not refer to the persons who pronounced it—can only be treated with sovereign contempt by this House. There is not a single lawyer, on either side of the House, who has ventured to contend that that decision is correct. There is not a single lawyer, whatever may be his opinions,—whether they be for or against the privilege of the House,—whether for or against the sheriffs,—who maintains that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in this case is right. Even considering the strong and decided part which has been taken upon this question by the Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon,—a first authority in the law.—(I say so unaffectedly,—the Right Honourable Gentleman's works prove it,—and I will say that, if ever there was a lawyer who knew the entire of the law, he is one),—even he has never declared that his judgment goes along with that of the Queen's Bench. That Right Honourable Gentleman has, by implication, if not directly, condemned it, with all the rest of the lawyers in the House. And yet you talk to me of the necessity of respecting the decision of the courts, and of maintaining their power, as opposed to the privileges of this House. You may meet a case in which it will be necessary to attach the judges themselves. You have, even since I became a Member of this House, brought a judge before you

– I mean Sir Jonah Barrington,— whom, by your publication, you charged with peculation — with having laid his hands on the money of the suitors in his court, and appropriated it to his own private use. If ever there was a publication in which there was criminatory matter, that was one. Now, see how you stand towards the Queen's Bench. Supposing that, instead of Lord Denman, you had a Sir Jonah Barrington to put his hands into the pockets of the suitors in his court, and that you ventured to publish that fact; what would be the remedy? Why, the moment the publication would appear, the publisher would be considered, if Lord Denman be right, to have insulted the judge; the publication would be considered a contempt, and the individual whom we had authorised to publish would be attached by the court, and sent to gaol. Lord Denman, in that supposed case, would have a right to issue an attachment; the rest of the court, as they have already concurred with him in principle, would also agree with him in this; and the individual would be attached, and might lie in gaol as long as the court chose to keep him there. Lord Denman, himself, might try the printer of this House on an indictment, when the truth as to the facts would not be permitted to be given; as truth is no defence where a party is indicted for a libel; by which means he would also suffer for doing that which he performed at the instance of this House. You may praise the present judges as much as you please; I believe they deserve to be praised: but bad times and bad judges may come; and then see in what a situation you will be placed. The law leaves the judges irresponsible for whatever bad act they may do, criminally or civilly, as judges; for such acts they are to be free from action or indictment by any individual; they are responsible to the Commons' House of Parliament, and to nobody else; and yet it is said, forsooth, that we are to be responsible to the judges. Is that, I ask, common sense? We are contending for a privilege that is useful to the public, and not to the Members of this House. That privilege is the common law of the land, and is absolutely necessary to enable us to perform the public business of legislation. I am of opinion, that, if the existence of the privilege be clear, the mode of vindicating it is clear also; and that we ought not to depart from that mode, or place our privileges in peril, by sanctioning this Bill.

The Noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley), in the able speech he made last night, not being a professional lawyer, was betrayed into a mistake, in supposing that any recital in the proposed Bill will affect the decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench. The Noble Lord should recollect that, unlike France we have no code of laws to refer to. The landmarks of the British law are, the judgments of the courts. When a judgment is acquiesced in, it becomes law; and any ranting at, or censure of, such judgment, whether given by a private individual or by a body of persons not authorised to reverse it, is not only idle, but strengthens the force of the judgment. The fact of a judgment not being directly contradicted or overruled, amounts to an acquiescence; and when a judgment has been thus acquiesced in, future judges will not feel themselves at liberty to depart from a rule so established. But, if, after all, it be determined to proceed by this Bill, the House must recollect that it will have to be submitted to another tribunal. We all know the force of the epigrammatic points with which, in that other tribunal to which I allude, a very able, although not a very wise, person will, probably, come forward and dispute our privilege, and thereby inflame the very worst passions of parties out of that House, who are disposed to agree with him. The privilege claimed by this House is disputed by two classes, — by the Chartists on one hand, and by the ultra-Tories on the other; and if you throw in the advantage of all the power and eloquence of a man reckless of everything but carrying his point, you may create an opposition to that privilege, such as you have not yet met with, and such as you are not likely to meet with, unless you provoke it in this way. Why not try all that remains to be done, before you resort to this Bill, — against which I certainly protest as giving us no certainty of a remedy; whereas, by it, we appear, in the eyes of the public, to crouch and submit. If we assume an air of vacillation and doubt about our own privileges, we shall afford opportunities of having those privileges ransacked and vilified in a quarter where we ought not to expect or seek protection. I would not submit the privileges and powers of this House to the keeping of any party, — privileges and powers which are always necessary, and at no time more necessary than at present. I thank Honourable Gentlemen for the attention with which they have heard me; and I beg leave, in conclusion, to enter my protest against this proposed mode of proceeding, and to remind the House that we are battling with that which has been condemned on every side as an erroneous judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench; and that, being right in our struggle for the advantage of the public, we ought not to have the appearance, much less the reality, of shrinking from the contest, until we have exhausted all the means at our disposal.

SIR WILLIAM FOLLETT. — The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin opposes the introduction of this Bill, because, as he says, the House has, at present, the means of carrying the object sought for by the Bill into effect. It was intimated before, that we ought to summon, and the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has, now, distinctly called upon the House to summon, the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench to the bar, and commit them for giving a judgment contrary to the opinion of the majority of this House. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman says that, unless we do this, we cannot effectually vindicate our privileges; but let me call the attention of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman to what I consider to be the proposition before us. He says, in the first place, that it has not been disputed by any of the leading Members of the House, that the House has power to communicate, freely and without question, its proceedings to the public. That is the opinion I have always entertained, and the opinion I have expressed upon all occasions. I think the House has that power, and that it ought to have it; because I consider such a power essential to the due discharge of its functions. I have no hesitation in repeating the opinion I before expressed, — that, in this case, the publication, having taken place by the order of this House, ought to have been declared to be unquestionable by the Court of Queen's Bench. When the judgment of that court was delivered, I also stated it to be my opinion that we ought to have questioned that judgment in a court of error; and I regret that that course has not been pursued; for, had we done so, I think we should have been spared the proceedings which have since been taken, and not have found it necessary to commit parties by the authority of this House. That course not having been followed, the Honourable Gentleman says, we are proceeding to legislate, but we are, at the same time, leaving the judgment of the Queen's Bench unquestioned. By what means, let me ask, can we reverse the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench? Only by a writ of error, or an Act of Parliament. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman knows that very well, and yet he declines to do either; — in the one case, because he would not consult the judges; and, in the other, because the judgment of the court is left unquestioned. Although I am distinctly of opinion that the House possesses the privilege it claims, — that that privilege is essential, — and that the Court of Queen's Bench ought to have given a different judgment; still, I greatly object to the course of proceeding which has been adopted by the House. I object to it, because I do not consider it to be a constitutional mode of interfering with the court; and I object to it, also, because I believe it ineffectual.

The Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin says that the House has not proceeded to the utmost. Work the privilege to the utmost, and see what the House can do. Take the case that has already occurred. An action is brought during the recess, and judgment is obtained. When we meet, what shall we do? Shall we commit the sheriff? The Honourable and Learned Gentleman says that we have discharged one sheriff, and are prepared to discharge the other. But suppose we keep him in custody; what then? My Right Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General is of opinion that we should keep him till the privilege of the House is vindicated; and the Honourable Member for Bridport (Mr. Warburton) says that the sheriff may obtain his release when he likes, by paying the money. But you have not prevented Mr. Stockdale from obtaining the fruits of the judgment given in his favour; and do you think, after that, that you will be vindicating the privileges of the House, if you make the sheriff pay the money again? What would you do with the money, if the sheriff paid it? It is true that you would not have to vote payment to Mr. Hansard; that you would save the public purse about 600*l.*; but you would not have prevented the plaintiff from having successfully instituted an action, and walking off with the fruits of it. I say, then, that keeping the sheriff in custody will not show that your power is effectual to vindicate your privilege. Suppose the sheriff to do what the under sheriff stated that he was willing to do, — namely, to obey the orders of the House as far as he could; — suppose, then, that an application is made to the Court of Queen's Bench, and that the sheriff makes a return of the order of this House, directing him not to levy; — this would bring directly under the cognisance of the Court of Queen's Bench the resolutions and orders of the House, and what would be the consequence? We know, from the facts that have occurred, that the judges would treat that Return as a nullity, and would order it to be taken off the file. I want to know what the House is prepared to do in that case? The judges declare the Return a nullity, and order the sheriff, notwithstanding that Return, to execute the writ. The sheriff comes to this House, and says, "I have taken your resolutions to the judges; they have had judicial information of them; and, notwithstanding that, they have directed me to proceed; and, if you do not protect me, the judges will send me to Newgate." If, after this, the sheriff proceeds to execute the writ, will this House take him into custody for obeying the orders of the Court of Queen's Bench? or will you do what the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin says you ought to have done, — namely, summon the judges to the bar, and tell them, that, having been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House, they must be punished? You cannot avoid the dilemma. If you are determined to support your privileges by means of committals, you must summon the judges, and not the sheriffs. Let me ask Honourable Members whether they are prepared to summon to the bar the judges of the courts of justice,—not for malversation or peculation, — as in the case to which the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin referred, — not for misbehaviour or misconduct, — but because they, men of learning, of character and honour, conscientiously gave a judgment according to the best of their knowledge. Will you summon the judges, and compel them to state the grounds on which they have come to their decision? Is the House prepared to take such a step? I can well understand such a course being pursued in other days, in bad times; for such things occurred not in the good times of our history, but in times of trouble. It is true that the House of Commons summoned one judge to the bar; but there is a wide distinction between the times when that judge was summoned and the present. If you summon a judge, or any other person, to the bar of the House, your power will be wholly ineffectual, unless you are backed by the popular voice. In the times to which the Honourable Member for Dublin alluded, this House was struggling for the liberties of the people against the Court, and against the power of the Crown. That made the House of Commons popular, and caused the steps which were taken by it be to supported by the people. In what position did the judges stand, then? The judges were wholly and entirely dependent on the Crown, removable at the will and pleasure of the Crown, and dependent for their salaries and places altogether upon the Crown. They were chosen, not always for their learning, but sometimes for their subserviency; and the public considered them as the mere creatures of the Crown; and therefore it was that they supported the House of Commons when the House of Commons went the length of taking steps against the judges. Is that the case at present? In what position do the judges stand, now? We know that, throughout the country, there is often exhibited a want of reverence towards the constituted authorities; but I believe that, in all times, even those of the greatest trouble and discontent, the judges form an exception. There is an unbounded and well-founded confidence in their integrity and learning. They are not dependent on the Crown; but, on the contrary, perfectly independent of the Crown, and of the public; and, indeed, of every other authority in the state. They are appointed to administer justice; they do so in the most honest, most conscientious, and most upright manner; and I am satisfied, if you attempt to interfere with the administration of the law, or to bring the judges to the bar of this House, that it will be—I might almost say—the last time that the House of Commons will ever exercise another privilege.

The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin says that judges are responsible to the House of Commons. In what way? It is true that either House of Parliament may present an Address to the Crown to remove a judge; and so far the judges are responsible. It is also true that this House may impeach a judge; but I have yet to learn that the judges are responsible in the way pointed out by the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, — that if they give a judgment that is displeasing to the majority of this House, they are liable to be dragged to the bar, questioned, censured, and punished for that judgment. If, as has been contended, you ought to keep the sheriff in custody until he pays the money, you must, in order to vindicate your privilege, keep the judges in custody until they retract their judgment. I ask the House whether such a proceeding is possible? If the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin thinks the protection of this privilege — privilege is not a proper name to apply to it — the protection of this right, rather — essential; and if we cannot protect it except by the course pointed out by that Honourable and Learned Gentleman; then I say that the strongest possible argument is thereby afforded in favour of the Noble Lord's Bill. The argument of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, that we ought to work out the power we possess to its full extent before we bring in a Bill, leads to its own refutation; for I have shown that you cannot effectually work out that power: therefore I say that some Bill of this sort is necessary. With respect to the Bill itself, I know nothing, except from the statements of the Noble Lord upon asking for leave to bring it in; and I therefore do not wish to give any opinion upon it, as much will depend on the manner in which it will be drawn up and worded; but, addressing myself to the strong advocates of privilege, I must say, taking what the Noble Lord has stated to be the object of the Bill, that I cannot conceive that they have any right to complain of it. If I understood the Noble Lord, the Bill will be confined solely and entirely to the power of publication, which is questioned; thus leaving entirely untouched every other right and privilege of the House.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—Hear, hear!

SIR WILLIAM FOLLETT. — The Noble Lord cries "Hear!" as if he believed that this Bill would affect the other privileges of the House. I want to know how that can happen? I am standing up for the right of publishing but the Court of Queen's Bench has decided against us; and I find that we cannot effectually maintain that right by the means we at present possess. Is there any inconsistency in getting an Act of the Legislature to provide additional power and security? The Noble Lord's Bill will enable any printer or publisher, under the immediate orders of the House, — whether in the recess or not, — to stay proceedings in any action. Push your privilege to its greatest extent, and you cannot do that. When you find the powers of the House insufficient to secure the privilege you wish to establish, how are those powers affected by giving them additional force? I could understand the argument, if you said that by this Bill the power of commitment was taken away; but it is no such thing. That power will remain as much as if this Bill did not pass. I cannot therefore conceive how the high sticklers for privilege can say that the privileges of the House are affected by this Bill, when they find that they cannot effectually support the power of publication without additional means, which means must be provided by the Legislature. My Right Honourable Friend behind me (Sir Edward Sugden) opposed the introduction of the Bill, on the ground that we have no right to make an enactment for the protection of the publication of our papers, while we leave untouched the two resolutions of 1837, and the resolution of 1835. The resolutions of 1837 are in no way confirmed or sanctioned by this Bill. It leaves them to stand exactly upon their own merits, according to the law and privilege of Parliament. If they are well founded upon that law and privilege, this Bill will not lessen their effect; and if they are not well founded, this Bill will give them no additional support whatever. With regard to the resolution of 1835, for the sale of papers, if my Right Honourable Friend means that the Bill should contain some legislative enactment to alter that resolution ——

SIR E. SUGDEN. — But I do not.

SIR W. FOLLETT. — Well, if my Right Honourable Friend had so meant, I would say, that I should object to any legislative interference with the mode of proceeding in the publication of our papers. But if my Right Honourable Friend only means that this House ought to proceed to alter the resolution of 1835, then I would say that, as far as the resolution itself goes, I feel the strongest possible objection to its continuance. I hold that resolution injudicious, and that any saving it may produce cannot possibly counterbalance the injury it causes. I should be glad, therefore, if that resolution were altered. It is not, however, necessary, as a precedent to this Bill, to enter into the consideration of that resolution. The House may alter it after the passing of this Bill, if it do pass, or in another Session; but to alter or rescind it by way of bargain for allowing this Bill to be introduced, does not appear to me to be the right way of proceeding. I shall be quite ready, at the proper time, to support a motion for the appointment of a Committee to inquire whether any effective check can be placed upon the publication by the House, of defamatory or libellous matter. I gladly approve of the introduction of a measure which shall prevent the necessity of having recourse to the steps we have of late been compelled to take, and which shall, at the same time, protect the right which the House lays claim to, and ought to have, by an act of the entire Legislature. I must say, also, that, however anxious Honourable Members may be to preserve the privileges of the House unimpaired, I am sure th power fully admitted by a court of law; and if I thought that power would prove effectual for the maintenance of the privilege, that power I would go on to put in operation. But having established that power, and having tried the experiment of its complete efficacy without effect, does it not become us to make the experiment whether we can, by legislation, procure other means of maintaining this important privilege? If we fail, we cannot help it. Our power depends, to a great extent, upon our moral influence; and I very much question whether, — if, after having made an attempt to legislate, and that attempt proving unsuccessful, we be compelled again to resort to the power of imprisonment, — our proceedings would not be more fortified by that moral influence than if we were to refuse to make the experiment.

My sole reason for listening to the attempt to legislate is this,—that our power, as I originally declared, is, in my opinion, incomplete and imperfect. Now, first, as to time. It is clear that the power of the House to imprison is limited by the duration of the Session. We can make menaces for the future; but the constitution denies us the power of continuing the single penalty which we can inflict — that of imprisonment — beyond the duration of the Session. Thus, during the recess, our printer is liable to be pursued by actions, which, under the recent improvements in pleading, can be brought to a conclusion so much sooner than formerly, that, before we meet again, executions can issue against him; for, although we resolve not to plead, we cannot compel plaintiffs not to bring actions; and our officer cannot rely on the protection of the court. And I ask of the Honourable Gentleman, — I ask of the House, — is it decent that, during the recess, the printer of the House of Commons should be pursued by actions brought by every man who chooses to speculate on the chance of damages? This is a monstrous notion, — it is an indignity to the House of Commons. I am told that we can adjourn, instead of proroguing; but is it not also a monstrous thing, that a man like this Mr. Stockdale should have a power to suspend that constitutional power of the Crown, and oblige it to resort to such a mode of proceeding? Does it not derogate from the dignity of the constituted authorities of the land, to be thus compelled to depart from that uniform course which experience has shown to be the most convenient? and is it right that we should be obliged, in order to protect our privileges, to address the Crown for such an exercise of its prerogative? Are Sessions of Parliament, in future, to be permanent? Are prorogations to be always suspended? Is it not far more convenient to make the attempt to provide a legislative remedy, than to resort to such inconvenient extremities? My Right Honourable Friend the Member for Exeter asks, why did we not issue a writ of error, and appeal against the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. Now, I do not forget what has been said about a change in the opinions of the judicial bench; but I very much doubt whether that change has not been connected with the discussions which have taken place here. Sir, if we had brought the writ of error, it must have been immediately after the second decision of the Court of Queen's Bench; and I very much doubt, if we had then made the appeal, whether the issue would have been so favourable as it might be now. The question is, not whether we should appeal now, but whether it was politic to appeal then; for it was not a hasty judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. When, to the first action, we pleaded privilege in bar, the court, by a single judge, decided against us; and, in the second action, the court unanimously decided against us. Suppose, then, we had immediately gone to the fifteen judges, what was there to induce us to presume that their judgment would be as favourable as now it is? And suppose the decision had been against us, would my Honourable and Learned Friend have advised us to go before the House of Lords as a judicial tribunal? I do not think he would; and now, there is an opinion entertained by some eminent authorities, that, even though we should have tried the appeal to the fifteen judges, yet they would not have advised us to submit our privileges to the House of Lords in its judicial capacity.

I have attempted, Sir, to show that the constitutional powers of this House are necessarily limited in point of time; and that the substitution of adjournments for prorogations is an expedient degrading to the constituted authorities of the realm. How is the power, which we have, effectual to prevent a plaintiff from succeeding in his object? Has it prevented the plaintiff from getting his damages? You have committed the sheriffs — you have committed Stockdale — you have committed the attorney — you have committed his son, and his clerk; — you have exercised the power you possess, and that largely; — but have you prevented the plaintiff from getting his damages? and how do you propose to do so? I see all the difficulties tainly has been one meeting in Middlesex, calling itself a public meeting, to which persons were admitted only by tickets, and at which some strong resolutions against the privileges of the House were passed; but I am not aware that, throughout the kingdom, from one end to the other, there has been any particular exhibition of feeling manifested against them.

[Laughter, and cries of "Oh!"]

Ten or twelve elections have taken place since this subject has been in agitation, and I am not aware that the topic has even been alluded to at any of them. I admit that I do not dissent from the principle of this Bill; but, at the same time, I do not think we should resort to any other quarter for co-operation and assistance, until we had first exhausted every means in our power, of vindicating our privileges, and had gone up to the Queen with an Address, praying Her Majesty not to prorogue this House, but suffer us to adjourn, from time to time, in order to continue the operation of its powers. If this Bill had originated in the other House, and come down to the bar, I should have been prepared to accept it; but, emanating as it does, in this House, with a view of being sent up to the House of Lords for approval, and without any certainty of success, I shall feel it my duty to oppose its progress in every stage.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — Ever since the commencement of these proceedings, I foresaw that the difficulties attendant upon the position in which we were placed would eventually oblige us to resort to legislation, in order effectually to remove them. I foresaw that, to maintain those powers which were absolutely essential to the discharge of our duties, it would become necessary to have recourse to legislative enactments. I felt that we were bound to make every exertion, and avail ourselves of every power which we possessed, to protect our privileges; and if I could, at the beginning, anticipate failure in the course we were then taking, that anticipation I did not hold to be any reason for our not availing ourselves of every means, which the constitution afforded us for the purpose of giving protection to those privileges. I thought that a Bill would be necessary to remove all doubts, and to render those powers efficient and effectual; but I did think that the Bill ought to have originated in the House of Peers; and I have now an admission from the Honourable Gentleman opposite that, if the Bill originated in the House of Peers, he would not oppose it. It may be said, why do we not endeavour to secure our other privileges by legislation, as well as the privilege of publication? For my part, I should have no objection to secure all our other privileges, if they were called in question; but, if we proceeded to define them, it would, perhaps, be urged, that, in case we omitted the mention of any one of those privileges, such an omission would amount to an acknowledgment that it did not exist, and that we had no right afterwards to claim it. In speaking on this subject, I must take the opportunity of saying that all the consideration I have given to it induces me to adhere more strongly than ever to my original views; and I must repeat, that I do believe the power of publication to be absolutely essential to the due performance of the functions of this House; and that a more unwarrantable judgment, or one more irreconcilable with reason, than that by which it was attempted to deprive this House of that right, was never delivered from the judicial bench. When I say the judgment was unwarrantable, I also mean to say, that a judgment more irreconcilable with the reasons given for it was, to my mind, never given; for I cannot make the decision correspond even with the grounds alleged for it. Indeed, we have the distinct admission of those opposed to me, as to the practical course we have taken, that they consider the judgment a most erroneous one. My Right Honourable and Learned Friend, for whose character and opinions I entertain the highest respect, the late Chancellor for Ireland, and my other Honourable and Learned Friend, for whose abilities I entertain the most profound admiration, and who is one of the most distinguished ornaments doing honour to the profession to which he belongs, — not only now, but at any time, — both of them have distinctly admitted that the House of Commons possesses the undoubted power of publishing its own proceedings; and therefore I say that, whatever may be the difficulties in which we are placed, — whatever the inconveniences that have arisen, — they do not arise from the urging of any extravagant pretensions on our part, but from a right to which we are absolutely entitled, after its having been questioned in a court of law. I think, Sir, as I have said, that we were bound not to resort to legislation in the first instance, — we were bound to make a full trial of our own powers. And it has proved highly important that we should have done as we have done; for thereby we have established our privilege beyond all question or doubt, — namely, the power of imprisonment for a breach of our privileges. We have that power fully admitted by a court of law; and if I thought that power would prove effectual for the maintenance of the privilege, that power I would go on to put in operation. But having established that power, and having tried the experiment of its complete efficacy without effect, does it not become us to make the experiment whether we can, by legislation, procure other means of maintaining this important privilege? If we fail, we cannot help it. Our power depends, to a great extent, upon our moral influence; and I very much question whether, — if, after having made an attempt to legislate, and that attempt proving unsuccessful, we be compelled again to resort to the power of imprisonment, — our proceedings would not be more fortified by that moral influence than if we were to refuse to make the experiment.

My sole reason for listening to the attempt to legislate is this,—that our power, as I originally declared, is, in my opinion, incomplete and imperfect. Now, first, as to time. It is clear that the power of the House to imprison is limited by the duration of the Session. We can make menaces for the future; but the constitution denies us the power of continuing the single penalty which we can inflict — that of imprisonment — beyond the duration of the Session. Are Sessions of Parliament, in future, to be permanent? Are prorogations to be always suspended? Is it not far more convenient to make the attempt to provide a legislative remedy, than to resort to such inconvenient extremities? My Right Honourable Friend the Member for Exeter asks, why did we not issue a writ of error, and appeal against the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. Now, I do not forget what has been said about a change in the opinions of the judicial bench; but I very much doubt whether that change has not been connected with the discussions which have taken place here. Sir, if we had brought the writ of error, it must have been immediately after the second decision of the Court of Queen's Bench; and I very much doubt, if we had then made the appeal, whether the issue would have been so favourable as it might be now. The question is, not whether we should appeal now, but whether it was politic to appeal then; for it was not a hasty judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. When, to the first action, we pleaded privilege in bar, the court, by a single judge, decided against us; and, in the second action, the court unanimously decided against us. Suppose, then, we had immediately gone to the fifteen judges, what was there to induce us to presume that their judgment would be as favourable as now it is? And suppose the decision had been against us, would my Honourable and Learned Friend have advised us to go before the House of Lords as a judicial tribunal? I do not think he would; and now, there is an opinion entertained by some eminent authorities, that, even though we should have tried the appeal to the fifteen judges, yet they would not have advised us to submit our privileges to the House of Lords in its judicial capacity.

I have attempted, Sir, to show that the constitutional powers of this House are necessarily limited in point of time; and that the substitution of adjournments for prorogations is an expedient degrading to the constituted authorities of the realm. How is the power, which we have, effectual to prevent a plaintiff from succeeding in his object? Has it prevented the plaintiff from getting his damages? You have committed the sheriffs — you have committed Stockdale — you have committed the attorney — you have committed his son, and his clerk; — you have exercised the power you possess, and that largely; — but have you prevented the plaintiff from getting his damages? and how do you propose to do so? I see all the difficulties in the way of legislation, and I am perfectly ready to take any course to maintain our privileges, by our own inherent right; but first show me, that by so doing, you can prevent the plaintiff from getting the money. Neither the committal of plaintiff, attorney, sheriffs — no, nor even of the judges — can prevent this. Do you deprive, by it, any man in the situation of life of Mr. Stockdale, who may desire to get 600*l.* for any alleged injury to his "character," from bringing actions against your printers and officers? You may go on committing, — and, if it would be effectual to prevent plaintiffs from getting their damages, I should be ready to do it;—but this you cannot do. And I very much question, whether a man like Mr. Stockdale be not perfectly content with his situation, and very willing to set 600*l.* against his confinement in Newgate till the end of the Session. And, suppose the damages had been fivefold, what means should we have of preventing the same issue? In this case, Mr. Stockdale has got his money; and can there be any doubt that, towards the end of the Session, we shall be called on, in the miscellaneous estimates, to vote a sum of 800*l.* or 900*l.*, to defray the expenses of the action against our printer. We cannot say to Mr. Hansard, "We have not, as yet, got the money from the sheriffs, and you must wait until we get it." We could not be guilty of such an act of injustice. Already, the greatest injustice has been done to your servant. A perfectly innocent man, acting under your authority, has been treated almost as a criminal, — has had his goods seized and exposed to sale, and 600*l.* taken from him. Nor is it merely in a pecuniary way that I estimate Mr. Hansard's loss; for, in addition to his loss of 600*l.*, we must be all aware how much annoyance and anxiety he must have suffered, in consequence of those proceedings. Now, can anything be more discreditable than to have to pass such a vote as that which we shall have to pass at the end of the Session?—and yet, can we avoid it? We made a vote last year, and we cannot escape it this year. I say, that this is absolutely degrading to the House. Yet this degradation you cannot escape by the exercise of our inherent power. If you cannot do so, then we must give protection by legislation, — taking care, at the same time, in so doing, not to compromise a single privilege. In this, as well as in all human affairs, we must look to the balance of inconveniences; and if you say, "Go on committing," you must remember who are the persons whom you will ultimately be obliged to commit; and to be driven into a conflict with such persons, would be a public inconvenience of a serious description. Look, also, to the consumption of our time — time of inestimable value to the public, if properly applied; but are we to have it consumed, night after night, in these discussions? Then, consider what the constitution of the body is which holds this power of imprisonment. In the case of a single judge, his power, as regards a decision, is perfectly despotic; whilst, in this House, every decision must depend on the will of the majority of its Members.

One of the inconveniences attending authority of this nature, exercised by such a body as this, is, that differences of opinion will naturally arise, — long contests ensue: a party declares itself in favour of the plaintiff, and this declaration acts as an encouragement to him and others, — and a man, perhaps, whom no one respects in the circle in which he lives, becomes lifted up into notoriety, by entering into a contest with this House. Persons overlook his character and his motives; they identify the person with what they believe to be a great public principle,—which serves his purpose of notoriety; and he will find men of the highest honour co-operating with him, though such co-operation may be coupled with the greatest contempt for himself, and for his private character. If, then, we can find any medium consistent with our own character and honour, and the preservation of our privileges, is it not wise to seek it? If you do not, this contest will be carried on night after night. You will have it, not only in this, but in other forms, if you rely on the efficacy of imprisonment. I much doubt, taking into consideration the motives which form human character, whether imprisonment would prove efficacious. The spirit of party, — the desire of notoriety, — the sympathy which attaches to what they might believe to be an unjust sentence, would induce other counsel to take the place of those whom you had imprisoned; and I question much whether this state of things would not involve you in a contest perfectly interminable. I much doubt whether imprisonment would produce any of the effects which might be desired; but even supposing that it would, still, if it were possible to legislate on the subject, consistently with the safe custody of the other privileges of the House, I would much rather make the attempt than continue to be engaged in interminable contests. I shall therefore give my cordial consent to the introduction of a Bill; reserving to myself the power of objecting to any of the details, at a future period of

I should feel such objection called for. It has been suggested, that, by legislating upon this privilege, we may affect our privileges generally. Now, I do not think it will be denied that this House has the full and undoubted privilege of deciding in cases of controverted elections; and yet, in relation to that subject, we were obliged to obtain the assistance of the other House, and to resort to legislation; yet no one will, I believe, say that the passing of the Grenville Act in the least affected our privilege of deciding on election petitions. Well, then, as regards another objection which has been suggested. Suppose this Bill should be presented to the House of Lords, and they attach to it unreasonable conditions; — suppose it be one of those conditions, that we shall only sell papers by legislative enactment; — surely it is perfectly in our power to reject an unreasonable condition, and to assign our reasons for it in a conference; and, if the other House will not give way, then abandon the Bill altogether, and fall back on the power we already possess. We shall then be no worse; and when we shall have made a perfectly frank attempt to obtain a less inconvenient and more effectual power to protect our privileges, I am inclined to think that, if we are compelled still to resort to our inherent power of imprisonment, the exercise of that power will be more acceptable, after this attempt, to the public, than if we had not, meanwhile, made such an attempt I am convinced that we shall best satisfy the public by acting with every degree of moderation, forbearance, and temperance consistent with the vindication of our privileges; and I trust the House of Lords will see the practical embarrassment in which we are placed, and the difficulties by which we are surrounded,—not by any error of our own, but in consequence of the judgment given in the Court of Queen's Bench; and that the House of Lords will return the Bill to us in such a form as we can with propriety accept, — such a form as shall enable us effectually to maintain those privileges which are essential to the discharge of our legislative duties. I certainly did originally think that the Bill ought to originate in the House of Lords; but I have since changed my opinion in that respect; and, on reflection, I think it impossible that the House of Lords should originate such a Bill, without solicitation from, or a conference with, this House. It would be more dignified that this House should originate the Bill, than that the Bill should come down from the House of Lords in the first instance. The best mode of proceeding would, in my opinion, be for this House to send to the House of Lords such a Bill as we shall think consistent with the preservation of our privileges, and effectually calculated to maintain them.

On these grounds, then, which I have always entertained and expressed, I shall support the motion of the Noble Lord. Our power, I have always said, is incomplete; and I confess that I am most unwilling to proceed to a step so alien to the feelings and spirit of this age, as the commitment of the judges to prison. I should strongly deprecate such a collision between the highest authorities of the state; and, after all, we could not maintain that conflict by our own powers, — we should be obliged to resort to the Crown, and to address the Crown to place a force at our disposal; for I am not aware that this House has any inherent authority to levy a force. If we do not resort to legislation, the question for the House to decide will be, — not whether it shall deal with ministerial officers, but — whether it will be prepared to commit the judges? I believe that public opinion, in this country, is in favour of this privilege. I believe that public opinion is in favour of the publicity of our proceedings; and that what it requires of this House is, that it should be the great inquirer into abuses, — the detector of corruption, — that it should legislate upon evidence and facts alone, — and that, by the publication of all its proceedings (a right which it has exercised for 150 years), the public should have an opportunity of knowing the grounds of its decisions. This, Sir, I do believe to be the public opinion, — with some differences, perhaps, as to the mode of vindicating our privileges. But, in relation to the privilege of publication, all sound and deliberate public opinion is in its favour. It is most important that we, the representatives of public opinion, should be backed by it; and I do believe that we are more likely to insure this by providing a permanent and certain protection for our officers, through the intervention of law, than by entering into a personal conflict with the judges, and setting an example to the country of lowering the dignity of that bench, on the respect and veneration paid to which the best interests of the country depend. Looking, therefore, to all these circumstances,—the difficulty of maintaining our power, and that sacrifice of the public time I speak of,—I do think it decidedly wise to submit to the House of Lords such a measure as shall, on the one hand, give effectual protection to what the Honourable Member has justly called — not the privilege, but—"the right" of publication; and, at the same time, avoid, as far as possible, the drawing into question those other privileges which we possess, and which are essential to the due performance of our functions here.

Mr. HUME.— I heard, from the Right Honourable Baronet opposite, on the first night that this question was brought before us, a very able and eloquent speech upon the subject; and I do not see anything which has since occurred that ought to have effected a change in the opinions which the Right Honourable Baronet at that time expressed. We have tried our power to commit the sheriff for acting against our servant; and why are we now to relinquish those proceedings, after having gone so far in them? Why should we not carefully define what our privileges are in a Bill, instead of legislating for this privilege, alone? If we are to legislate upon the subject of our privileges, why should we not include all of them? It should be recollected, that there are actions still going on; and if such a change in legal opinion have taken place as has been stated, is it not improbable that future decisions will be against us. I fully concur with the Right Honourable Baronet in his opinion as to the evils which might result from a conflict with the judges; but I cannot forget the importance of the right of publication; and I must say, that I never heard the Right Honourable Baronet make a better speech than that in which he defended this right of publication as one of the privileges of the House. Is it consistent with the importance of our privileges to seek the protection of the Legislature for them? The privileges of the courts of law depend on custom and common law; and I would ask, is it not degrading for us to seek the help of legislation to protect our privileges? I cannot see any ground which now exists for inducing us to retrace the steps which we have taken, in order to assert and vindicate those privileges. But if it be proposed to secure our privileges by legislation, why, let me ask, do we not define all the other privileges which we claim, and secure them also? I shall vote against this Bill; and I enter my protest against the shilly-shally conduct of those who, having embarked in a contest with us, now desert us. I have not heard the able speech of the Solicitor General answered, as yet, notwithstanding all that has been said on the other side of the question. Let Honourable Gentlemen who advocate the introduction of this Bill meet the arguments of the Solicitor General if they can; but as these have not, as yet, been answered, I must say, that I feel bound to support him.

COLONEL SIBTHORP.—I have always heard that there is more joy in heaven over one sinner who repents, than for ninety and nine just men. As far as I can understand, the Honourable Member for Kilkenny is repentant in this matter; and I believe the Noble Lord opposite is also repentant, otherwise he would not have introduced, at the eleventh hour, such a nonsensical Bill as that under discussion. I am obliged to differ, although with great regret, from the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth in his view of this question,—

> Aliquando bonus dormit Homerus.

The Noble Lord has grounded his motion on the lamentable waste of the time of the House which this question has caused; but why did the Noble Lord not consider that point before? The fact, however, in my opinion, is, that the Noble Lord is not sorry, but glad, of this waste of time; because it gave the Chancellor of the Exchequer an opportunity of making up a more plausible Budget than he would otherwise have done. The Noble Lord has done all that he could do; he has imprisoned the sheriffs for not having violated their oaths; and now he comes forward with this Bill to declare himself vanquished. I do not, however, hesitate to say, that I look with great suspicion on this measure.

> Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.

It may be called a Bill for the relief of the sheriffs; but it, in reality, only casts scorn upon their persecutors; and, I declare to God, I would much rather be incarcerated for the remainder of my days, than not act as those gentlemen did in the discharge of their duty. I call upon the Noble Lord to fix a day for the different stages of his Bill; and I must say, I believe it is no more than a noose to catch my Right Honourable Friend near me

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—I must confess, that the impressions created by the speech of my Honourable Friend the Solicitor General are far from being removed from my mind by anything which has been urged in the debate of this night. Every one who listened with attention to the speeches of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, and of the Honourable and Learned Member for Exeter, must have perceived that those who are called upon to support the Bill of my Noble Friend, are called on to do so on the ground of the utter inadequacy of the House, by its own authority, to support its privileges. The Honourable and Learned Member for Exeter says, that we ought, when the judgment of the Queen's Bench was against us, to proceed to a writ of error; that we ought to bring the case before the fifteen judges, and thence it would go before the House of Lords; by which I am to understand that the Honourable Member would submit our privileges to the discretion of another branch of the Legislature. I believe that to be a new doctrine in the law and constitution of the country; for I have been always taught to consider the House of Commons as co-ordinate with and coequal to any other branch of the Legislature. I was never taught to believe that the House of Commons was subordinate to the House of Lords; and although the opinion expressed by the Honourable and Learned Member for Exeter implies so much, yet I must say, that the case is not so with the Right Honourable Baronet opposite, and the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, both of whom have hitherto supported, with ability, and, I did hope, would have done so with firmness, the principle that the House of Commons was to be the exclusive judge of its own privileges. What, let me ask, is the meaning of saying, that we are to be judges of our own privileges, if we are to be called on to support such a proposition as that now before the House? It has been, no doubt, argued that, under cover of asserting its privileges, the House of Commons may do what it pleases, and establish anything it desires. But is that difficulty escaped from, by conferring unlimited power upon the House of Lords? If the House of Commons can declare anything privilege, by the Bill of the Noble Lord, the House of Lords will be enabled to deprive us of any privilege we now possess. While it was believed that there was no authority to overrule the privileges of the House of Commons, there might be, meantime, no attempt made to impugn them; but once admit such an authority, and there is, immediately, an inducement offered to every interested party to contest them in every particular. What is to save our other privileges,—such as that of ordering the production of papers, for instance? But I may be told, that that is a right which could not be impugned. Before the case of Stockdale, I thought the same of the privilege of publication; and yet it has been impugned. Now, let me imagine a case in which parties would be interested in objecting to our privilege to compel the production of papers. Suppose the House sought to impeach a Member of the other branch of the Legislature for malpractices in his capacity of Governor General of India. Suppose, in pursuance of our duty, we sent to the India Company for the necessary papers; and suppose that that body denied them;—how should the House proceed then? Under the Noble Lord's Bill, it should bring the case into the courts of law; and, if a verdict were there given against the India Company, the case might be removed by writ of error into the Exchequer Chamber, and then by appeal into the House of Lords. Here, then, we should have the House of Lords sitting in judgment on a case which involved its own interests; and yet that is what the Bill naturally leads to. Does the right of calling for papers rest on any higher grounds than the right of publication, that it should not be questioned any more than that? Not at all. The right of publication rests on 200 years of exercise and undoubted acquiescence, during periods when the strongest inducement to control it existed. It is a right which has been heretofore recognised by the Court of King's Bench; the last case which involved that question having been one in which Mr. Horne Tooke proceeded against a printer for a libel, for having republished a debate that had occurred in the House of Commons. What was the decision of the court on that occasion? It decided that our Reports were not libels; and that not only the printer of the House of Commons was not subject to an action for libel for publishing them, but that, in case of republication by a private printer, that was not to be regarded as a libel.

If the Bill of the Noble Lord should pass, the House will have no security, either in acquiescence, or practice, or prescription, hereafter, for any one of its privileges. The Honourable and Learned Member for Exeter has said that it is proper for the House to submit to the law, as laid down by the judges, and affirmed by the House of Lords. The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth has said it is not proper, but that the House is helpless, powerless, and incapable of proceeding in the question. I, however, deny both positions. I do not think the privileges of the House should be judged elsewhere. I call upon the Right Honourable Baronet to produce proof of this House's powerlessness. The Right Honourable Baronet has argued that the power of the House is in abeyance during the recess; but to this I would answer, that if we were resolutely to assert its rights during the sitting of Parliament, that would prevent all attempts at impugning them during the recess. If the House showed the ministerial officers of the court that it would inflict signal punishment, when it met, on those who had lent themselves to such proceedings during its recess, I am quite sure that it would effectually prevent all such attempts against its privileges. The House has the power to do so; and only for the symptoms of yielding, exhibited by the Noble Lord, the sheriff would have paid over the money in dispute to the Messrs. Hansard. It may be said that it would be a hardship on the sheriffs to place them in a position of contempt to the courts of law; but that objection would be easily met by a Bill of Indemnity. And I do not for a moment believe that the courts would violate their duty and the law, as laid down by Chief Justice Lord Ellenborough,—"that no officer of the court is bound to perform acts which involve contempt of privilege—even the privilege of the Board of Green Cloth." The case of the warden of the Fleet is analogous to what would be the case of the sheriffs under such circumstances: they would be protected by the House, and the courts would not attempt to interfere. I deprecate the course taken by the Noble Lord. The House has been now engaged in a long and arduous struggle; and yet the Noble Lord comes down with a Bill to surrender those privileges for which we have been so severely contending. The Bill of my Noble Friend is a virtual acknowledgment that the House is driven to its last extremity, and can no longer defend itself; but that it is obliged to seek the assistance of the other branch of the Legislature. The Noble Lord has argued that this course would put an end to the inconveniences complained of as arising out of this question, and the waste of public time; but I believe that it will have quite a contrary effect, and that there will be, henceforth, more doubts and questions on the subject of privilege, than heretofore. But if my Noble Friend's argument is good for anything, it is good against himself. Why did he not bring in his Bill before? Why did he consume the time of the House in idle and valueless discussions? The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth had said that something has been gained by these discussions, if it be nothing more than the enlightening the judges and the other branch of the Legislature on the subject of the privileges of the House; but the Right Honourable Baronet paid no extraordinary compliment to them in saying so, or in assuming that it required such hammering to make common sense and common judgment penetrate into their heads. I have had no hesitation in performing my duty, though a painful duty, in agreeing to inflict punishment upon the sheriff, who has incurred very little, if any, moral responsibility. But I must say, that if the measure of my Noble Friend were adopted, the sheriff would be a much-injured individual; and we shall appear to have gone out of our way to offer him what I can call nothing less than a gratuitous insult. I have stated, now, Sir, what appear to me to be the objections to this Bill, even if we were sure that it would pass. But I here wish to ask the House—and it is a point worthy our serious consideration—whether we possess any assurance whatever that the Bill will pass?

The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth has said that public opinion will be more reconciled to this measure, even if the Bill should fail; and that we should be fortified with more support, and have greater power, than we at present possess, to maintain the privileges of this House. I cannot, however, Sir, concur in that view. It appears to me that the efficient exercise of our privileges depends mainly upon the confidence which we can inspire, in our determination resolutely to maintain them. It is our want of determination alone that makes us weak. If that be the case, I would ask the House whether the difficulty we are placed in would not be tenfold aggravated by the result of the attempt to carry this Bill, if that result should be a failure? What is likely to take place in another House? There will be a great array of legal authority against us there. The proof that the House of Commons will have given, by the simple fact of bringing in this Bill, that they distrust their own powers, will tell greatly against us. Our privileges will not meet with very earnest defenders in the House of Lords; but, on the contrary, will have to encounter very powerful assailants. I believe that we shall of necessity be compelled to resume that struggle in which we have already been engaged, and to resume it with crippled means and weakened powers. I would ask my Noble Friend what reasonable hope he can hold out to us that this failure will not occur? What reasonable security can he hold out that the Bill will not be defeated? I must say it strikes me that my Noble Friend in that part of his speech expressed himself with a great want of confidence. He seemed to doubt whether he could venture to assure the House that he could rely upon the character of the Bill he proposes. And what are the other symptoms that indicate failure? The Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon has said that the Bill in its present shape ought not to pass, and is not likely to pass; and it appears to me that all those who have hitherto opposed the privileges of the House will be unwilling to consent to this Bill, unless it be put into a shape that would cause the humiliation and concession of the House to be greater than my Noble Friend would consent to make them. I do not hesitate to avow the belief which I entertain, — and entertain, indeed, with great sorrow, — but which is forced upon me by all I have observed in the progress of these discussions,— namely, that no small part of the opposition we have had to encounter has arisen from a dislike to the reformed House of Commons, and from a wish to degrade and humiliate it in the eyes of the country.

[Cheers from the Ministerial, and cries of "Oh, oh!" from the Opposition benches.]

I repeat it — to degrade and humilitate the reformed House of Commons. I do not, of course, attribute such motives to Honourable Gentlemen in this House, who are the leading men; but it is the opinion which I sincerely and reluctantly entertain, that the minority on this question has been greatly swelled by the prevalence of the feeling to which I have alluded. The feeling, in fact, has been scarcely disguised; and Gentlemen who have voted in the minority have hardly scrupled, in private life, to say, that had the privileges in contention been those of the unreformed House of Commons, their votes would have been different.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!" from the Opposition benches.]

I have heard this assertion with my own ears. I have heard it argued thus: — that the unreformed House not representing so great a proportion of the people, there would not have been so great a danger of its engrossing too great power and authority into its own hands; but that since the state of the representation has been altered by the Reform Act, — since the representatives of the people have become united more closely with their constituents, — since the democratic influence in this House has increased,— it has become dangerous to invest the House with so much authority. That is the argument I have heard used. I would ask any Honourable Gentleman who has observed the high excitement and ardour which have prevailed in supporting the views of the minority on this question, whether he can doubt that a feeling of that kind has actuated no small part of them? If such a feeling, then, exists in this House, will any man assure me that it will find no entrance, and exercise no influence in another place, where it is notorious that a large majority of the Members are of opinions congenial with those of Honourable Gentlemen on the opposite side of this House? If that be the case — if there be this source of danger, I would ask whether we, as the representatives of the people of England, are justified in incurring such a risk? I would ask how my Noble Friend who proposes this measure to the House can, after the course he has so long and with such high honour to himself pursued, reconcile his mind to the chance of exposing the House of Commons to so much danger, degradation, and humiliation? Nothing is more mortifying to me than the reflection that it should be from my Noble Friend, who has received such support from this House — such constant, firm, and unvarying support — that it should be from the hands of my Noble Friend, who introduced the great measure of parliamentary reform, that the power, the dignity, and the authority of this House are to receive this mortal wound. This, indeed, I do most deeply and sincerely deplore. Had the blow proceeded from another hand, I should not have been so much surprised. And why does my Noble Friend take this course? Has any new difficulty arisen now, that might not have been distinctly foreseen from the first? I, Sir, know of none. If my Noble Friend had been firm, my conviction is, that the House would have remained true to him, and have continued to him its support. I have seen no symptom of any hesitation — any wavering — any cowardice — any disposition to retreat, on the part of those on the Ministerial side of the House, who have hitherto generally supported my Noble Friend; and if my Noble Friend had continued resolute, I am satisfied that the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth would not have deserted him. But my Noble Friend has chosen to give way. It is upon my Noble Friend's suggestion — my Noble Friend's advice — my Noble Friend's recommendation, that the House of Commons, after having commenced by threatening and blustering, is now humbly to recede from all its lofty pretensions, and to acknowledge the necessity of appealing for assistance to the other House of Parliament! I know, full well, that as my Noble Friend has taken this course, a majority of the House must be expected to support him. I know, full well, that no appeal, no remonstrance which so humble an individual as myself can make upon the subject, would be likely to prevail against the influence which my Noble Friend possesses with the majority of the House; but though I may be unsuccessful in inducing the House to adopt my views, I am determined, as far as in me lies, to do what I conceive to be my duty. I therefore emphatically declare that I will not be a party to a course of proceeding which I feel to be humiliating and degrading to the House of Commons. I, at least, when the division shall take place, will record my name as one of the opponents of this first step in that fatal line of concession, which, when once commenced, I know not where it may terminate.

Mr. MACAULAY. — I promise not to detain the House for more than a very few minutes; but I confess I have listened with so much pain to the expressions of my Noble Friend, and of one or two other Gentlemen, with whom, during the former proceedings upon this subject, I have most cordially concurred, that I am exceedingly unwilling to allow the question to go to a division, without explaining, very briefly, the ground upon which I shall give my vote, and the more particularly so, as I have not as yet taken any part in the discussions upon this question. I will not again go over the ground, on the present occasion, which others have already trod with an ability and eloquence which I am sensible I can only feebly imitate. I will only say, in general, that I believe the House of Commons to be, by the law of the land, the sole judge of its own privileges; that I believe the privilege of publication to be, by the law of the realm, one of the privileges of the House; that I believe it to be a privilege essential to the due discharge of the duties of the House; that I believe the decision of the Queen's Bench, which attacked that privilege, to have been a decision founded neither on law nor on reason; and that I never can give my support to any proposition which I conceive would tend to render that privilege doubtful. If the proposition now before the House were for a law to provide that, henceforth, this privilege should belong to the House of Commons, — to such a proposition I would give the strongest opposition in my power. But, such is not the proposition of my Noble Friend. I could perfectly understand, that by proposing to enact that such or such should be the right and privilege of the House, a question might be raised as to whether such a right or privilege had previously existed. The declaration that it should exist hereafter might appear to carry with it the implication that it had not existed previously. But the proposition, in the present case, is altogether a different one. All that is now suggested is, by a new law, to provide a new remedy for enforcing an old and well-established and undoubted privilege. I will take instances from cases perfectly familiar to every one. Suppose any Gentleman should propose to bring in a law to provide that a person, holding a bill of exchange for a good consideration, should be entitled to have an action against the acceptor of that bill to recover payment. The consequence of such a proceeding would be, to throw into a state of doubt the whole of the negotiable paper current throughout the kingdom. But if, on the other hand, a bill were proposed to this effect that the means of holders of bills of exchange not being sufficient to enable them to recover payment, therefore other means should, by a new enactment, be extended to them, will any person tell me that a measure of such a nature, acknowledging the right to recover in the fullest extent, but, giving to the holders of negotiable papers an additional remedy, — will any one tell me that such a measure would, in the smallest degree, bring into question the previously existing right of the holders of bills of exchange to proceed against the acceptors to recover payment? In point of fact, the proposition now before the House is not to provide, by a new law, that the House should have the privilege of publication — not to affect any of the existing remedies which the House already possesses for the vindication of its privileges, — but simply to superadd a new remedy. It is not even proposed to substitute the new remedy for the old ones. The Bill proposed by my Noble Friend leaves the old remedies absolutely untouched. If, after the passing of this Bill, any other person should think fit to imitate the example of Mr. Stockdale, and to set the privileges of the House at defiance, it will be as much as ever in the power of the House to send that person to prison. As I understand the Bill, it does not acknowledge, or in any way imply, that the House would not retain that power. It is founded merely upon this, — that the remedies which the House now possesses are, in some respects, imperfect, — in some respects inconvenient. And does not every Member of the House [illegible] knowledge that fact? The Noble Lord (Howick) has referred to conversations which have taken place out of this House. Is there a single Member of this House who, when he goes into the lobby, will hesitate to admit that there are some imperfections, — some inconveniences in he remedies which it at present possesses for the vindication of its privileges? Is that a perfect remedy which applies only to one half of the year, and which protects the privilege of the House during the sitting of Parliament, but leaves it wholly unguarded during the recess? Is that a perfect remedy which can only be applied by means of so large and so divided an assembly as the House of Commons? The Noble Lord has stated what he supposes to be the cause why so many Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House have ranged themselves against what he conceives to be the undoubted privilege of the House. But, whatever the cause, can there be any doubt as to its effect? Is there any doubt that there is within the walls of this House a large body of Gentlemen who have done everything in their power to prevent the House from enforcing its privileges? What has been the loss of time upon this question? Is it not a matter of regret that more time than has been occupied in the discussion of the most important measures — measures in which the interests of every part of the empire are deeply concerned — has this year been devoted to the discussion of a subject vexatious and troublesome in itself; and, though important, no doubt, in many particulars, singularly likely to be misconstrued and misunderstood by the people?

My Noble Friend says he thought it necessary, for the vindication of the privileges of the House, to imprison the sheriffs; but, at the same time, he says, he acquits them of all moral blame. Is it not a matter of regret, that the House, in order to vindicate itself, should be obliged to imprison persons guilty of no moral blame? Is that a convenient course? Let the House consider the case of the sheriff. He is not a person who has sought his office — not a person who is fined for his office. He is taken and compelled to serve, whether he will or not. He often makes great interest to be exempted. "No matter," says the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, "you take him and compel him to serve — you place him between two opposite forces — he receives commands and counter commands from both — he cannot obey both; and the moment he obeys one, he is sent to prison for not obeying the other." Is that a state of the law desirable to be continued? Is it a state of the law in which the great body of the people are likely to acquiesce? I admit that the House has no choice in the matter; it is compelled to imprison the sheriffs. I admit, also, that if the House had not imprisoned the sheriffs, the Court of Queen's Bench would have imprisoned them. But that fact, so far from being an argument against the course now proposed by my Noble Friend, appears to me to furnish a strong ground in support of it. If a nation is forced to go to war, it is oftentimes compelled to make the innocent suffer with the guilty. If, for instance, there were a small neutral power situated between two hostile and belligerent nations; however anxious that small power might be to preserve its neutrality, and to keep itself distinct from the quarrels of its neighbours, it would almost inevitably happen that one or other of the two great powers would find it necessary, for the protection of its own immediate interests, or for the better prosecution of its hostilities, to encroach on the independence of the smaller state, and to make it an instrument in the advancement of its own views. This was conspicuous during the last war in the case of Holland. We knew how little Holland liked Bonaparte — how it detested his continental system — how it hated his dominion; yet we were at last forced to blockade her ports, and to treat her with severity, because it was essential to the preservation of our own interests and our own independence, to do so. In the same way, Sir, do I defend the necessity which compelled the House of Commons to send the sheriffs to prison. But I maintain, at the same time, that this is a state of things which renders it absolutely necessary for the House to resort to some legislative enactment to prevent a recurrence of similar difficulties for the future. I do not understand what a Legislature exists for, if not to meet such cases as these. If there be two powers in the state, neither of which is in the nature of a court of appeal from the other; if these two powers give counter orders to the same officer, and have the power of imprisoning him if he disobey; if the officer, distracted between the two, obeys one and is immediately imprisoned by the other; — then, surely, if ever there was a case in the world for legislative interference, this is one. Nay, I will go further. The Solicitor General stated, last night, that the House has the power of commitment; and then he went on to contend that all experience has shown that that power is sufficient to enable it to vindicate its privileges. No doubt, Sir, it would be sufficient, if it were vested in the hands of a party ready to exercise it unsparingly and mercilessly. If the House were, in all cases, to do that, I certainly believe that it would have no difficulty in carrying its point. We all remember to have read how the ancestor of my Noble Friend the Member for Cornwall (Lord Eliot) was treated, — how he was kept in prison till his spirits, health, and strength gave way, — how his imprisonment was continued even to the hour of his death. But, in the present day, it is impossible for the House of Commons to pursue so harsh a course. Our own good nature would not allow us to do so. The feelings of the people would not permit us to do so. The very moment that the health or spirits of a prisoner begin to suffer, that moment the House begins to relent; and either upon the instant, or shortly afterwards, the prisoner is set at liberty. So that when the House possesses itself of a prisoner of a robust and hardy constitution, it may have the power of completely vindicating its privileges, by detaining him in prison till the question at issue is arranged; but it may happen to have a prisoner of a bilious and apopleptic habit; in that case its privileges must be abandoned, or only feebly asserted, because the health of the prisoner suffers from confinement. Even if the health of Mr. Stockdale himself should appear to be seriously affected by his imprisonment, it is certain that he would not long be detained in custody. Under these circumstances, it appears to me, that the House is absolutely compelled to seek some other mode of protecting and vindicating its privileges.

The Noble Lord has asked what will be the effect, if this Bill should be carried through the House of Commons and lost in the House of Lords? I, however, hope that the Bill will be carried through both branches of the Legislature. I hope — most earnestly hope — that the other House of Parliament will interfere to save the country from the scandals and the horrors that will necessarily follow, if it shall drive the House of Commons, in absolute self-defence, to use the whole of the extreme power which it possesses for the protection of its privileges. But if the Bill should, unhappily, miscarry in the House of Lords, then I say this, — that the House of Commons will be absolved. We shall have gone to the other House, not in a degrading or humiliating manner, and shall have said, "We do possess the power of vindicating our privileges, — we have the power, if we please, of throwing the whole of the country into confusion, — we can stop the supplies, — we can stop the Mutiny Act, — there is no power which any political body can possess which we do not possess, — we have the power of imprisoning every man who invades our privileges, — we can commit every judge in the country, not being a peer, if he do not respect our privileges, — we have the power of confining every ministerial officer who shall execute the sentence of any court, if that sentence be at variance with our privilege; — but it is not our wish, by means like these, to enforce even the most necessary of our privileges; we apply for a new remedy, not because we have not in our own power remedies that are sufficiently stringent and effective, but because those remedies are such, that some of them cannot be applied without the dissolution of society, and a cruel pressure upon individuals. We have remedies sufficiently severe, — we look to you, my Lords, to assist us in adopting one of a milder nature. We have remedies sufficiently powerful to enable us to attain our ends, but which, from their severity, would be disagreeable to the great body of the people; and we ask you, my Lords, to give us a remedy which the whole of the people, without exception, will unite in approving." I believe that, going before the House of Lords in this manner, we should occupy the post of no mean suitors. I believe that there will be nothing degrading, on the part of the House of Commons, in bringing forward a measure the object of which is to secure the liberties of the people, and, at the same time, to enable the House to act with greater lenity, in all its dealings with those who, from the misfortune of their situations, or from some other cause over which they have little or no control, may have been guilty of violating its privileges. I believe that, if the House of Lords refuse to give its assent to such a measure, the House of Commons would then be fairly supported by public opinion in the adoption of measures much stronger than any to which it has yet resorted. I believe that measures, stronger even than those suggested by the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, would find a support out of the House greater than is imagined by any who sit within it; if, having proposed a mild remedy for the protection of its privileges, the House should be told by the Lords, that to that mild remedy they would not give their assent.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON.—Sir

after the best consideration I have been able to give to this subject, I feel it my bounden duty to support the motion now before the House; and my object in rising is, to point out to those who hitherto have voted in the minority, how, consistently with every opinion they have expressed, and with every vote they have recorded, it is now equally their bounden duty to offer no obstruction; but, on the contrary, to give every facility to the motion of the Noble Lord. The question is not, whether the Noble Lord's Bill is a good one or a bad one, or whether it should be accompanied by any modification or rescinding of the order of sale: the real practical question for our consideration this night is this, — shall we have any Bill at all? That is the practical question; and to that question I can give only one answer, — a decided affirmative. But I will go even further, and state that I mean to meet the Bill of the Noble Lord in a spirit of frankness and conciliation, and with an earnest desire for the final adjustment of this much-debated question. I do not pledge myself to any of the details of the Bill, nor even to the principle of it; but I will consider it in a conciliatory spirit, and with a most unfeigned wish that it may be in my power to concur in it. My Noble Friend the Member for Northumberland is mistaken when he supposes that the opposition to the asserted privilege of the House arises out of a desire, on the part of many of the Gentlemen who sit on the Opposition benches, to lower and degrade the reformed Parliament in the estimation of the people. From whatever source my Noble Friend has derived that impression, he may rely upon it that it is wholly erroneous. We on this side of the House have accepted the Reform Bill, as the settlement of a great constitutional question, and upon the assurance of its promoters that it was to be a final measure; and we have pledged ourselves not to impair its efficiency. I can only say that, for my own part, I am willing to secure to the House, at the present moment, every one of the rights, privileges, and immunities which it possessed at the passing of the Reform Bill. Up to the passing of the resolution of sale, in 1825, there is not one of the privileges of the House, which, if necessary, I would not strengthen and confirm by legislative enactment. But to the resolution of sale I entertain an insuperable objection. The resolution as to the sale of our papers is, in my opinion, the great practical difficulty that has given rise to all these proceedings. In that opinion I have been supported by the Honourable and Learned Members for Exeter and Ripon, and by almost every lawyer in the House. But it is said that the practice of sale existed previous to the resolution. Why, then, pass that resolution?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — It was partial before.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — It was certainly partially the practice before; but the sale was allowed merely by connivance, and was never sanctioned by the law of Parliament or of this House. I put it, then, to the Noble Lord, whether he thinks he can maintain a resolution passed only five years ago, as one of the ancient privileges of Parliament? I cannot doubt that that resolution is the main obstacle to the satisfactory adjustment of this question. It is right that the House should have full information before it; but it is also right that it should protect the character of individuals from useless slander. I regard the privilege of publication to our constituents as essential to our duties. Take, for instance, the case of the question as to the disfranchisement of the borough of Stafford. Would it not have been unfair that any Honourable Member should have been exposed to the danger of losing his seat for his vote on that question, for want of the power of sending down to his constituents the Report of the Committee containing the facts and representations on which he gave his vote, and which, his constituents would be the first to see, justified his vote? But there is a vast distinction between the publication of the proceedings of Parliament to the constituents who return Members to Parliament, and the putting up of the printed Reports of its proceedings to public sale. I admit the necessity of the one, but I deny the propriety of the other. But might not a clause be introduced into the Bill, setting forth that any party who, before the House or its Committees, should give false information, should be liable to the same penalties as those guilty of perjury at present are in courts of law? I will not state this as an indispensable clause; but I throw it out as a suggestion to the Noble Lord. I much wish that the Noble Lord would either grant the appointment of the Committee which my Right Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Ripon is about to move for, or that he would direct the Committee already existing upon this question to turn their attention to its practical consideration. I have thrown out these views for the consideration of the Noble Lord; but as for my present vote, it will be in favour of giving leave to bring in the Bill.

Mr. BERNAL. — I cannot but think that any reference to the old topics of debate is, on this occasion, quite unnecessary; but the Noble Lord who has just sat down has compelled me to repeat what has been again and again stated to the House — that the judges have held, that the question of sale has nothing to do with the matter, and that it is altogether a question of privilege. The Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland has said, that the introduction of this Bill is fraught with evil. To me, however, it appears, that the whole question before the House is a mere choice of evils; but I cannot agree with the Noble Lord, that, in introducing the present measure, my Noble Friend the Member for Stroud has evinced the least desire to call upon the House of Commons to do any act that will either humiliate or degrade it. Much stress has been laid on the action which has been brought by Mr. Howard against the Sergeant-at-Arms; and it has been asked, what course will the House take in that case? I, for my own part, do not look upon that question as one of any magnitude, or in any degree calculated to sway the House in the decision to which it should come on the present occasion. The Court of Queen's Bench has acknowledged that the House of Commons possesses the right of committal. If, then, Mr. Howard shall proceed with his action against the Sergeant-at-Arms, on the ground of his commitment, by order of the House, the Court of Queen's Bench will, I have no doubt, scout any such action. It has been argued by the Noble Lord, that there is great reason to apprehend that the House of Lords will be adverse to the proposed measure. I, however, see no just ground for any such apprehension. The House of Lords are equally interested with ourselves in maintaining the privilege of publication; and I do not think it is reasonable to look prospectively to any supposed factious spirit or mischievous feeling on the part of the House of Lords, such as might induce them to oppose this Bill. I beg to ask those Honourable Members who have objected to the introduction of the Bill, but who, at the same time, arraign the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, in what way it is that they would propose to reverse that judgment? I did not hear my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General, in his argumentative speech of last night, state what it is he proposes to do with that judgment. If the Bill be introduced, in accordance with the spirit announced by my Noble Friend, it will not, in the smallest degree, strengthen the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. The Bill will leave that judgment precisely where it is; nor will the House, so far as I can see, in any degree compromise itself. All that the House does by the introduction of this Bill, is, to declare that it has been led, by a consciousness of what is due to itself and to the country at large, to propose a moderate measure, which may tend to mitigate the severity of those proceedings which the House has, in vindication of its privileges, been hitherto compelled to adopt.

Mr. CHARLES HOPE. — The Noble Lord opposite, the Member for Northumberland, has said, that the minority on these questions has been swelled by those who wish to lower the reformed House of Commons in the eyes of the world, by depriving it of its legitimate powers. I merely rise, Sir, to observe, that I cannot allow such an argument to go uncontradicted for a moment; and I never before heard any such reason advanced as the cause for the opposition to the Noble Lord and his supporters, upon this, or any other question.

Dr. LUSHINGTON. — It is my intention to vote for the introduction of this Bill; and in doing so, I do not believe I shall be guilty of any vacillation of conduct, or be abandoning any principle I have formerly avowed, or prove myself destitute of any of that courage which every man ought to possess, when the most valuable privileges of this House are questioned. I deny that, in adopting this course, I am party to any act of degradation, or, in any degree, departing from the line I have hitherto pursued. What is the question we have now to determine? The question is this — whether it is expedient or not, under all the existing circumstances of the case, to allow the introduction, for further discussion, of the measure of my Noble Friend? I admit this to be a question of momentous importance. According to the best of my knowledge and recollection, it is the very first instance in which the House of Commons, for the protection of its privileges, has been compelled to resort to any legislative measure. And, in this view of the case, I have given it my most mature consideration, feeling fully aware that I am about to establish a precedent, and well weighing what the consequences of that precedent may be. I think that when the question comes to be considered, in the way in which it ought to be, it will be necessary for us to divide it into two parts. We must consider what may be the probable consequences and effect of the measure, if it shall pass, and what may be its possible effects, in case it should be defeated. It will become our duty to address our attention to those two points, like senators and legislators, shutting not our eyes against any dangers that may arise if the Bill shall become a law; nor against those which are almost certain to arise, if it should be rejected. But I must confess, that I cannot consent to put the question upon the principle for which my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Exeter has contended. Without, however, entering into the legal argument with my Honourable and Learned Friend, on this occasion, I will content myself by simply stating, that the difference between my Honourable and Learned Friend and myself is this: — I contend, that the House of Commons is the judge of its own rights; my Honourable and Learned Friend has told us, that we had better go to the courts of law to ascertain what our privileges are. I, Sir, however, believe that the House of Commons already possesses the power to maintain its privileges; but I, at the same time, agree, that to exercise that power to its full extent, so as to render it efficient, would be to produce inconveniences, and force on consequences which I, for one, shudder to think of. But, before I accede to the argument of my Honourable and Learned Friend, it must first be proved to me that it is utterly impossible to maintain the privileges of the House of Commons without the direct authority of the Court of Queen's Bench. Let this be proved to me, and then I will say that, melancholy as the condition may be, still it would be my duty to go to the courts of law. But it is equally my duty, and the duty of the House, if it be possible, to find some means by which we may at one and the same time maintain our privileges, and avoid consequences which every sober-minded man must deprecate. Suppose the Bill should fail,—I put this question to the judgment of every man, whether the Government would not go back to the country with every possible advantage? Would not the public say to them, — "You have endeavoured to avoid the deep necessity of the measure which you have been adopting. You have yielded to the opinion of those who thought you had gone too far; you have sought, by a legislative measure, as far as possible to maintain the privileges that are essential to the efficient discharge of your functions; but you have been defeated; and the question you have now put to us — to the country — is this: — 'Shall we, the Government, consent to shut out all information from the people, or shall we maintain our right of publication by a measure universally to be deprecated, if not one of absolute necessity; but if of absolute necessity, for the maintenance of a countervailing good, shall we maintain our right and our privilege by such a measure?'" It is my decided opinion, that if the Government were to go to the people upon that question, the people would go with them.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I am sorry, Sir, to have again to address the House upon this question; but there are two or three arguments which have been used against the principle I have adopted, — and arguments which some persons may consider of great apparent force, — which I do not like to pass over without, at least, attempting to give some answer to them. The first is the argument which has been put by my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General, and which seems to have made a great impression on the House. It was this: — that, by introducing this Bill, and even by its passing, in the shape in which it is introduced, through both Houses of Parliament, we should be, in fact, confirming that judgment which has been so often called in question, and which all the more eminent members of the legal profession in this House, as well as other Members, the best acquainted with the privileges and proceedings of the House, have been almost unanimous in their opposition to. Now, I do not think that that is, by any means, a well-founded objection. It has not been, and cannot be, stated by those opposed to the Bill, that if it were to pass, the judgment of the court would be thereby annulled, or, in fact, reversed; although some other plan for effecting that object might have been adopted. My Honourable and Learned Friend himself admitted that a Bill intended to reverse the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench would not be likely to pass through Parliament; and I therefore think that it would be most imprudent to introduce any such Bill. If, then, no such Bill can be introduced, it is rather too much to urge as an objection to this particular Bill that it will not have the effect of reversing such judgment. But the argument rests merely upon an inference. There is nothing in the Bill itself that goes to for my present vote, it will be in favour of giving leave to bring in the Bill.

Mr. BERNAL. — I cannot but think that any reference to the old topics of debate is, on this occasion, quite unnecessary; but the Noble Lord who has just sat down has compelled me to repeat what has been again and again stated to the House — that the judges have held, that the question of sale has nothing to do with the matter, and that it is altogether a question of privilege. It is my decided opinion, that if the Government were to go to the people upon that question, the people would go with them.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I am sorry, Sir, to have again to address the House upon this question; but there are two or three arguments which have been used against the principle I have adopted, — and arguments which some persons may consider of great apparent force, — which I do not like to pass over without, at least, attempting to give some answer to them. The first is the argument which has been put by my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General, and which seems to have made a great impression on the House. It was this: — that, by introducing this Bill, and even by its passing, in the shape in which it is introduced, through both Houses of Parliament, we should be, in fact, confirming that judgment which has been so often called in question, and which all the more eminent members of the legal profession in this House, as well as other Members, the best acquainted with the privileges and proceedings of the House, have been almost unanimous in their opposition to. Now, I do not think that that is, by any means, a well-founded objection. It has not been, and cannot be, stated by those opposed to the Bill, that if it were to pass, the judgment of the court would be thereby annulled, or, in fact, reversed; although some other plan for effecting that object might have been adopted. My Honourable and Learned Friend himself admitted that a Bill intended to reverse the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench would not be likely to pass through Parliament; and I therefore think that it would be most imprudent to introduce any such Bill. If, then, no such Bill can be introduced, it is rather too much to urge as an objection to this particular Bill that it will not have the effect of reversing such judgment. But the argument rests merely upon an inference. There is nothing in the Bill itself that goes to confirm the judgment. The preamble of the Bill states that it is necessary that the House of Commons shall have the power of directing the publication of its own papers and proceedings; and it is then enacted that those publications shall not be questioned in the courts of law. Therefore, neither in its practical effect, nor in its general averments, does it decide in favour of the judgment given by the Court of Queen's Bench; and it is a mere inference, that, because the judgment is left on record, and because, in legislating on this question, Parliament has not immediately interfered with it, therefore it is confirmed and made stronger than it otherwise would have been. I do not find that such an inferential opinion is, in any way, sanctioned by what has occurred in other cases of privilege. It might be supposed from the argument of my Honourable and Learned Friend, and also from the statement of my Noble Friend the Member for Northumberland, that these privileges have been maintained solely by the House of Commons, without requiring or obtaining assistance from the other House of Parliament; and that the power of commitment, which is vested in the House of Commons, is so vested by the unanimous consent of the courts of law. But is that the case? What has taken place with respect to the highest privilege which the House possesses, — namely, liberty of speech within the walls of Parliament? Sir John Eliot made a speech, which was perfectly justifiable, relating to the state of the country, and the arbitrary power exercised by the Crown. He was prosecuted and condemned to pay a fine of 2000*l*. This occurred at the time of the Long Parliament, which was followed by scenes of turbulence to which, of course, it is not necessary for me now to allude. But after the Restoration, it was thought necessary to take some proceedings with regard to that judgment; and resolutions condemnatory of it were passed by the two Houses of Parliament; and, afterwards, a writ of error was brought into the House of Lords, by which the judgment against Sir John Eliot was reversed. Now, can it be said that freedom of speech in the House of Commons has been in the least degree injured, weakened, or in any way impaired, by there having been a decision of the House of Lords in the reign of Charles II., against the previous judgment which had called in question that privilege? We now enjoy that privilege, not only under the judgment of the House of Lords, but by the Bill of Rights, and various other Acts of Parliament; and no Honourable Member can contend that we do not enjoy the liberty of speech as fully, as entirely, and as completely, in the shape of a privilege, as if the decision of the House of Lords had never been given, and as if no Act of Parliament existed on the subject.

I may mention another privilege, in illustration of this argument; that any act done by the Speaker, on the part of the House of Commons, shall not be called in question by any Member of this House. Now, if it were possible to weaken that privilege, I should imagine that it would have been seriously injured by the proceedings in the case of the King v. Williams. In that case, there was a judgment in the court of law, which took effect; and although a Bill was introduced to reverse that judgment, it ultimately failed. And is that judgment good? On the contrary, the judges who gave the decision in the case of Stockdale v. Hansard admitted that it was an illegal judgment. Lord Denman said, that even if this case had not been bad law, it would, still, be worthy of the severest censure. Mr. Justice Patteson said, "I agree that the case of 'The King v. Williams' is not to be relied on. The political character of it, the violence of the times, and the arbitrary power of the Crown, deprive it of authority as a solemn judgment of the court." Now, although there have been instances in which Parliament has interfered, — and although those attempts have not been successful, — yet the privilege has been maintained unimpaired. Am I not, then, justified in saying, that, though an Act of Parliament may give greater facility to the exercise of privilege in one case, and though it may fail to do so in another, still the privilege will remain on the same foundation as that on which it now stands; and yet the whole argument of my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General, and of my Noble Friend the Member for Northumberland, was founded on the assumption that, by introducing a Bill, — by consenting to legislate on the subject of privilege, — that privilege will be not only impaired, but destroyed. If that argument were correct, this consequence must follow, that liberty of speech in this House, and the powers of the Speaker, as its official organ, would be impaired, if not destroyed; because we have assented, on both these questions of privilege, to the decisions of the House of Lords, and because we have asked the House of Lords to assist us in particular cases, which have required the intervention of the Legislature. Those two great privileges are solemnly declared the Bill of Rights, and have received the sanction of the Legislature; and I confess that I do not see how the privileges of this House will be now impaired by the proposal to introduce this Bill. I must, after what has fallen from my Noble Friend (Lord Howick), again state what is my paramount reason for legislating upon the subject. My Noble Friend has represented me as saying, "We have totally failed in asserting our privilege; our privilege is weak and valueless; we cannot maintain it, and therefore we must surrender it, and seek other assistance, in order to maintain this necessary power." I said no such thing — I made no such assertion. What I did say was, that we are engaged in a conflict of considerable difficulty; that I did not doubt, if pushed to the extreme, the powers of the House would be superior in the conflict,—and that is my belief;—but I added that the manner of exercising those powers was very imperfect, and might bring us into a conflict, which it is desirable to avoid. That I believe to be the general opinion of the House; because my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General has admitted that the House, by the course it is now taking, is travelling to a point which must bring the matter to a crisis; and the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin has said, to-night, that we must very soon come into direct collision with the judges.

Now, Sir, much as we have been taunted on the subject, I do not consider that the present is a question upon which the only quality to be exhibited is the quality of courage. I confess that, where evils can be avoided without incurring the loss of any of the essential powers of the House, I think a little prudence may be necessary. I trust, if it shall be absolutely necessary to enter into direct collision with the judges, that I shall not be wanting in firmness or courage to enter upon that course. But I must say, that, as to a courage for entering entirely, wantonly, and needlessly, and without an absolute and overwhelming necessity, into a conflict which must tend to lower the character and authority of our tribunals, and to divide the people of this country into hostile parties upon a very difficult question,—and which, in the end, may not only prevent us from obtaining those measures of legislation which may render us powerful upon that particular question, but which may sink us in the public estimation, and impair our other necessary legislative powers, perhaps, for a whole Session, or for a whole year; — as to a courage to act thus needlessly, wantonly, rashly, and imprudently, I own I have it not. I think, if the House is prepared to enter upon this question with temper and forbearance, there is now a good prospect of arriving at a settlement. My Noble Friend says, that if I was prepared to propose the present course, I ought to have entered upon it long ago; but my Noble Friend must allow me to form my own judgment of the time when the attempt could be made with success. I was of opinion, at the commencement of the Session (and I did not disguise my opinion) that, if we then sent up a Bill to the other House, it would be likely to be received with the remark, that the House of Commons might maintain its own privileges; that no great public difficulty had yet arisen; that the House of Lords were always ready to maintain their own privileges; and that there was no necessity for any legislation. Now, what has happened since? In the first place, we have shown the power of the House to maintain its privileges by the commitment of the first movers in the transaction, and, also, by the imprisonment of the sheriffs; and this has led to great public inconvenience, of which the House of Lords cannot be ignorant. And what has taken place besides? There have been many discussions in this House which, to the whole country and to the House of Lords, must have conveyed a great deal of information as to the law of the case. I believe that the opinions of many Honourable Members of no inconsiderable legal character, and of great general attainments, have undergone a very great change with respect to the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, during the progress of this question; and that that change has been effected by the discussions which have been had, here. If these discussions have produced this advantage — if the opinions of the leading members of the successive Cabinets of the Duke of Wellington, of the Right Honourable Gentleman (Sir R. Peel), of Earl Grey, and of Lord Melbourne, are the same; if they all agree that this is a necessary power; and if the law officers of the Crown, who served under all those Governments, and other gentlemen of the highest legal reputation, entertain the same view; — if, after those opinions have been ascertained, and supported by arguments the most convincing, and by research the most elaborate, there should be a pause in the proceedings of the courts of law, I think that that may be a fitting time to attempt legislation; and that the minds of men will be more likely to take a just view of the case, than if, at the commencement of the Session, I had proposed to proceed, not by way of commitment, but by the introduction of a Bill. The Noble Lord the Member for Hertford has referred to the resolution for the sale of the papers. I do not wish to allude to that part of the subject, now, because it is totally beside the question whether or not we can legally publish our proceedings. That is a question entirely within the discretion of the House. I do not deny that it may be convenient to review all the orders which have been made by the House for the regulation of its publications. In 1817, the forms of the House were entirely changed; many alterations have since been made, as matters of expediency for the moment, and, ultimately, the sale was authorised. So, also, the various checks, intended to prevent publications that can be wantonly injurious to individuals, have been altered from time to time; and I shall not oppose any investigation on the subject. But that has nothing to do with the question under discussion. I am not aware that it is necessary to make any further remarks, except as to one part of the Bill. I have been asked whether it will give any remedy with respect to the action which has been brought against the officers of the House who have been concerned in the proceedings connected with the case of "Stockdale v. Hansard." I intend to insert a clause for the purpose of putting a stop to those actions.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — And to the action brought by Mr. Howard?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Yes. I trust that the House will now allow me to introduce the Bill — that it will not decide at once that no legislation shall take place on the matter, without, at least, seeing the Bill I mean to propose.

The House divided: — Ayes 203, Noes 54; Majority 149.

UPPLY—MR. SHERIFF EVANS.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—Sir, I ove "That the Order of the Day for he Committee of Supply be now read."

Question put.

SIR J. GRAHAM.—I rise, in pursunce of the notice which I gave last night, o move an amendment on this order. fter the protracted discussion in which his House has been so very recently engaged, it would be inexcusable in me to reface my amendment by any lengthened bservations. I cannot, however, avoid congratulating the House on the circumstance of its having at length made some advance towards a satisfactory settlement of this question. I was in hopes, and, indeed, I expected, that a resolution, similar in substance to that with which I am about to conclude, would have been moved by the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland, who, on a former occasion, expressed his strong sense of the great inconvenience which must ensue from the protracted imprisonment of Mr. Sheriff Evans. I understood the Noble Lord to say that, though the House had been driven to the necessity of vindicating its privileges in the present instance, still he was afraid that if its power should be pushed to extremity, public opinion might thereby be outraged, and the privilege itself put into considerable danger. The Noble Lord has said, to-night, that if the present Bill should pass, the sheriff will be considered as a very ill-used man. In this opinion I do not concur; but, if it be entertained by the Noble Lord, I think it strange that the present motion has not originated with him. In the course of the discussion last night on the subject of punishment, a principle was laid down, in which I fully agree, that if punishment be carried beyond a certain point, the public sympathies will be enlisted on the side of the offender, and the repugnance to the offence lost sight of in those sympathies. I hope the House will bear this principle in mind in considering the question which I am about to bring before it. The Right Honourable Gentleman the Secretary at War says that the conduct of the sheriffs is free from the imputation of moral guilt; and that even if the health of Stockdale himself should suffer, in consequence of close imprisonment, his confinement ought not to be protracted. In both these opinions I fully concur; but especially in that which exempts the sheriffs from moral guilt in the course of the proceedings which led to their imprisonment. The House must bear in mind the peculiar and difficult circumstances in which they were placed; and even the present Bill, upon the introduction of which so large a majority has just decided, is an admission that the present struggle on the question of privilege is a conflict between two co-ordinate jurisdictions; and this having been so, it was impossible, when their decisions were at variance, for any human being to yield obedience to both. The sheriffs were placed in a choice of difficulties; and, in deciding conscientiously what was their duty, their judgment led them to the conclusion that they were bound to obey the directions given by the highest legal authorities; and it was not at all unnatural that, in making the selection, they should lean to the side of the Court of Queen's Bench, whose officers they were; but, in doing this, they have unhappily incurred the displeasure of the House of Commons, and been guilty of a breach of its privileges. Up to this moment, I have always voted for the maintenance of the privilege which is now in question, and against every attempt to liberate the sheriff; but, having heard the evidence of two medical men as to the imminent danger which is likely to result to the sheriff from a continuance of close confinement, and taking into consideration the length of time that that confinement has already lasted, together with the other circumstances of the case, I have now come to the conclusion that some enlargement should take place. I will not make any lengthened reference to the evidence of the medical men; but I think the testimony given by Mr. Freeman is such as to call for the most serious consideration of the House. It appears that he has attended Sheriff Evans, as his medical adviser, for seven years, during the last two years of which the sheriff has laboured under a chronic malady. It further appears, that that malady has seriously increased since the sheriff's committal; and Mr. Freeman attributes that increase to his confinement, and says that he would not incur the responsibility of recommending the continuance of his close confinement. It may, perhaps, be urged, that this witness, in consequence of his long attendance on Mr. Sheriff Evans, may be prejudiced in that gentleman's favour; but such an objection cannot be made to the testimony of Dr. Chambers, which was strictly confirmatory of that given by Mr. Freeman.

Then there is another question, — as to how far the conduct of the sheriff has been tainted with moral guilt? Can any moral guilt be said to attach to the conduct of one who has thus exercised his judgment, in accordance with the dictates of his conscience? Surely, if even he were in the enjoyment of perfect health, there must be some sympathy with such a man. But that is not the case. I am satisfied that every Member of this House would regret, to the latest hour of his life, any fatal catastrophe that might result from the continuance of the confinement of the sheriff; and it must be in the recollection of Honourable Gentlemen that the evidence implies not only corporeal, but great mental suffering; and, in the opinion of Dr. Chambers, the only security for the health of the sheriff is to be found in perfect freedom. When I gave notice for a motion for the enlargement of the sheriff, I thought it my duty to look for precedents likely to authorise the course which I meant to propose. I am unwilling to detain the House with quotations; but there are four distinct cases in the reign of George II., in which bail for appearance was taken by the House. The first case occurred on the 15th February, 1731, when a question arose with regard to a charitable corporation, which was referred to a Committee of the House of Commons; and before that Committee grave allegations were produced against the persons forming the corporation, on account of certain frauds of which they had been guilty, in detaining the property of the poor persons interested in the charity. Among the individuals to be examined on that occasion, was a person named Avery. On the 18th of February, he was committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. On the 24th he was allowed to go at large upon bail, and on the 28th the recognisances were completed. But, it may be said, that this was the case of a witness seeking to escape; and that the precedent is not available for my present purpose. But, arising out of the same transaction, there is a case somewhat stronger: — Sir A. Grant, a Member of the House of Commons, was required to explain his conduct in reference to the transaction. His explanation was not satisfactory, and on the 6th of April, 1732, he was committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. On the following day he was discharged upon bail, which was satisfactory to the Speaker. It may be said that Sir A. Grant was a Member of this House and that, therefore, the House may be supposed to have exercised a jurisdiction of a particular character in his case. The third instance occurred in the year [illegible], in the case of the York Buildings Company; when a person was committed for attempting to withdraw himself from examination, and discharged on entering into a recognisance to attend when required. I have one more precedent which appears to me to be exactly in point, because it is a case of complete judgment and execution. I allude to the case of the Honourable Alexander Murray, which arose out of the Westminster election, on the 20th of January, [illegible]. In the course of that election, a series of disturbances took place, by which the high bailiff of Westminster was prevented from making his return, and for not making which he was called to the bar of the House. He there accused Mr. Murray of ill-treating him, and molesting him in the execution of his duty; and, on the [illegible] of January, an order was made for the attendance of Mr. Murray on the 1st of February. On that day he was ordered into custody; but on the 4th he was permitted to go at large, on bail. He continued at large until the 6th, when he was brought to the bar, in consequence of an aggravated contempt, and committed to Newgate. I think it unnecessary to trace precedents any further. I have shown four distinct cases, in the reign of George II., where such a step as I now propose was taken by the House, the question of the validity of the bail being left to the Speaker. To the best of my judgment, these precedents, though not absolutely ruling the point, are strong enough, and of sufficient authority, to afford the House safe ground for proceeding in the manner which I now point out. If, however, the House should be of opinion that any other course is preferable, I shall gladly accede to it. I can conceive the necessity of insuring the attendance of Mr. Sheriff Evans, again, in the course of this Session; and if he were released on promising to appear again, even without bail, I should be satisfied; but, at the same time, I think the best course to pursue is that which I have now proposed, and I therefore beg to move, as an amendment, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the question, in order to add the words "on consideration of the evidence of Mr. Freeman and Dr. Chambers, given at the bar of this House, with respect to the present state of the health of Mr. Sheriff Evans, who is in custody, the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House do take such bail of Mr. Sheriff Evans as shall be approved of by Mr. Speaker, for the attendance of Mr. Sheriff Evans on the House of Commons, during the present Session of Parliament, whenever he shall be thereunto required by any order of this House, notice in writing of such order being left at the dwelling-house of Mr. Sheriff Evans; and that Mr. Sheriff Evans, upon giving such bail, be discharged out of the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House," instead thereof.

Mr. P. HOWARD. — I have great pleasure in seconding the amendment proposed by the Right Honourable Baronet opposite, which, I trust, will receive the favourable consideration of the House. The arguments brought forward by the Right Honourable Baronet are certainly entitled to great weight; and I think, in justice and equity, we ought to accede to the proposition, particularly after the discharge of Mr. Sheriff Wheelton on the ground of indisposition. The country desires this House to maintain its privileges, but not to debase the courts of law; and I hope that its proceedings will not bear the appearance of persecution.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question."

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—Sir, as the Right Honourable Baronet, in the course of his observations, has referred to a suggestion which I offered on a former evening, I beg, in a few words, to explain the great and obvious distinction which exists between that suggestion and the motion which has just been made by the Right Honourable Baronet. I proposed that the sheriff should not be relieved from the duress of remaining in custody. I wished to mitigate that custody as far as possible, consistently with its object; and, considering the station of Mr. Sheriff Evans, I thought the mere fact of his being confined to one residence, and detained from his usual avocations, would be likely to induce him to put an end to the contempt of which he has been guilty. I certainly never should have made the suggestion to which the Right Honourable Baronet has referred, if I had previously heard the evidence of Dr. Chambers; for that testimony cut away all the ground on which it could have been supported. But the Right Honourable Baronet does something entirely different. He proposes to relieve a man, who still remains in flagrant contempt of the privileges of this House, from all duress at all. He wishes merely to take bail for his appearance. Why, what better shall we be for any such security? There is not the remotest prospect that we should ever be at a loss to procure his attendance. Bail is only wanted when the attendance of a person is required, of whose future appearance some doubt is entertained; but, in the case of Mr. Evans, it would be perfectly idle to require it. If, therefore, we are to relieve him at all, it would be better to do so without requiring any security. If you mean to discharge him, do so at once, boldly, and upon general grounds; but let it not be upon any such ground as that of his ill health. After the evidence which has been given, if we were to adopt that course, we should establish a precedent fatal to our privileges, and fatal to the general system of the judicature of the country. Even the observations which passed the other night have had their effect. Those Honourable Members who were in the House at an early period of the evening are aware that the Honourable Member for Finsbury presented a petition from a friend of Vincent, who is at this moment suffering an imprisonment for sedition, in pursuance of his sentence, in Monmouth gaol, calling on this House, if the principle of discharging prisoners on the ground of ill health is to prevail, to suffer that person to be set at liberty. I think, therefore, that it would be extremely improper, and lead to very bad results, to lay down a principle applicable only to persons in a high rank of life, but which shall have no reference to those of inferior station. If we relieve Mr. Sheriff Evans on account of ill health alone, very few prisoners will remain in custody in any of Her Majesty's gaols, if any degree of consistency is to be maintained. I think that the motion of the Right Honourable Baronet is totally inadmissible; but I am bound to say that, after the decision to which the House has come, I shall not consider it of very great importance whether we determined that the sheriff shall be discharged on bail, or unconditionally.

[Cries of "Move!" from the Opposition benches.]

Undoubtedly I shall not move for the discharge of the sheriff; and even if such a motion be made by any other Honourable Member, I shall vote against it; but, at the same time, I shall take far less interest in this question, and attach far less importance to it, than I have before done, after the shrinking which I have observed from the course which ought to be pursued in the maintenance of our privileges.

Mr. KEMBLE. — I trust that, as this question is likely to arrive at an amicable conclusion, the House will at once come to a decision to discharge the sheriff; and I should certainly prefer that course to the one proposed by the Right Honourable Baronet. The Noble Viscount opposite has been pleased to say that he will not move for the discharge of the sheriff, and that he will oppose any motion to that effect; and I was much surprised to hear him express that sentiment, because I heard the Noble Viscount say, in an early part of the evening, that if the House were to consent to the introduction of the Bill of the Noble Lord, it would be an admission of having committed an act of injustice to the sheriff; and, for a practised debater, like the Noble Lord, I am at a loss to conceive on what principle, having expressed such an opinion, he should now refuse to repair that injustice, by concurring in a motion for the liberation of the sheriff. It certainly may be too much to call on the Noble Lord to make such a motion; but for the sake of his own consistency, if the Right Honourable Baronet moves the discharge of the sheriff, I hope to have the happiness of going out in a large majority with the Noble Lord. It has been said by the Noble Lord, that some Honourable Members on this side of the House have endeavoured to bring the reformed House of Commons into contempt. For my own part, I utterly repudiate such an assertion. Whatever may be my opinion of reform, and of the majority in the House, I never will consent to any measure which shall reflect upon the character of the House. I have, throughout these proceedings, been convinced that we should be compelled to retreat; I am satisfied that it is not the minority, but the majority, who have driven the House into a course calculated to wound its reputation; and if anything were wanting to convince me of this, the speech of the Solicitor General would be quite sufficient for that purpose. But there is another ground on which I think you cannot consent to detain Mr. Sheriff Evans. The Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) has acknowledged that there is a clause in his Bill to make it retrospective. Now, I ask, with what justice you can bring forward this Bill, and ask the House of Lords to sanction it, if you do not manifest your desire to do what is right, by immediately releasing the sheriff. In the case of the other sheriff, the evidence was as weak as it is in the present case; and is it just, as you have released the one sheriff, that you should visit the other with increased severity? With a view to the correct settlement of this question, I hope the House will not allow the night to pass without coming to an almost unanimous determination to release the sheriff.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — I wish to say a word in explanation. I never did say that the sheriff had been treated with injustice. What I stated was, that if such a Bill as my Noble Friend proposes is allowed to be brought in, the sheriff will have reason to complain that he has been ill-used, in consequence of that Bill not having been brought in sooner, and of the period necessary for his confinement being thereby abridged. I meant that, inasmuch as there will be no necessity for keeping the sheriff in confinement after the Bill shall have passed, there will be just ground of complaint, on the part of the sheriff, that it was not introduced at an earlier period.

Mr. KEMBLE. — Sir, I am not conscious of having misrepresented the Noble Lord; and what the Noble Lord has just stated only confirms me in the belief that I have not done so, even through mistake.

Mr. HAWES. — I hope that the House will come to a decision on some clear and distinct ground, and that the sheriff will be discharged, either because he has purged himself of the contempt of which he has been guilty, or because he has been punished sufficiently to satisfy the object the House has had in view; or, on the ground of the state of his health. I think that there can be no difference of opinion as to the first two of these points; and as to the last, no one who has heard the evidence of Dr. Chambers can for a moment doubt that a weaker ground upon which to discharge an individual in custody was never offered. I put it to Honourable Gentlemen, who are in the habit of acting as magistrates, whether any court of quarter sessions would ever think of recommending a diminution of punishment, in any case, on such a statement. The Honourable Member for East Surrey appears to be of opinion that there is no distinction between the evidence, in the case of Mr. Evans, and that in the case of the former sheriff. Now, in the case of Mr. Sheriff Wheelton, the evidence of the surgeon was, that he could not guarantee his life from hour to hour if he were further kept in confinement. On such evidence as that, the prerogative of the Crown would be extended to almost any prisoner in confinement for a misdemeanour. But the evidence given at the bar in the case of Mr. Sheriff Evans has undoubtedly failed. If we wish to discharge the sheriff, let us do so on some clear and honest ground, and not under the pretence now put forward. If we discharge the sheriff, there are other persons in confinement for offences not involving moral guilt, who will be entitled, on evidence as slight as this, to call on the Crown for their liberation. It would be much more manly to follow the course proposed by the Honourable Member for Surrey, and at once discharge the sheriff, than to pursue the course proposed by the Right Honourable Baronet. Is the House about to stultify itself? Has the sheriff committed no offence? On the contrary, has not the House determined, vote after vote, that he has been guilty of a breach of privilege? And, if so, why should we, without any reason being assigned, change our course of proceeding? I call upon the Right Honourable Baronet to show anything in the evidence which can justify us in discharging the sheriff on account of the state of his health. I ask Honourable Gentlemen whether they, themselves, rely on the evidence which has been given? If they do, I implore them to turn their attention to the medical evidence given relative to Mr. Lovatt, and to support me in an Address for his discharge. I cannot see why the sheriff should have more sympathy shown to him than one of the working classes would receive, if placed in a similar situation. I should be sorry to say one word that would tend to prolong the confinement of the sheriff; but I feel bound to state that I have heard nothing which can justify the House in liberating him.

SIR THOMAS COCHRANE. — It appears to me, that, within the last few days, the circumstances with respect to Mr. Sheriff Evans have assumed a very different aspect; for a medical gentleman who would not condescend to the degradation of a falsehood, has come forward, unknown to that gentleman, and stated his health to be in a state such as to render his release necessary. We were told, the other night, that, in the consideration of this question, we were not to take into account the nature of the offence, but simply the statement of the medical man: but I cannot concur in that opinion. I cannot but consider that the punishment suffered by Mr. Sheriff Evans has been, already, quite sufficient. It is universally allowed, that he was an unwilling offender against your orders. Instead of taking the course which he might have done, of paying the money into court, he waited until the commencement of the Session, in order to show respect to the House. I ask, will you mete the same punishment to him as to Mr. Stockdale, who has given to the public immoral publications, and vindictively entered prosecutions against your servants, with the wicked intention of involving you in a painful contest with the judges? I have no hesitation in saying that I would not release Mr. Stockdale on such evidence as that now before the House; but I consider the case of the two parties entirely different. The medical attendant of the sheriff has informed you that he is prone to disease, and that further detention will be seriously injurious to his health; and I ask the House whether, considering that he is an unwilling offender, it will risk the further protraction of his illness? With respect to the proposition of the Right Honourable Baronet, to discharge the sheriff on bail, I have no doubt that mode of proceeding would answer all purposes; but I think it would be much better to say to the sheriff, "You have, no doubt, disobeyed the order of the House; we can still punish you; but as you are not a willing offender, and as your health is suffering, we will at once discharge you."

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

Mr. WAKLEY. — It is not my intention to detain the House more than a few minutes, after the lengthened discussion which has already taken place. In my opinion, the amendment does not meet the necessity of the case; and I regret that the Right Honourable Baronet has not gone much further. After the decision to which you have come on the Bill of the Noble Lord, you will exhibit yourselves, in the face of the country, as one of the most paltry and contemptible bodies that ever existed, if you retain any one of the parties implicated in these proceedings an hour longer in confinement. By the vote of this night, you have affirmed the decision of the court of law, and justified the course which Mr. Stockdale, Mr. Howard, and the other parties have pursued. Why, therefore, I ask, should you detain the sheriff in custody? Does your Bill at all affect the contempt which the sheriff has committed? Does it alter his position? No. But your decision gives an entirely new character to the conduct of the sheriff; — it informs the country, that you now flinch from the course which you had previously taken, — that you are no longer prepared to vindicate the privileges of the House, but that you succumb to the courts of law, and are prepared to prostrate yourselves at the bar of the House of Lords. I hope that you will be consistent, and that some Honourable Member will give notice of a motion for the discharge of all the parties, and I certainly will vote for it.

[Cries of "Move, move!"]

I cannot do so, now, because there is one amendment before the House already; but, if no other Honourable Member will make a motion of that kind, I will take the first opportunity of doing so; because nothing can be more unjust or preposterous than to keep them longer in confinement; for you have virtually admitted that those parties are in the right, and that you are in the wrong. I perfectly agree with the opinions last evening so ably expressed by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, to whose arguments no satisfactory answer has been given; and I will venture to tell that Honourable and Learned Gentleman that the course which he has pursued, in reference to this important subject, will secure for him a proud pre-eminence in the eyes of the public. That Honourable and Learned Gentleman has, in his place in this House, notwithstanding his connection with the Government, manfully defended the course which the House at first pursued; and I do not hesitate to say, that it is through the vacillating weakness of the Government, and through the turbulent and factious conduct of some Honourable Gentlemen opposite, that the House is placed in its present predicament. As Conservatives, I always expected they were prepared to yield obedience to the laws of the country.

[Cries of "Oh!" "Hear, hear!" and laughter from the Opposition benches.]

What! does not the law of Parliament constitute any portion of the law of the country? and is the law of Parliament of less importance than any other part of the law, because all the privileges and rights of the people are involved in it? And yet, what was the conduct of Honourable Gentlemen opposite, when they were called upon, judicially, to decide whether these parties had violated the law? The question submitted for their decision, in their judicial capacity, was no party question, and had nothing to do with political differences of opinion. That question was ably and constitutionally discussed in this House, and was one of the most grave and serious importance; but what was the conduct of the minority of the judges, — for, on this question, they sat as judges? No sooner did they find themselves in a minority, than a portion of them invited the people to violate the law.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

You said, "This is tyrannical, — this is unjust, — this is persecution!" and you boastingly said there were hundreds and thousands prepared to follow the course pursued by Mr. Stockdale and Mr. Howard. One Honourable Member, who holds a judicial situation out of the House, when the sheriffs refused, at the bar, to comply with the resolutions of the House, jumped from his seat with the utmost animation, and, as a judge in this House, cheered most vociferously at their contumacy. Was that conduct becoming in a judge? Suppose, when the case of Frost was decided in the court of law, the six judges, who were in the minority, had said, "This is tyrannical, — it is unjust, — it is cruel, — we advise the Chartists to resist your decision, which is infamous," — what would your language have been? Would you not have blamed that conduct? And yet such has been the conduct of the minority of this House on this most important subject; and, by that conduct, you have invited opposition out of doors, — you have prostrated the dignity and authority of the House before the country, and submitted its privileges to the decision of the House of Lords. Seeing the contemptible position of the House, — seeing to what a low pitch of degradation we are reduced, — I ask, are you prepared to increase that degradation, to bring upon yourselves a greater degree of public indignation, by adding cruelty and persecution to your other proceedings? I trust the House will do no such thing. I trust the sheriff will be discharged, — and discharged unconditionally; and I trust that the other persons in custody will also be discharged. I voted for their confinement with regret; but I did so from an overpowering sense of duty; because I thought it necessary for the vindication of the rights and liberties of the people. But, seeing that you have abandoned your position, and departed from the exalted ground which you at first occupied, — and seeing, also, that you have acknowledged that the course which you have hitherto pursued is wrong, — it is the duty of the House to vote for the unconditional discharge of the sheriff; and I hope there will not even be a division, but that the sheriff, and all the other persons in custody, will, after the introduction of this Bill, be liberated as a matter of course.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — It is not my intention to follow the example of the Honourable Gentleman who has just addressed the House; but I am anxious to say a few words on the real question which has been brought under consideration. I hope that the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Finsbury, when sitting in his court in his judicial capacity, puts the cases which come before him to the juries with a little more accuracy than he has been able to do upon the present occasion.

The Honourable Gentleman says, that the House has admitted, by the Bill which has been proposed, that all its previous proceedings have been wrong, and that Mr. Stockdale has been right. Now, if that be the way in which the Honourable Gentleman places the evidence which he may have heard before uneducated juries, I much fear that those juries will often be misled. The real question on which the House has to decide is, whether the sheriff shall be discharged on the medical evidence which has been adduced at the bar. With respect to that evidence, I must confess that, had not this motion been brought forward, I should not have considered it sufficient to induce me to make a motion for the discharge of the sheriff. On a former occasion, I stated that the general ground on which the House ought to proceed was, that there was danger to life; and it was upon that ground that Mr. Sheriff Wheelton was discharged. With respect to the present case, the evidence is of a different kind; but I admit that it is such as to show that further confinement may seriously affect the health of the sheriff. The medical gentlemen have stated that there is, at present, no actual disease; but they have also said that confinement may produce disease of the most painful description. I feel the full difficulty, in questions of this kind, of deciding on the actual degree of illness of the individual; and I should be unwilling to pronounce an opinion upon the subject. I cannot, however, agree to the motion of the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, that the sheriff should be released on giving bail; because, by agreeing to that motion, a new question may be raised, as to the power of the House to take bail.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

It seems to me that the better course would be, if the House be disposed to allow a relaxation of the confinement of the sheriff, that he should be discharged, on the ground of illness, for a limited time, fixing a day — say three weeks hence — for his return to custody. If the House should think there is any instant danger from further confinement, I conceive that that would be a better course than the one recommended by the Right Honourable Baronet.

CAPTAIN POLHILL. — I perfectly concur in the recommendation of the Noble Lord, which is, in effect, the course I recommended, — that the sheriff should be liberated on parole. I think this preferable to placing the sheriff in the degrading situation of giving bail for his appearance.

Mr. GORING. — I trust the House will consent to liberate the sheriff. I am quite certain that he has not acted contemptuously towards the House, but that he has, as far as he possibly could do so, conformed to its wishes; and I have not the least doubt he would have yielded obedience to your authority, if you had indemnified him for so doing.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

Mr. HUME. — Before the House divides, I wish to put a question to the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth. The Right Honourable Baronet said, on a former evening, after having heard the evidence of Mr. Freeman, that it was not such as to justify the House in discharging the sheriff. I ask the Right Honourable Baronet whether the evidence of Dr. Chambers makes the case any better; for Dr. Chambers declared that there was no immediate danger from confinement? An Honourable Friend near me suggests, that two negatives make one affirmative; and, perhaps, on that ground, the sheriff may have some claim to be liberated. As the Noble Lord has deserted his post altogether, I now ask the Right Honourable Baronet whether he is prepared to follow up the course of proceeding originally taken by him with so much credit to himself, and so much advantage to the privileges which he so ably supported. The course now taken appears to me to be discreditable in the highest degree; and I hope, after what has this night taken place, that some Honourable Gentleman on the other side will move that Stockdale, Howard, and Pearce be, all of them, immediately discharged.

SIR R. PEEL. — I always make it a point to answer all the questions of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny; but I am sorry to say that I never get any proof of the Honourable Gentleman's confidence, until the Honourable Gentleman is in difficulty. In my opinion, the House will do credit to itself in doing justice, and not permitting any differences of opinion which may prevail, as to the policy of bringing in a particular Bill, to prevent them from doing what is right in any individual case. I said, the other night, and with truth, that I was not prepared to vote for the absolute discharge of the sheriff on the evidence of Mr. Freeman; and I gave my vote accordingly. But, before the Bill was brought in, I voted for the discharge of Mr. Sheriff Wheelton, because I thought it a proper case. Honourable Gentlemen will remember that I was against the absolute discharge of Mr. Sheriff Evans. When the Noble Lord (Lord Howick), who has taken the strongest position in this question of privilege, said, "I think we should incur a deep responsibility by keeping Mr. Sheriff Evans in close confinement, under the circumstances which have been deposed to," what was my course? I rose, and observed that I had arrived at the same conclusion, and that I thought quite sufficient grounds had been made out to warrant a relaxation of his custody; and I was certainly surprised when I heard the Noble Lord state that he had altered that opinion, in consequence of the evidence of Dr. Chambers. The question now before the House is altogether a question of evidence. And the following are the answers which made an impression upon my mind, as to the propriety of not keeping the sheriff in close confinement. Mr. Freeman, a highly respectable man in his profession, gave the following evidence: —

Is he growing worse or better under your care? — He is growing worse under his confinement.

There is no immediate danger of him? — I cannot say that there is; but his life would be endangered if he were to remain longer under restraint.

That is, certainly, very strong evidence from a man of the highest respectability. But the evidence goes further.

Do you think, then, if Mr. Sheriff Evans were allowed to take air and exercise, and return to the House of Commons, it would have the same effect? — I think not, for his mind is suffering greatly, and that is acting on his body.

Now, if anything fatal should occur to Mr. Sheriff Evans, — if the seeds of permanent disorder should be sown in his constitution by keeping him in close confinement, — I do not think that the House will have adopted the proper means of vindicating its privileges; or that we, as individuals, shall have taken a course that will be at all satisfactory to our own minds. I now come to the first evidence of Dr. Chambers: —

Do you consider him in that state that his life would be endangered by further confinement? — I think his health would be much deteriorated by confinement; and I conceive that his further confinement might convert those defects which have so disordered the digestive organs into absolute diseases.

Upon hearing that evidence, and having voted against the absolute discharge, I at once stated that my opinion was the same as that of the Noble Lord; and that we should be incurring great responsibility by keeping this gentleman in custody. I admit that the second examination of Dr.

Chambers rather weakened this impression than strengthened it; but it contained this additional testimony: —

> Having ascertained to your satisfaction the state of the parts affected, do you think that close confinement is highly injurious to that predisposition to disease? — I do.

That evidence remains upon record, and, I think, makes out a clear case for a relaxation of the close custody. If a question were brought before this House, interfering with the prerogative of the Crown, I would assuredly not think of interfering; but here is a person in custody by the order of the House; and the House is, therefore, clearly responsible for the consequences which may ensue from its order. I certainly think that we cannot keep Mr. Sheriff Evans in close confinement, after the evidence which has been given by Dr. Chambers and by Mr. Freeman. The Noble Lord opposite (Lord J. Russell) has suggested a difficulty with regard to taking bail. Unquestionably, this difficulty may arise,—that, in case of default, we should be obliged to apply to a court of justice. It is very true, that there may be precedents for taking this course; but I should rather avoid it. As to the proposition of letting out the sheriff on his parole, that appertains more to a military than to a civil tribunal. The Noble Lord suggests that we may release him from custody, and order him to return at some subsequent period. I am disposed to think favourably of this suggestion. I totally deny the assertion, that our present course of proceeding is a submission to the courts, and an acknowledgment that all the parties have been right who have acted in opposition to the orders of the House. There has been no such submission; and there is no admission that we have been wrong in one tittle of the course which we have pursued. But, because there is a difference of opinion on this point, it is no reason why we should not do justice in an individual case. I am still prepared to vote against the absolute discharge of the sheriff; but I am ready to vote for the proposition of the Noble Lord, and to permit the sheriff's temporary discharge.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — With the permission of the House, I will withdraw my amendment, and yield to the suggestion of the Noble Lord, seeing the difficulty that may arise from requiring the sheriff to find bail.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original question again proposed.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — Sir, I beg to move, as an amendment, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "on consideration of the evidence of Mr. Freeman and Dr. Chambers, given at the bar of this House, with respect to the state of the health of Mr. Sheriff Evans, who is now in custody, he be discharged, for the present, out of the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms attending this House; and that he be directed to attend at the bar of this House on Monday, the 6th day of April next," instead thereof.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Sir, I rise to second the amendment.

Mr. HUME.—I think it would be much better to move, simply, that the sheriff be discharged. In my opinion, sickness is only brought forward as a pretence and excuse.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM. — I rise to order. I am not disposed to find fault with expressions used in the heat of debate, and least of all with those of the Honourable Member, who is not, at any time, disposed to measure the expressions which he makes use of. But, I conceive, it is grossly out of order for the Honourable Member to state, that the reason which I have assigned is merely a pretence.

Mr. HUME. — I am sure the Right Honourable Baronet proposes the motion in good faith; but I believe, and the public will believe, that the illness of the sheriff is a mere pretence for getting out of the position in which we are placed.

Mr. HAWES. — On a former evening, the Right Honourable Baronet expressed his opinion, that the medical evidence was not sufficient to discharge the sheriff; and yet the Right Honourable Baronet now brings forward the same evidence to justify the course which, at present, it is proposed to take! I think that the medical evidence is no justification at all for the discharge of the sheriff; and I do not believe that, upon such evidence, the Right Honourable Baronet, if he were a Minister of the Crown, would be prepared to exercise the prerogative of mercy. I do not impute to the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke any insincerity; I have no doubt that he wishes to discharge his duty; but I agree with the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, that the public will think the assertion of ill health a mere pretence to get rid of the difficulty. We are now about to discharge the sheriff, — not because he has purged himself of the contempt for which he was committed, but — because he is in a station of life that commands the sympathy of the House; which sympathy does not appear to be extended to other persons in custody, of more humble rank. Other parties are just in the same position; and I will venture to say, that evidence may be procured, quite as strong as any we have heard, with reference, not to what is, but to what may be, the effect of confinement on them. The confinement in which the sheriff is kept is not close; it is as mild a species of confinement as can be inflicted on any person imprisoned for a breach of the law. I consider Stockdale and the other persons incarcerated to be quite as much entitled to their liberty as the sheriff; and, if the Right Honourable Baronet opposite do not make a motion to release them, I will do so myself.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — The Honourable Gentleman has referred to my conduct, to prove that I have been inconsistent. When I addressed the House after the evidence given by Mr. Freeman, I perhaps might consider that it was not perfectly satisfactory, on account of that gentleman having been the regular medical attendant of the sheriff. But Dr. Chambers has confirmed the testimony then given; and I am quite convinced that we ought not to detain the sheriff, after the declaration, that freedom is indispensable for the preservation of his health.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — I think the suggestion of the Noble Lord scarcely less objectionable than the proposition of the Right Honourable Baronet. I cannot see how the evidence, which is considered insufficient to justify the unconditional discharge of the sheriff, can at the same time be sufficient to induce the House to set him at liberty for the present, requiring his attendance at a future time. The medical witnesses do not speak of any particular or acute disease, but of general ill health; which is certain to recur when he shall be again placed in confinement; and the same ground for his release must then necessarily exist. Doctor Chambers says that Mr. Sheriff Evans's constitution makes his custody peculiarly unwholesome for him. Can it be supposed that, in the short space of three weeks or a month, his constitution will have undergone a complete change, and that the confinement which now endangers his health will then produce no effect whatever upon it? I certainly did think that he ought to be placed under a milder custody; but I never meant to propose anything more than that he should continue in the custody of a messenger of the House, in some place out of London. I asked Doctor Chambers whether it would make any difference if Mr. Sheriff Evans was placed in the country; and he said that it would not, unless his mind was at ease. Now, I always thought the object of putting a man into custody, was to act upon his mind; and when I am told that he is not suffering from any bodily complaint, but from the irksomeness of his mind, I am not prepared to release him on that ground. If so, we must give up the whole punishment for contempt. I think the real effect of the proposition of the Noble Lord will be the entire discharge of the sheriff; and I would suggest, for the sake of consistency, the omission of that part of the motion which relates to the illness of the sheriff. I should like to get rid of the pretence of illness.

[Cries of "Move, move!"]

I do not intend to make any motion on the subject; and so little interest do I now feel on the subject, that I shall probably give no vote at all.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, to add the words "on the consideration of the evidence of Mr. Freeman and Doctor Chambers, given at the bar of this House, with respect to the state of the health of Mr. Sheriff Evans, who is now in custody, he be discharged, for the present, out of the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House; and that he be directed to attend at the bar of this House, on Monday, the 6th day of April next," instead thereof.

MR. HUME. — Sir, I beg to propose, as an amendment to the proposed amendment, to leave out the words "on consideration of the evidence of Mr. Freeman and Doctor Chambers, given at the bar of this House, with respect to the state of the health of."

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Sir, I second the amendment.

Question put, "That the words pro-sed to be left out stand part of the proposed amendment."

The House divided: — Ayes 129, Noes 7; Majority 82.

Question put, "That the proposed words be added."

Mr. ELLIOTT. — I must protest against the course which the House is now pursuing. It appears to me, that when the public read an account of these proceedings, they will think us a most inconsistent body of men. We have been told by the Noble Lord, that, in the event of the failure of the Bill, we shall be in no worse position than we are at present; but I think our difficulties will be increased before that Bill can receive the sanction of the House of Lords. We are now going to release Mr. Sheriff Evans, because his health may be endangered by longer confinement; and, to-morrow, probably, some person from Newgate will inform the House that Mr. Howard is suffering from a severe running at the nose; that the mucous membrane may be dangerously affected; that an inflammation in the chest may take place; and if the chest be affected, it is impossible to say that something may not ensue; and that he will not be answerable for the life of Mr. Howard if he be longer confined. It would be just as proper to release Mr. Howard on such a statement, as to release Mr. Sheriff Evans on the testimony of Mr. Freeman. We really are placing ourselves in a most lamentable position. I certainly voted for the Bill of the Noble Lord, and I wish to state my reason for so doing.

[Cries of "Question!"]

So long as we held together in one body, and continued our coercive measures, I was certain we should succeed; but, now that the House is split into sections, I consider that our only resource is the unhappy Bill of the Noble Lord.

[Cries of " Question!"]

By agreeing to the resolution of the Right Honourable Baronet, we shall establish a precedent, which will render it impossible for us ever to commit a man without being subjected to allegations on the part of the prisoner, or his medical man, that he has a sore throat, or a cold, or a pain in his toe, or something of that kind, justifying his discharge on the ground of ill health.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — Having been one of those who originally objected to the incarceration of the sheriffs, I cannot give my assent to the latter part of the motion; and I will therefore move, as an amendment to the proposed amendment, to leave out the words " and that he be directed to attend at the bar of this House on Monday, the 6th day of April next.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I second the amendment.

Question proposed, " That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed amendment."

Mr. KEMBLE. — I am ready to act upon the principle laid down by the Honourable Member opposite; but, fearing that I shall not succeed in obtaining the entire liberation of the sheriff, I willingly accept of a month's leave of absence.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I am as anxious as the Honourable Member for Finsbury can be, for the entire discharge of the sheriff; but, under the present circumstances, I wish him not to press his amendment. The Noble Lord has tendered a compromise; and, having assented to that, I do not feel that we are now at liberty to vote for any further extension. On another occasion, I shall be quite ready to support such a motion.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — I have not consented to any compromise. I voted against the sheriff being summoned to the bar of the House in the first instance; I have opposed his detention throughout; and I shall still continue to demand his permanent release from the custody of the House.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I shall certainly support the amendment of the Honourable Member for Finsbury. Having voted throughout against the confinement of the sheriff, I cannot consent to a conditional liberation, if I can obtain an absolute one. I trust the House will close its proceedings by the unconditional discharge of Mr. Sheriff Evans.

Mr. HORSMAN. — I cannot but regret the course which I have hitherto pursued, in voting for the imprisonment of the sheriffs; because, if the health of Mr. Sheriff Evans was likely to suffer from confinement, the objection applied equally well against his original incarceration. I feel it due to the sheriff to make this statement; and, in order to make him all the reparation in my power, I shall cordially vote for the amendment of the Honourable Member for Finsbury.

SIR R. PEEL. — I voted against the absolute discharge of the sheriff on the evidence of Mr. Freeman, and I am ready to repeat that course. But when the question arose, whether or not Dr. Chambers should be called in, I differed from the Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell), and advised the House to call him in. Dr. Chambers was then examined; and the Noble Lord, the chairman of the Committee of Privileges, in his official capacity, after having taken a strong and prominent part in favour of privilege, warned the House against retaining the sheriff in close custody, and made the proposition that the sheriff should be permitted, under the advice of his medical attendant, to select any place out of town, where he should reside, in custody of a messenger of the House. Would the Noble Lord have made that proposition, unless he had considered the life of the sheriff in danger? I do not concur in the opinion of the Noble Lord, that the second evidence so shook the first, as to have induced me to take a different course; and I do not think it would be wise to continue the sheriff in close confinement. I have endeavoured to give the House the best possible advice; and I have disregarded every private consideration to do so; and I think a wise friend would recommend the pursuit of the same course under all circumstances. Having pushed almost to the farthest extent the inherent privileges of the House, I am afraid of their breaking under me; and therefore, disregarding all taunts, I will still give that advice to the House, which I think best calculated to maintain inviolate the right of publication, which believe to be essential to the proper discharge of our functions.

Mr. PEMBERTON. — On the present occasion, I cannot vote for the unconditional discharge of the sheriff, on two grounds; first, because, if the amendment be carried, the original motion will be lost, and the sheriff will still remain in custody. In the second place, the motion for relaxing the custody is grounded on the state of the health of the sheriff; and it would be inconsistent with my view of good faith, for those who support it on that ground, to convert it into a motion of a different character. On another occasion, I shall vote with great pleasure for the discharge of all the prisoners; but, for the reasons which I have now stated, I cannot support the amendment of the Honourable Member for Finsbury.

LORD MAHON. — I trust the Honourable Member for Finsbury will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. — Having, throughout these proceedings, supported the privileges of the House, I am still disposed to follow the same course; and I would, if necessary, continue the imprisonment of the sheriff from month to month, and from year to year. Being determined, however, no longer to continue the farce which has been enacted on both sides of the House, I shall certainly vote for the amendment of the Honourable Member for Finsbury.

Mr. WARBURTON. — If the sheriff is to be liberated till the 6th of April, it will be, in effect, granting him a complete liberation. On the day appointed for his re-appearance, he will, no doubt, come down to the House at the head of a triumphal procession, accompanied by the Lord Mayor and corporation, and present himself at the bar, and then we shall discharge him, unconditionally. If it be intended to discharge him, it would be better to do so at once. Whether the date be left out or retained, I am resolved to vote against the main question.

LORD G. BENTINCK. — Of the different propositions before the House, I think that of the Honourable Member for Finsbury most deserving of adoption. By pursuing the other course, we shall be detaining the sheriff as a sort of hostage, for the passing of the Bill through the House of Lords. After the passing of that Bill, no one will pretend that the sheriff ought to be detained; and I think that he ought, now, to be unconditionally discharged.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — The question before the House is not exactly that which the Noble Lord imagines. It is, whether the words which relate to the appearance of the sheriff shall form part of the question to be put to the House. If these words be retained, I shall vote for the motion of the Right Honourable Baronet; but if they be left out, the motion will be for the unconditional discharge of the sheriff; to which I shall give my decided opposition.

SIR R. PEEL. — If the question for the unconditional discharge of the sheriff be proposed, I shall certainly vote against it, trusting that, on some early evening, such an arrangement for the relaxation of the custody will be made as the case may require.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — In submitting my amendment, I conceived that the motion for the discharge of the sheriff had been virtually carried. As I cannot at present obtain the complete discharge of the sheriff, I must consent to take the relaxation now proposed, and beg to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment to proposed amendment, by leave, withdrawn; Question, "That the proposed words be added," put, and agreed to. Main question, as amended, put. The House divided: — Ayes 118, Noes 31; Majority 87.

Ordered, That, on consideration of the evidence of Mr. Freeman and Dr. Chambers, given at the bar of this House, with respect to the state of the health of Mr. Sheriff Evans, who is now in custody, he be discharged, for the present, out of the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House; and that he be directed to attend at the bar of this House on Monday, the 6th day of April next.

RETURNS, &c.

Court of Session. — On the motion of Mr. Wallace, Return ordered —

To amend the Return ordered on the 6th day of February last, of the number of causes instituted in the outer house of the Court of Session, between the 1st day of November, 1839, and the 12th day of March, 1840, by extending the above time to the 21st day of this instant March; and that the Return, when so extended, be made forthwith.

Army. — On the motion of Mr. Hume, account ordered —

Of the several amounts paid, in each of the years 1838 and 1839, for half pay and retired allowances, civil and military; distinguishing the amount under separate heads and departments (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper No. 732. of 1838):

Return of the number of soldiers who have established their claims to marks of distinction, with good conduct pay, under his late Majesty's warrant, dated the 26th day of May, 1837; and of the number of soldiers who have established their claims to marks of distinction only, under the same warrant, without relinquishing their claims to additional pay for length of service, since the 17th day of May, 1838 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper No. 425. of 1838):

Return of the number of soldiers belonging to regiments and depôts in Great Britain and Ireland, who, since the 1st day of January, 1838, have suffered corporal punishment or imprisonment; and, whenever either corporal punishment or imprisonment has been inflicted on the same person more than once, specifying how often it has been inflicted (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper No. 425. of 1838):

Abstract of the number of men belonging to the Royal Marines, who, since the 3d day of July, 1838, have suffered imprisonment; showing the nature of the offences, in classes, for which such punishment has been awarded, and the number in each class; also the longest and the shortest period of confinement awarded as punishment, and the average period for each class of offences:

Abstract of the number of soldiers belonging to the Royal Artillery in Great Britain and Ireland, who, since the 3d day of July, 1838, have suffered imprisonment; showing the nature of the offences, in classes, for which such punishment has been awarded, and the number in each class; also, the longest and shortest period of confinement awarded as punishment, and the average periods for each class of offences in each year:

Similar Return as regards soldiers belonging to regiments, and depôts of regiments, in Great Britain and Ireland, for the same period (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper No. 584. of 1837-8):

Return of the number of appointments to first commissions, in the ranks of cornet, ensign, adjutant, and quartermaster, on death or other vacancies, without purchase, in each year since the 1st day of April, 1838; showing the number of gentlemen introduced into the army without purchase, and distinguishing the number of gentlemen cadets from the Royal Military College, the number restored from half pay to full pay, on such clear vacancies, and the number of non-commissioned officers promoted to such commissions (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper No. 424. 1838):

Return, showing the establishments and effectives of the British army, rank and file, at home and abroad, on the 1st day of January, 1839, and on the 1st day of January, 1840:

Return, showing the establishment of the British army, as fixed by the King's memorandum for service at home and on foreign stations, for each of the years 1838 and 1839; and, also, the effectives on each of those stations, by the latest Returns received, on the 25th day of January, in each of the years 1838 and 1839, and on the 1st day of January, 1840:

Return, showing the average force, in rank and file, establishment and effectives, at the several foreign stations, on the 1st day of January, 1838 and 1839:

Return, showing, in one table, the numbers of the descriptions of armed force in the United Kingdom on the 1st day of January, 1840, the regular army of all ranks (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper No. 424. of 1838).

CROWN LANDS IN CANADA.

The DUKE of ARGYLL. — May I ask the Noble Viscount opposite whether there has been received from the House of Assembly of Upper Canada any Address on the subject of the Crown and Clergy reserves in that province?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — There has been no such Address received.

UNION WORKHOUSES.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — My Lords, in answer to a question which, on a former evening, I put to the Noble Marquess opposite, I was informed that a Bill would shortly be introduced to remedy the evil which the petitioners, whose petitions on this subject I have presented, complain of; and I now wish to know whether such a measure is in a state of forwardness?

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I believe that a Bill for the exemption of union workhouses from the payment of rates and taxes was brought into the House of Commons on Friday evening.

CRIME IN IRELAND.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — I wish to know, from the Noble Marquess, whether the report is well founded, that a man named Lynam, who was recently convicted at the Dublin sessions of wilful murder, has been reprieved? Four individuals had previously been found guilty of the same murder, and suffered death; and it appears that the criminal who is said to have been reprieved was the most active party in the perpetration of the offence.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I have received no communication from my Noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on the subject.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — Perhaps the Noble Marquess will make inquiry into the matter.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — Certainly.

CHURCH BUILDING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On the motion of the Bishop of London, House in committee (according to order); several amendments made; and Bill to be printed, as amended.

NEWPORT CONVICTS.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — My Lords, I wish to call your Lordships' attention to a subject which, in my opinion, is of some importance. On Friday last, a Noble Baron (Lord Teynham) presented a petition to the House, to certain statements connected with which I now, with your Lordships' permission, must, in performance of my public duty, allude. The Noble Lord, on that occasion, stated, that the petition was signed by 1500 out of the 6000 inhabitants constituting the population of Newport; and that it prayed for a free pardon for Frost, Williams, and Jones. The Noble Lord further stated, that the parties by whom the petition was so signed were amongst the most respectable inhabitants of Newport; and that the first four signatures were those of four of the wealthiest persons in that town. I have received a communication on the subject, this morning, from the same part of the country; and, as the Noble Lord attached considerable importance to the petition (so much so, that he has declared his intention of calling on the House, at an early day, to comply with the prayer of that petition), I feel it incumbent on me to state to your Lordships the nature of the communication which I have received, for the purpose of showing the Noble Lord that he has been completely misinformed on several points. In the first place, the population of Newport is now 12,000 instead of 6000. The Noble Lord said that the petition was signed by 1500 persons; and, from the manner in which the statement was made, it might be inferred that those 1500 persons were adult males. That, however, is not the case; for I have good reason to believe that the majority of signatures are those of women and children. There are a considerable number of signatures of the same name, and obviously written by one party. With respect to the four persons whom the Noble Lord has described as amongst the wealthiest and most respectable inhabitants of Newport, the first is Thomas Thorpe, an uncle of the chief person convicted, and who was himself under confinement for a time, on suspicion of being connected with the lamentable occurrence. The next name is that of William Townshend, the father of a person who has been convicted of the same crime as Vincent. The third is a small tradesman in the town; and the last, who had been only two years in Newport at the time of signing, is now about leaving the place. The majority of the inhabitants of the town were not aware of such a petition being in existence. A former petition was signed by persons who did not feel the least doubt as to the crime of the parties, or the propriety of their conviction; but who entertained, as many of your Lordships may do, a conscientious objection to the fliction of the extreme penalty of death. but the second petition, which calls on your Lordships to interfere with the prerogative of mercy as exercised by the Crown, was signed in the manner I state, and by the parties to whom I have referred.

The DUKE of BEAUFORT. — My Lords, I can, to the fullest extent, testify to the accuracy of the statement made by the Noble Marquess.

LORD TEYNHAM. — My Lords, I beg to state that the petition to which the Noble Marquess has referred was presented to me by persons whom I had every reason to consider were respectable. I was informed by them that the number of inhabitants in the borough of Newport was not more than 6000. Under these circumstances, I thought the petition one well worthy your Lordships' attention.

HORSE-RACING ACT IN PART REPEAL BILL.

Order of the Day for the third reading, and the Lords summoned, read; Bill read a third time accordingly; amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

PAPERS, &c.

Account of the quantity and value of all articles of the growth or manufacture of the territories under the government of the East India Company, imported into the United Kingdom, in each year from 1828 to 1839, both inclusive; together with an account of the rate of duty levied upon the import of each article in each year. — Delivered (pursuant to order of the 20th of February last); to be printed, and referred to the Select Committee on the petition of the East India Company for relief.

Adjourned.

In continuation of the Return dated 24th August last, of all coffee imported into the United Kingdom from the Cape of Good Hope; specifying the total quantity which has been entered for home consumption, as well from the importations specified in the Return of the 24th day of August, as from the subsequent arrivals.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I rise to move that the Order of the Day for the third reading of the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill be now read.

Upon the question being put, —

Mr. W. MILES and another Honourable Member presented petitions against the Bill,—from Fowey; Wetherby; Norton Fitzwarren; Wootton Wawen, &c.; Dymchurch; and Hartland. — Ordered to lie on the table.

The Order of the Day was then read.

Upon the question, "That the Bill be read the third time," —

Mr. HUME said: — I wish to ask the Noble Lord whether it is intended, by that clause of the Bill which appoints a pilot for the port of Galway, to give power to the Lord Lieutenant, if at any future time an alteration of the present arrangement should be found necessary, to remove that officer, and to appoint another in his place?

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — The clause provides for future regulation; but it may, perhaps, be necessary to introduce words to make it more stringent.

SIR G. SINCLAIR. — Having rarely taken part, during the last two Sessions, in any of the various debates respecting Ireland, I intend, on this occasion, to make some remarks upon the affairs and interests of that country, — a country which, during so many centuries, has been groaning under the accumulated evils of misgovernment; or, in other words, has unhappily been cleaving to the ignominious thraldom of Papal domination; and which can never be permanently peaceful or prosperous without a repeal of the union — not between Great Britain and Ireland, but — between Ireland and the see of Rome. I approach this task with unaffected reluctance, because I am afraid that some of the statements which I shall submit, and some of the principles which I shall avow, may not be assented to by many valued Friends around me, with whom I at all times deem it an honour to act, and account it a happiness to agree; but I cannot, in the discharge of a public duty, allow myself to be so swayed by personal sentiments of deference and regard as to disguise the feelings of my heart, and belie the convictions of my understanding. I am impelled to address the House on this subject by a deep and increasing persuasion — a persuasion not a little fortified by the menacing tone assumed, and the ominous prophecies uttered, in quarters of high authority — that the Protestant institutions of Ireland, with which those of the empire stand indissolubly linked, are in fearful and imminent jeopardy. I believe that the very force intended to maintain tranquillity is so organised as to increase the danger. On the part of the Roman Catholics we behold combination, energy, and success; whilst we too often find, in the ranks of the Protestants, dissension, supineness, and discomfiture. Each victory achieved by the former is an encouraging precursor of some new aggression; whilst every defeat sustained by the latter is the humiliating prelude to some fresh surrender. The potent screw of the "six millions" argument is as effectually wielded by the Roman Catholics as was that of the "six Members" argument by an imperious boroughmonger, for the purpose of extorting an unreasonable boon from the hard-pressed Prime Minister of a former era, whom he knew that he had at his mercy; so that the Roman Catholics are almost justified, by the result of every past experiment, in openly declaring to the Imperial Legislature, "Because we are six millions, we must obtain whatever we ask, demolish whatever we dislike, and accomplish whatever we desire." It must, I think, be admitted, that the Irish Tithe Bill, clogged as it is with so enormous a deduction from the incomes of the clergy, was wrung from their fears, and not conceded by their good-will. That deduction was rendered necessary by the culpable pusillanimity of successive Governments, who ought to have enforced (as they would have done in the case of taxes, rents, or debts) the might and majesty of the law. But, though reluctantly assented to by the clergy, and on that ground, alone, not opposed by myself, it was, in principle, an act of sacrilegious injustice. The Government have been generous with other people's money; and I am convinced that, through sacrifices which cost them nothing, they have only purchased a hollow and precarious truce, by which the Protestants of Ireland have been discouraged in the defence of their not yet extinguished rights, and not yet confiscated property, while the Papists are stimulated to renew every menace, and persevere in every machination. No permanent advantage was ever secured by worshipping the goddess Expediency; and a system of concession and compromise is seldom successful in the long run. In compliance with the wish, and in conformity with the example, of my Right Honourable Friend, I have abstained, on several occasions, from calling for a division when this Bill was formerly before the House. My unfeigned respect for his superior judgment prompted me to wish that he should have the fullest latitude for trying his conciliatory experiment, — of which, however, I not only doubt the success, but cannot altogether admit the wisdom. My own hostility to this measure remains unmitigated and unchanged. Though the salutary amendments introduced by the House of Lords would have eliminated much that is noxious, and much that is objectionable, from the provisions of this Bill; yet the reasonings so powerfully urged against its principle, by my Protestant Irish Friends, have made so strong and indelible an impression upon my mind, as to convince me that, by passing such an Act in any form, we shall furnish — not peace, but a sword; and thus not confer a boon, but inflict a calamity, upon Ireland. This Bill, even when modified, cannot fail to be received with jealousy and apprehension by a large proportion of the Protestant clergy and laity, the best and surest friends of British connection; and, at the same time, be viewed with perfect indifference by nineteen twentieths of the Roman Catholic millions, for whose satisfaction it is said to be intended. I shall never cease to think that Parliament would have exercised a more sound discretion by abolishing these corporations altogether; they would thus have placed all parties on a footing of perfect equality, and prevented those scenes of almost Guelph and Ghibelline discord and ferocity, to which the struggles for municipal ascendancy would give birth in many towns and cities throughout Ireland.

The Honourable Member for Dublin possesses a kind of magical kaleidoscope, through the medium of which he represents the state of Ireland, under the most opposite aspects, according as it suits his convenience. At one time, it is a paradise of quiet; at another, a pandemonium of disturbance. For my own part, I fully concur in viewing that country as a volcano; and I believe that the embryo corporations will serve as so many craters to inundate the whole district in their respective neighbourhoods, with the lava of sedition and discontent. Abolition was all that the Roman Catholics themselves asked, at no very distant period. But I have seen, with sorrow and surprise, that their pretensions have always risen in the ratio of their power; — it is even openly and ostentatiously affirmed, that they cajole us when they are weak, and coerce us when they are strong; and now they are intent upon effecting, not a mere annihilation of Protestant influence, but a palpable transfer of supremacy. There are only two classes of politicians who will derive any benefit from the new-fangled corporations, or who take any interest in their establishment; and those are, intriguing priests, and turbulent demagogues, — the very persons whose despotism, I, for one, am most anxious to control, or to extinguish. There is one annual, or rather, perennial, assertion of the Noble Lord, upon which I shall take the liberty to comment, because it greatly enhances the alarm with which I view the relative position of Popery and Protestantism in Ireland. "The English," says the Noble Lord, "have obtained municipal reform, because they are Englishmen; the Scotch have obtained municipal reform, because they are Scotchmen; the Irish have not obtained municipal reform, because they are Irishmen." I can only characterise such a position as most unfounded and unfair. For my own part, at least, I am opposed to the constitution of these normal schools of agitation, as they have been so often and so emphatically termed, — not because the corporate offices will be filled by Irishmen, but because the new system must increase the power of a party, in my opinion, the most inimical to the true welfare and permanent tranquillity of Ireland; — a party who make no secret of their eagerness to overthrow the Protestant Church; and who will not scruple, for the sake of effecting that unrighteous object, to contend for the virtual dismemberment of the empire. Is the Noble Lord prepared to follow out his reasoning to its legitimate conclusion? Supposing that, in the next epistolary anathema addressed to him by Archbishop M'Hale, that Ajax Flagelistes of modern polemics were to say, "The Episcopalian English have obtained an Episcopalian Church establishment, because they are Englishmen; the Presbyterian Scotch have obtained a Presbyterian Church establishment, because they are Scotchmen; the Catholic Irish have not obtained a Catholic Church establishment, because they are Irishmen." According to the Noble Lord's doctrine, he could see no confutation of this analogy; and as he has furnished the argument, I trust he is prepared to supply the answer. I have, at all times, cordially supported the principle of converting, upon fair terms, the tithe into a rent charge; but I must confess that I was never led to form a very high or sanguine estimate, as to the amount of security which that sacrifice was likely to purchase for the Established Church. It will prevent direct collision between the Protestant clergyman and the Roman Catholic occupier of the soil, — an object, unquestionably of the greatest importance; but has it appeased the inveterate enmity of the popish priest? Has it silenced the inflammatory invectives of the popish agitator? Does any one dream that the object for which these conspirators against Protestantism have been striving is, to procure for the heretical incumbent an easier and more regular payment of his due, and to extort from the landlord an usurious per centage, in his new capacity of banker or tithe proctor to the clergy?

Let the House listen to the terms in which the Honourable Member for Tipperary has denounced the Church of Ireland, — that Church which he has sworn, at the table of the House, not to weaken or to impair, — and then judge whether that Honourable Member, and those who think as he does, can regard the Tithe Bill as a satisfactory and final adjustment. The Honourable Gentleman now describes it in very different terms from those which he would have ventured to employ in 1828. The Roman Catholics are wise men in their generation. They know exactly what claims it is expedient, under any given circumstances, to advance, although the ultimate object of annihilating the Protestant religion is never absent from their thoughts; being not only cherished as a desire, but inculcated as a duty. "This," says he, "is the Church on which a faction fattens, by which a nation starves; — the Church from which no imaginable good can flow; but evil, in such black and continuous abundance, has been, for centuries, and is to this day, poured out; — the Church by which religion has been retarded, morality has been vitiated, and animosity has been engendered." I avow, without hesitation, in the face of my country, that I can neither justify nor account for my past or present opposition to the Municipal Reform Bill for Ireland on any other ground than one which I deem to be paramount and conclusive, — namely, a determination on my part not to strengthen, by any act of mine, the hands of the Roman Catholic faction in Ireland; who, I am persuaded, are unanimous in their wish, and unchangeable in their design, to overthrow the edifice of our Protestant Established Church, for the purpose of building up a popish fabric on its ruins. The state of Protestant feeling, throughout this Protestant country, is not fairly expressed, or adequately represented, in this House. I believe that the Protestants of Ireland are much less dismayed by the unscrupulous activity of their enemies, than disheartened by the paralysing apathy of their friends. The lamp of Protestant light would indeed burn with a dim and feeble flame, if it were not supplied from other sources, extraneous to the British Parliament, with the pure and holy oil of devotedness, zeal, and affection. Those who tax me, for giving utterance to these opinions, with intolerance or exaggeration, indirectly charge our illustrious ancestors, the martyrs of Protestant truth and the victims of popish tyranny, — with all the rancour of bigotry, and all the rashness of fanaticism. My disappointment at the results which have flowed from the Roman Catholic Relief Act is, perhaps, even more poignant than that of my Right Honourable Friend who introduced that Act, in 1829, as the preferable alternative in a choice of evils. When first I was elected a Member of this House, in 1811, I declared myself an humble but zealous champion of that measure, as being in itself a positive good. For the sake of contributing, as I fondly thought, to the happiness and welfare of Ireland, I forfeited the goodwill of an anti-Catholic Cabinet, and gave up all hopes of personal advantage, by voting in favour of Mr. Grattan's motion in the spring of the following year. But I am compelled to acknowledge, with deep humiliation and regret, that not one of my predictions have been fulfilled, nor one of my expectations realised. And are such complaints peculiar to myself? I cannot, on this subject, help alluding to a very striking contrast, which I have seen illustrated by multiplied examples. I have the honour to be acquainted with many politicians, who were, like myself, from the earliest commencement of their public career, most strenuous advocates of the Roman Catholic claims. I have heard not a few of them lament the fatal rror into which they were betrayed, by alse promises and specious misrepresentations; and a still greater number express heir grief and indignation at the extent o which solemn pledges had been broken, nd fresh pretensions urged, by those hose cause they had espoused, on the round of their repeated asseverations, hat when the privileges then contended or should be conceded, they would prefer o ulterior demands. On the other hand, also know many equally conscientious nd intelligent persons, who opposed hese measures up to the latest moment; nd I have never found that one of them as experienced the least compunction for he conduct which he has pursued, or manifested the slightest astonishment at the vils arising from the concessions which e had so deprecated and resisted. Not ne of them has ever exclaimed, "Well, am really lost in wonder when I reflect pon my own blindness and obstinacy. I m quite ashamed, when I contrast the ratitude of the Roman Catholics towards heir supporters; the abstinence of the riests from all interference in the turmoil of secular politics; the undisturbed ranquillity of Ireland, and the entire ecurity of the Protestant Church, with ll my gloomy anticipations, and all my xaggerated fears."

Another objection which I have to this easure is, the apprehension that it will, re long, be followed up, on the part of ler Majesty's Ministers, by further conessions to Roman Catholic importunity. n this head, I am convinced that there is o finality. The principle on which they ct in all their negotiations with the ovement party seems to be this:—"We ill concede nothing that you will allow s to withhold; but we will withhold nohing that you insist upon our conceding." ll the enemies of the Church are their iends, and most of the friends of the hurch are their enemies. The news of eir resignation was received, last year, ith delight by the Protestant clergy roughout the realm; their return was ailed with a delirium of joy by the priests nd precursors of Ireland; and why? ecause the former anticipate extreme anger to our ecclesiastical establishment om their continuance in place, while the tter are led to hope that there is some rospect of obtaining, through their instrumentality, a portion, at least, of those bjects which their leaders so strenuously sist upon out of doors, and within the alls of Parliament as studiously abstain om urging. It is admitted, and even ontended, by their own partisans, that ny alternative is preferable to that of resignation. The principle of maintaining a Protestant Church in Ireland is already made an open question in the Privy Council, by the admissions of the Right Honourable Member for Tipperary, and may become so, ere long, in the Cabinet. There, every important measure has both its supporters and its opponents. It is a kind of concordia discors, where there are usually six of one side, and half a dozen of the other. The only maxim to which all must adhere is this,—that duty must be sacrificed at the shrine of interest, and office retained at the expense of principle. I am aware that it is quite hopeless to oppose the further progress of this Bill; but I believe that, with all the most honest and zealous Protestants of Ireland, it is not less unpopular than the most obnoxious of its predecessors. Her Majesty's Ministers boast much of Irish tranquillity, which I place on a level with Ministerial consistency; both are temporary and conditional; both depend entirely for their continuance upon considerations of policy and convenience. This Bill must necessarily tend to increase papal influence in Ireland, and to undermine British supremacy. It is a Bill investing Daniel O'Connell, Esq., M.P., with the office of Lord Mayor of Dublin, quam diu se malè gesseret, and for enabling him to appoint vice-agitators to every office in every municipality, in order that meetings may be annually held, and petitions annually voted, for the conversion of the rent charges of the Protestant Church to secular purposes. It is a Bill, not for dismantling certain time-honoured fortresses, but for compelling the Protestant troops to evacuate them, that Papist troops may take their place. My Noble and Right Honourable Friends near me may, ere long, have cause to lament that they have abandoned the high vantage ground of principle, and allowed themselves to be entangled in the narrow defile of detail, amid the miry marshes of expediency. It must be allowed, that their conduct is, at all events, most disinterested; for they will find, if they traverse the whole length and breadth of Ireland, that while they have not conciliated a single opponent; they have damped the energy, and outraged the feelings, and forfeited the confidence of many a stanch and steady friend. How many true-hearted Protestants will now be induced to exclaim, "Why should we take an interest in the Conservative cause? why should we canvass? why should we vote? why should we register? why should we incur obloquy? why should we expose ourselves to danger? The incomes of our clergy have already been diminished by one fourth, our corporations are now recklessly transferred into hostile hands. How long will our Church itself be spared? Why may it not also be made over to Popish tyranny and superstition? Our intrepid ancestors engraved on their banner the champion's legend, 'No surrender!' We, their degenerate descendants, must, ere long, efface that inscription, and substitute in its place the coward's motto, 'No resistance!'" I am persuaded that many a Protestant will, ere long, contemplate, with patriotic anguish and generous indignation, the processions of the Roman Catholic lord mayor of Dublin, in all the splendour of his official insignia, from the Mansion House to the mass house; and I can wish no severer punishment for my Honourable Friends near me, who have in this instance deserted the Protestant cause, than that they should be present as guests, or as spectators, at the inaugural banquet which will follow. There, "my Lord Mayor O'Connell" will, in the first instance, propose "The health of his Holiness Pope Gregory XVI., and may he soon extend his paternal sway over an entire nation of united Irishmen!" Next will follow, "Her Majesty, the Queen," with all the honours, accompanied by a silent but very general supplication, that Her Majesty may, in due time, like her illustrious predecessor Queen Mary, become a nursing mother of the true church. Then, "Her Majesty's Ministers; the Liberal Members of the House of Commons; and the glorious, pious, and immortal memory of the appropriation clause." After that will be proposed, "The healths of the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Recorder of Dublin, and the non-Liberal Members of both Houses, without whose generous co-operation we never could have ousted our bigoted predecessors, or attained those high offices which it is our pride and our happiness to hold." What the fifth toast may be I do not pretend to divine, but it certainly will not include Sir George Sinclair or Sir Robert Inglis.

This Bill cannot fail to gratify the ambition, to further the interests, and to consolidate the power of a faction which cherishes a deadly hatred to the Protestant faith, and is resolved to leave no means untried for overturning the Established Church; whilst, at the same time, it must enhance the mortification, endanger the security, and annihilate the influence of a party heartily devoted to the Protestant religion, and uniformly attached to British interests. It might, with a few alterations, be described in the emphatic language applied by a Right Honourable and Learned Privy Councillor to the Church, — it is a Bill by which a faction will triumph, and a nation be disturbed, — a Bill from which no imaginable good can flow, but evil, in black and continuous abundance, — it is a Bill by which religion will be retarded, morality vitiated, atrocity engendered; and therefore, after respectfully tendering to the House my acknowledgments for their indulgence, I feel the greatest satisfaction in having the honour to move, as an amendment, "To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the question to add the words 'upon this day six months.'"

Mr. E. TENNENT.—In seconding the motion of my Honourable Friend, I will not take up the time of the House by reiterating the arguments which, from the very first, have disposed me to be opposed to the measure; but the question has been under consideration for so many years, and has been discussed in all its bearings in so many successive Sessions, that there is no Member, the most indifferent, who must not have had it forced upon him to form some opinion concerning it, and to become, in some degree, decided in his views as to its bearings. I am not content to rest my opposition to the Bill on the same grounds as those taken up by some of the gentlemen in the corporation of Dublin; whose alarms regarding its political and sectarian effects I cannot but regard as highly excited and exaggerated; but these have been so repeatedly canvassed in the House, that I will abstain altogether even from stating the proportion of importance which does attach to them. In Dublin it may, and I have no doubt the change in those respects will, be very considerable; but I do not believe so of Belfast, and the other important towns in Schedule A. But, independently of these considerations, there are other and important grounds on which I have, from the very first, resisted the introduction of the measure, and on which I am still as strongly as ever opposed to it, — namely, its practical working, its turmoil, excitement, and expense — points so objectionable in a mercantile community,—and its cumbrous inapplicability, at the present day, to the objects which it is designed to accomplish; and which might be far more satisfactorily compassed by simpler, cheaper, and more rational arrangements. It is contrary to all experience, to say that institutions [illegible] orms of municipal government, which night have been very necessary during he middle ages, and very suitable to a urbulent state of society, in which comnerce was insecure and social relations ere undefined, must, as a matter of course, e indispensable, or even applicable, to he same objects now, when all these evils ave disappeared, and when the functions f municipal government are confined, xclusively, to those arrangements which re essential to the health, the cleanliness, nd the comfort of the municipal commuities. I speak, of course, of the form of overnment contemplated by the present ill, which is one referable to very remote ntiquity. When the trading portion of he population first congregated into owns, and, separating itself from the gricultural, purchased or obtained the ights of self-government, the form hich, from vanity, perhaps, more than tility, they chose, was an imitation of a mited monarchy, — the mayor repreenting, and frequently, even to the preent day, assuming the very title of, the overeign, and the aldermen and common ouncil representing the two Houses of arliament; whilst the other attributes f government — the administration of stice, the maintenance of an armed orce, the levying of taxes, and the state f royalty — each found an imitation in e recorder and his prison, the local poce, the borough rate, and the corporate fficers. All this might then, perhaps, ave been desirable as well as imposing; ut will any man in his sober senses say at all this array of assemblies and indeendent departments is either desirable, r suitable to the present times; or that a imple committee, or a body of elective ommissioners, would not much more ffectually accomplish all that is to be chieved? Will any man say that it is ssential to the well-being of Ireland that er towns should be watered and watched y a balanced constitution, or her streets epaved and lighted on the principle of a mited monarchy? One great mistake as clearly made, when the corporations f England were under revision, that this bsurd system was not swept away altoether, and the functions of municipal overnment handed over to a body of the itizens, chosen by the community at rge, and acting for the general good, ithout ostentation, or turmoil, or selfterest. But the commission of that rror in England has led to a similar fliction upon Ireland, in the shape of he present Bill; and my opinion has rom the first been, as it is now, in favour f sweeping away this absurd and antiquated machinery altogether. On this broad and intelligible principle, I, as representing a business-like and active community, am opposed to the present Bill, as one utterly unsuited to their wants, and actually hostile to their peace. I, on a former occasion, pointed out that, besides overthrowing a system of municipal government which at present exists, to the perfect satisfaction of my constituents in Belfast, simple, cheap, and effectual, and substituting in its stead this complicated, and extensive, and turbulent code, the new corporation, when elected, will, in reality, have not one single function to perform in that town. Its whole affairs will still be managed, as heretofore, by boards chosen under local Acts, which are not to be repealed; and the new corporation, after all its noisy and angry elections, its costly and turbulent contests, will have an absolute sinecure. Such will, likewise, be the case in Dublin, so far as regards municipal functions; and, on the same principle, many of the other great towns of Ireland — Galway, Sligo, and Clonmel — are, if not avowedly hostile, at least very dubiously inclined towards it. In this way, available for no useful purpose, power will not fail to be perverted to political mischief, and the augmenting of that which but too loudly calls for diminution — the bitterness of religious and political asperity and contention in Ireland. Now, if there is one town in that country in which, more than another, I look with indifference as to any positive power accruing, in the end, to the Radical party by the Bill, it is the town of Belfast; but I do see it an inducement, in the mean time, to agitation, and a premium to discord, which will not fail, while they last, to be highly detrimental to the public peace; and, to show the House the spirit with which one party, at least, are already preparing to carry the new law into execution, I will read an extract from the Belfast Vindicator, a Roman Catholic newspaper of great ability, and certainly of great candour and openness of purpose, which, within the last few days, contained the following exhortation to the new municipal constituency. It proceeds, "We have ——

The SPEAKER. — Order, order! The Honourable Member must be aware that he is not in order in reading from a newspaper in the House.

Mr. E. TENNENT. — I was not about to read from a newspaper; but I was about to read an extract I have taken from a newspaper, as part of my speech.

I have cut out from the paper a slip of the portion to which I wish to call attention, conceiving that I should not be out of order in reading it.

The SPEAKER. — I apprehend there can be but little difference in reading from a newspaper and in reading a printed slip cut out of a newspaper. Had the Honourable Member taken the precaution of copying that paragraph, there would have been no objection to his using it as part of his speech.

Mr. HUME. — I submit, Sir, that it would have the effect of depriving the House of many facilities in the transaction of business, if Honourable Members were prohibited from reading printed papers in this House; and I conceive, that, if they are denied permission to read an extract from a newspaper, it amounts to a prohibition against all printed papers.

The SPEAKER. — I understand the rule of the House to be, that unless a Member gets up in his place to complain of a breach of privilege, he is not entitled to read from a newspaper; and as a slip is equivalent to a newspaper, it appears to me that the Honourable Member for Belfast cannot be in order in reading to the House, as he proposes to do, the extract in question.

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, if I recollect aright, the rule applicable to the reading of newspapers in the House is this, — that Members, on account of the indecorum and the inconvenience that would result from any such practice, should not be at liberty to read newspapers in the House, which have no reference to the matters under consideration; but I doubt whether it would not be drawing the rule too tight to say that a Member is not at liberty to read an extract from a newspaper as part of his speech. Suppose a public meeting had occurred, the resolutions of which were thought to be of sufficient importance to deserve the attention of the House, and that an Honourable Member found reading from a newspaper to be the most convenient mode of putting the House in possession of those resolutions; are we to say that such a proceeding would be out of order? Could we establish a rule prohibiting such a reference? I know it is irregular to refer to a report of a speech appearing in a newspaper, and purporting to have been delivered in this House; for, of course, Honourable Members cannot be held responsible for anything which they have not themselves formally authorised. Reports appearing in newspapers of speeches made in this House are, undoubtedly, matters which cannot be referred to as authorities; but I think it might be, in some cases, most inconvenient if Honourable Members were not at liberty occasionally to make extracts from newspapers as part of their speeches. The House cannot distinguish between newspapers, on the one hand, and pamphlets, reviews, and books, on the other; and I presume it will not be said that an Honourable Member is not at liberty to refer to any printed paper as part of his speech.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I do not see any differince between printed books and newspapers, so far as the reading of extracts is concerned; and I must say, that I have seen the reading of such extracts allowed; though it certainly is contrary to the strict law of the House. If, however, an Honourable Member makes an extract, whether printed or written, — whether from a newspaper or from a book, — a part of his speech; — be the strict rule what it may, — the practice has of late been to leave such a matter to his own discretion.

SIR R. PEEL. — On a late occasion, large passages from newspapers were read in the House, containing a correspondence between Messrs. Fox and Forsyth, respecting the frontier of New Brunswick, which contained information of great public importance. I shall, of course, treat with the greatest possible respect any opinion coming from the Chair; but I never before heard that the reading of extracts was contrary to order.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I remember, some years ago, that I had occasion to refer to reports of considerable importance, respecting the conduct and treatment of prisoners, and that the Speaker of that day held I was out of order. He said, that such extracts as those which I proposed to read could not be read without the permission of the House.

Mr. LAMBTON. — I really think it is absurd to find, that in a grave assembly convened for the purpose, amongst others, of collecting information and discussing it, an attempt should be made to prevent the reading of a quotation, merely because it happens to be in print.

Mr. EMERSON TENNENT. — I suppose, then, it is understood that I [illegible] be permitted to read the extract from the newspaper? It is this: —

> As regards Belfast, we have looked closely into the probable state of the franchise in the several wards; and we can safely promise to reformers a decided majority in the council. It s time to consider what proportion of that majority, or, rather, of the candidates hereafter to form it, will be selected from the Catholic body. . . . If the 30,000 Catholics in Belfast be permitted, without the heat and excitement of a contest, to select eight councillors and two aldermen, out of the forty gentlemen to be chosen o these offices, we can promise that they will seek no more; it would not be candid to admit adding that they will be content with no less. . . . The Catholics of the town will speedily meet to put forward their views in a more distinct manner, and to arrange details important o success. An appeal will then be made to Protestant reformers, the result of which we heartily trust will be a warm co-operation between both.

It would seem that this honest avowal f the Catholic organ excited the alarm of he more wily Ministerial paper in Belast; for, in the next publication of the Vindicator, there appeared the followng: —

> The Northern Whig of yesterday, referring to ur late articles on the municipal question, derecates the idea of sectarianism having any inuence on the selection of corporators in Belst, and declares that people will care little for he religion of the parties, if they be otherwise ualified. This would be to drivel, if it were ot something worse. No question was ever gitated from the beginning, — not even the uestion of Catholic emancipation, — more comletely in reference to sectarianism than this ne; and so the writer proceeds to justify the etermination of the Roman Catholics, to make not a municipal, but a religious and political, uestion.

Now, I have already said, that the issue f such a struggle I hold in utter conmpt. The Radical and movement party ill, in the end, make nothing by the rife; the influence of property, and e good sense of commerce and business, ill in the end prevail, and keep each rty in its proper place; but, at the me time, I cannot express in too strong rms, my disapprobation of a measure hich, without any practical or beneficial sult, will lead inevitably to such a urse of contention, and heart-burning, d animosity, intermediately. I see in a system unsuited to the altered cirmstances of modern times, and effects ghly detrimental to the public peace; d chiefly on these general grounds, ough not irrespectively of others, I give y hearty support to the motion of my onourable Friend (Sir George Sinclair), at the Bill be read a third time on this y six months.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the question."

Mr. SHAW. — I regret that my Honourable Friend (Sir G. Sinclair) has made the present motion; and I hope that he and my Honourable Friend the Member for Belfast will be content with having delivered their speeches against the Bill, and not press the amendment to a division. I feel quite assured that if they do, the division will be misunderstood, and the conduct of those on this side of the House who vote against my Honourable Friend's amendment will be subjected to being both misinterpreted and misrepresented. If, notwithstanding, a division be pressed, then I must act, under the circumstances, in the way which I believe to be the most consistent with the course I have hitherto taken, and with the general views which I entertain on the subject of the Bill; and that will be by voting against the amendment. I might have absented myself altogether; but I was adverse to shrinking from the responsibility of taking one line or other upon a question of so much importance, and in respect to which, from first to last, I have been obliged, by circumstances, to take an active part. I am free to admit to my Honourable Friends, that I do not approve of the Bill in its present shape, and that if the question were, whether or not it should, in its present shape, pass into a law, I should vote against it.

SIR GEORGE SINCLAIR. — Hear, hear!

Mr. SHAW. — My Honourable Friend cheers; and true it is, that, according to the mere technicalities of the House, I might, on this account, be expected to vote for the amendment of my Honourable Friend; but I am not prepared to sacrifice substance to form; and the practical question that will be decided by the vote of this night is, whether or not the Bill shall be sent to the House of Lords, for the purpose of being amended there, and then, so amended, passed in the present Session. I have, in strictness, no right to assume that the amendments which I proposed in this House will be made elsewhere; but the question is not a new one; we are well acquainted with the stages through which it has already passed; and I particularly bear in mind, that those amendments for which I contend, were last year made in the other House of Parliament, and that the Noble Lord opposite, the leader of the Government (Lord J. Russell) subsequently declared in the House, and in my presence, his willingness to accept of the Bill, thus amended. Considering, then, that the Noble Lord is bound by the same honourable obligation, upon which I, and others on this side of the House, have acted in reference to that same measure, to adhere to the spirit of the declaration he thus made at the end of the last Session; I feel it my duty not to oppose the Bill being forwarded, in order to that end. I will not now further advert to those implied pledges or public declarations which have been made on both sides of the House, than to say, that if I were released from any share in them, (which, after the statements made by the leaders of the Conservative party, in both Houses of Parliament, and the conditions on which the two other Irish measures now in operation have been granted, I do not feel that any member of that party who has not dissented from them well can be;) I would nevertheless be unwilling to rest my conduct upon that narrow ground; and even if I were free from all such honourable engagement, I should be prepared to say, upon the intrinsic merits of the question itself, that I must regard it as more conducive to the public good, and to the welfare of Ireland, that the question should be settled on the principle which has been agreed on by both Houses of Parliament, than that it should remain any longer in its present unsettled and most unsatisfactory condition. Indeed, we seem to be reduced to that alternative; for none of my Honourable Friends who object to my course have themselves proposed to substitute any other; and as my Honourable Friend (Sir G. Sinclair) has dwelt so much upon the Protestant interests of Ireland, to which, I trust, I am as firmly attached as my Honourable Friend, or any other Member of this House, I cannot help saying that I consider the true interests of Protestantism in Ireland to be rather prejudiced than served by the patronage and advocacy of those injudicious and irrational persons into whose hands some of the present corporations have too much fallen of late; owing, principally, I believe, to the fact that the legislation of the last five years has so crippled the powers of the existing corporations, in regard to the management of their property, and the appointment of their officers, as to have driven from all share in their control the most respectable and influential persons who had been previously in connection with them; and to have prevented all others of that class from joining them. Under all these circumstances, if a division be pressed, I must vote against the motion of my Honourable Friend, to postpone the consideration of the question for six months more. But I principally rose to deprecate any division being taken in this particular stage of the measure, as being calculated to produce misunderstanding, and to countenance the appearance of a difference of opinion which does not really exist at this side of the House.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — In the hope and expectation of being able to assist in resisting the progress of a measure so destructive to the interests of the loyal and well-affected in Ireland, and to the interests of the reformed Established Church in that part of the empire, I shall cordially support the amendment. It is the more imperative upon me to pursue this course, as I with pain observed that the most of the clauses in this Bill — 240 in number — were run through, without discussion or examination, in the short space of as many minutes. The Bill, therefore, in effect, remains nearly in the same state in which it was before it was committed. The great objection I have to the Bill is, that it is obviously calculated to take all political power out of the hands of the members of the Established Church in the corporation towns of Ireland, and to transfer it to that body already so powerful and predominant in numbers, — the Roman Catholics in that country. Indeed, this important object, though not avowed, singularly slipped out the other night, in a speech made by the Honourable Member for Dublin (Mr. O'Connell). In its present form, and with the objectionable and impolitic clauses it contains, it is absurd to expect that this measure will ever be calculated to meet the evils which have been found to exist in these corporations; and rather than adopt such a Bill, I prefer joining with those who propose dispensing, for the present at least, with corporations in Ireland altogether.

Mr. SOMERSET MAXWELL. — On the division which took place respecting the principle of this Bill, in the last Session, I was in the minority; and had I not been unavoidably absent, I should, in the present Session, have voted against the second reading of the Bill; for the effect of it, in my opinion, will be, to place a large amount of power in the hands of a portion of the community who, so far from being free agents, are under the dominion of a tyrant priesthood, who never were more hostile to Protestantism than at the present moment.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS,

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to repeal so much of an Act passed in the thirteenth Year of the Reign of his Majesty King George II., intituled, 'An Act to restrain and prevent the excessive Increase of Horse Races,' and for amending an Act made in the last Session of Parliament, intituled, 'An Act for the more effectual preventing of excessive and deceitful Gaming, as relates to the Subject of Horse Racing.'"

PRINTED PAPERS BILL.

On the motion of Lord John Russell, the Order of the Day for second reading, read.

Upon the question being put, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—

SIR E. SUGDEN said:—I wish simply to make a few observations, with a view to obviate some of the difficulties that may arise in the course that is now to be pursued, with respect to the publication of the printed papers of the House; and, particularly, do I wish to explain why I voted against the motion for leave to bring in this Bill. I did so, not because I disapproved of the Bill, but because I could not get an assurance that it is intended to accompany the measure with any restriction on our publications, for the protection of individuals, against any defamatory matter which may appear on the face of them. I have a motion on the paper for Thursday, for the appointment of a Committee to consider what steps shall be taken to guard against the publication of proceedings of the House, containing matter criminatory of individuals; and, also, to consider whether the order for the sale of our papers shall be rescinded, or placed under some better regulations. I will not now do what I should be prepared to do, if that motion were to come before the House,—namely, state what has been the course of publication, and what the result of the sales. I will not do so, because I understand this will appear by the Report of the Committee on Printed Papers, which is shortly to be laid before the House; but having taken some trouble to consider what regulations may be adopted by the House, in order, concurrently with the Bill, to prevent the danger which has hitherto arisen from the publication of our papers, I shall shortly state what checks I think will be sufficient to prevent papers being sold, which contain, either from carelessness or other cause, defamatory matter. First, there are the Votes and Proceedings of the House without the Appendix; to the sale of which, as at present, there can be no objection; for the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench have themselves admitted that the right to sell these rests on grounds essentially different and distinct from those involved in the question of "Stockdale v. Hansard." Now, in all our resolutions, since the first general resolution in 1680, we have inserted directions that the Votes and Proceedings of the House should be first perused and signed by the Speaker. The House then took care to have the sanction of their Speaker, as to the accuracy of those Proceedings, and the propriety of their publication. I shall therefore propose no change upon that point. The Appendix to the Votes and Proceedings stands upon different grounds; but I will not suggest any alteration in that particular either, because the Public Petitions Committee peruse everything contained in that Appendix. It is true that in one instance, in 1836, an atrocious libel was published in the Appendix with the sanction of that Committee; but the public interest required that publication. If, in any given case, it shall be found necessary to publish papers that may contain criminatory matter injurious to individuals, it is quite clear that then the interests and feelings of the individual must give way to the public good. All I contend for is this; that where no such necessity exists, we shall not, from mere carelessness, reflect injuriously on the character of an individual. Therefore I am quite willing to leave the Appendix in the hands of the Committee, who will, as heretofore, exercise a proper discretion as to what shall be published, and what shall be withheld. Then, with regard to the Supplement, the present practice is, that, when a petition is presented, and a motion made "that it be printed," the Speaker interferes, and says, that it cannot be printed unless it is intended to found a motion upon it. If the Member presenting it says he intends to found a motion upon it, it is then ordered to be printed, and is circulated the next day throughout the country; so that, in this way, unless there be some check, the most atrocious libels may be disseminated. For this evil, I would propose the simple check, that no petition be published until it shall first have been read at the table of the House, and have been perused and signed by the Speaker. With respect to Bills, it seems to me unnecessary to make any new regulation. Then come the items of accounts and papers, which I think require no other care than what it may be expected will be paid to them by the proper officers of the House, in guarding against the introduction of defamatory matter. With regard to Reports, they are of two kinds; those proceeding from our own Committees, and those laid before the House by Commissioners of Inquiry. These, both of them, seem to require some further check than there exists at present. I would suggest, when Reports of either kind are made to the House, the Committee or Commissioners from whom they proceed should at the same time state whether there existed any reasons for not publishing any particular part of the Reports. In addition to those checks, I beg leave also to suggest the expediency of appointing a Committee of publication. There is, at present, a Committee of Printing; but it is not held to be a part of the duties of that Committee to consider which of the rinted papers are proper to be sold; for, y a resolution of the House, all printed apers are directed to be sold indiscrimi- iately. We have, therefore, no check pon the sale, although we have upon the rinting. I do not object to the sale of arliamentary papers generally; on the ontrary, I consider it the best mode of ommunicating them to those who are in- erested in their contents. I would much ather not interfere, myself, with this Bill; would prefer that the Noble Lord oppo- ite should move for a Committee to con- ider what checks it is expedient to place pon the sale of our printed papers, or hat the Noble Lord would take into con- ideration the suggestion which I have aken the liberty of offering, and add to is Bill such provisions as he may think est adapted for carrying into effect those uggestions, or any others which may ap- ear to him more likely to accomplish the bject in view. If such provisions are ntroduced into the Bill, I shall have great leasure in giving it my support; but if he measure be not accompanied with ome such checks as I have mentioned, I hall be reluctantly compelled to oppose it on the third reading. I cannot conclude, without saying a word upon the last clause in the Bill as it now stands,—I mean the clause providing that all actions heretofore brought or prosecuted, or which may hereafter be brought or prosecuted, for any alleged trespass, under or in execution of any warrant granted by the Speaker of the House of Commons, by authority of the House, since the commencement of the present Session of Parliament, shall be put an end to, and finally determined, discharged, and made void. Now, I think it impossible to maintain that clause; and I have no conception that it will pass elsewhere. The House has no official knowledge that any such proceedings have been taken, or are in contemplation. The title of the Bill does not warrant the introduction of such a clause; and, on general principles, also, it is very objectionable; for if the officers of the House have not exceeded their duty, the privileges of the House will protect them; and where any excess have been committed, the injured party ought not to be deprived by this House of the means of redress.

Mr. WARBURTON. — Sir, the question as to what restrictions ought to be placed upon the printing and publication of papers, although certainly an important one, is quite a distinct one from that now before the House. It may be, no doubt, a very proper question to consider, whether the existing restrictions are or are not sufficient; but I say that this is not the time for considering that question; and that the Members of this House ought not to be placed under duress, by being required to permit, as a premium for the passing of the Bill under consideration, a restriction upon their right of publication. I certainly hope that no additional restrictions will be placed upon the printing of petitions; as I think those already imposed are quite sufficient. The character of the Honourable Member who presents a petition, and moves that it be printed, is, in a great degree, pledged to it; and he himself gives his sanction to it, by his assurance that he intends to make it the subject of a special motion. The Right Honourable Gentleman says, that an additional check is required, in the case of Reports of our own Committees, thus far, —that, through their chairman, each Committee shall state whether there exist any reasons for suppressing any part of the Report. Now, it must be known to many Honourable Members, that considerable discretion is at present exercised by the chairmen of the Committees from which those Reports proceed; and that it is the common practice to omit in them such evidence as reflects unnecessarily on private individuals. The Right Honourable Gentleman also says, that there ought to be a Committee of Publication, which would judge of the fitness of the sale of all papers ordered to be printed by this House. To that suggestion, I would apply the same remark that Milton applied to the question of the establishment of a censorship. "Will the censors read all the works, over which they are to act as censors, and to which their imprimatur is to be affixed?" So would I ask of a Committee of Publication; for I believe that no Committee would read, or could read, all the matter which this House orders to be printed.

Mr. HUME. — If the Right Honourable Gentleman were in the habit of attending Committees, he would be aware that the course now suggested by him is generally put in practice. I know that the Police Committee, as well as several others, suppressed several facts of the evidence taken before them, because it would have prejudiced the characters of individuals. Besides, Committees which have had the whole subject of the inquiry brought before them are much better judges than any Committee of Publication can be, upon the question of how much can be suppressed without giving the public a garbled and unfair version of the evidence.

Upon the question being put, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—

SIR E. SUGDEN said:—I wish simply to make a few observations, with a view to obviate some of the difficulties that may arise in the course that is now to be pursued, with respect to the publication of the printed papers of the House; and, particularly, do I wish to explain why I voted against the motion for leave to bring in this Bill. I did so, not because I disapproved of the Bill, but because I could not get an assurance that it is in- tended to accompany the measure w any restriction on our publication the protection of individuals, agai defamatory matter which may ar the face of them. I have a r the paper for Thursday, for t ment of a Committee to c steps shall be taken to gu publication of proceedin containing matter crim duals; and, also, to co ard to order for the sale of onourable rescinded, or placed ojects, many gulations. I will e Bill will be of be prepared to it. I do not go quite come before t ainly am far from think- what has bee Right Honourable Gentle- and what t the clause will have the effect of not do so the officers of the House when appear exceed their duty. Under that clause, Printe these disputes will be put an end to, har- befor will prevail, and the question of pri- tro vilege will be satisfactorily adjusted. As a it stands at present, it proceeds on this ground, that vexatious actions have been brought, and may again be brought, to harass the officers of the House, when no grievance has been done, and where no compensation is due. Such actions, I think, may be stayed without any injustice. There were a great number of actions brought under the Non-Residence Act, all of which were estopped; and on various other occasions similar proceedings took place with respect to actions. The action against the Sergeant is purely vexatious; and if proceedings to stop actions were taken in other cases, I do not see why such a course should not be adopted in this respect. It is beyond all doubt, that the actions to which I allude have been brought, not in order to obtain the redress of any real grievance, but in order to raise the question of privilege, and to test the powers of the House of Commons. In my opinion, all persons who wish that these harassing proceedings should be put an end to, will see the necessity of such an Act.

MR. DARBY.—I do not wish at pre- but I will not sugge that particular eit Petitions Comm contained in that in one cious libel with th the p tion fo r erch par loca indi from , out that, on the ve invariably indicate or such considerations. For the Report of the Committee of 1837 was made to this House, on the subject of our privileges, as involved in the present question, at my suggestion these words were appended to it. And I now wish to be permitted to read them to the House, to show that some, at least, of those who have been the most strenuous supporters of its privileges have also been the last to desire to assert them to the injury of individuals, or the prejudice of private character. In the concluding pages of this Report I find the following remarks:—

In concluding their Report, your Committee feel it incumbent upon them to observe, that although they have expressed a decided opinion that it is absolutely essential to the effective discharge of the most important functions of the House of Commons, that the privilege of publication should exist without restriction, and that the authority to determine the extent of that privilege and the occasion for exercising it should rest exclusively with Parliament, they are not insensible to the evil which may arise from an incautious printing of parliamentary documents, in cases wherein the character of individuals is involved, and wherein no public necessity calls for publication, or no opportunity is afforded to the party affected to give an immediate answer to the inculpation. Your Committee are aware that, without the previous sanction of this House, no publication of its proceedings can be privileged; and that all presumption, therefore, of malicious motives is excluded: neither have they the slightest doubt that, if the attention of Parliament were directed to each individual case, ample precautions would be taken against the infliction of unnecessary pain, and still more against the possible case that the privilege of Parliament may be abused for the mere gratification of resentments connected with personal or party differences. But amidst the pressure of the important and multifarious business which occupies its attention, it is impossible to exercise, on all occasions, that precautionary vigilance which might effectually

And that this has not been an idle boast I can bear witness; for I myself have seen, on more than one occasion, the exercise of a similar sound discretion by Committees of this House. I have known a case where reflections cast upon the character of an individual, in the evidence taken before a Committee of this House, were suppressed in the publication of that evidence and the Report of that Committee; and I have known another case where, when a public officer was accused of misconduct, the accusation was suppressed until the party accused should have had due notice, and sufficient time, to put in his defence. I think, generally, that this rule ought to be followed; and, I think, moreover, that, in cases of presenting petitions to this House, containing allegations against individuals, the greatest care should be taken to inflict as little pain as possible. There are cases, no doubt, in which the infliction of pain becomes unavoidable from necessity; the case of the public officer to which I have alluded, for instance, and others of an analogous character. But this general rule should, in my opinion, be strictly adhered to and observed, — that no pain should be inflicted gratuitously. The stronger our clam of privilege may be, and the more incontestable our right, the more urgent and imperative it is upon us, and the greater it is our duty, to see that no injury be done to individuals. I am sure that that is a rule which all will be unanimous in affirming. I do not mean to enter on the discussion of the Bill before the House, as the Noble Lord has agreed to take it on a future occasion; and I shall reserve what I may have to say until then. I rose merely to show to Honourable Members near me that the privilege of this House has been exercised, as far as I was concerned, with every delicacy to character and person; and I wished to place on record my own conduct and sentiments in respect to the main question.

Mr. WALLACE. — What is the date he Report from which the Right Ho- ble Baronet has read the extract?

iR ROBERT PEEL. — The date is the 8th of May, 1837.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I beg the attention of the House for a few moments; for so strongly do I feel the importance of the Bill, that, notwithstanding my Right Honourable Friend near me has given his assent to it without any comment, yet I cannot avoid offering one or two observations upon it. I must say, that I object, most strongly, to the principle of ex post facto legislation, which is involved in it. It is true that a precedent for ex post facto legislation has been adduced; but that precedent is one which bears no analogy to the question before us: it was a case where there was no direct personal wrong; and we are not justified, under such a precedent, in inflicting injury unnecessarily upon the character of an individual. But I have still a stronger objection to the second clause; which is intended not only to stop an action against our printer, but, also, to stop an action against any person who may even abuse authority delegated to him by this House. Now, I wish to hold myself free from the supposition that, by a tacit assent, I gave my support to such a clause as that. I must also object to the provision which goes to make the certificate of the Speaker a plea in bar to an action: it may lead to a great abuse; and it is an undue assumption of power. I shall, however, not oppose the second reading, as those objections may be raised at another stage of the Bill.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I shall certainly give my most serious attention to the suggestions of the Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon; but I think it is much better not to enter on their discussion at present. It is a very important subject to which they refer;

I confess, I should look with great jealousy at the appointment of a censor or censors; because they would have the power of retaining or rejecting whatever they might think fit. I also think it unnecessary to make any change respecting the Reports of Commissioners; because they may fairly be intrusted with the responsibility of not publishing defamatory matter, unless it were essential to bear out their recommendations.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — Sir, it gives me great pleasure to think that this Bill is likely to have the support of the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for Ripon. I will not now enter into a discussion of the merits of the provisions which the Right Honourable Member opposite proposes to introduce into the Bill, further than to say, that it would be very desirable to accomplish the object which the Right Honourable Gentleman has in view, if it could be done without injury to the other parts of the Bill; but that I do not think possible. With regard to the clause to which the Right Honourable Gentleman particularly objects, many persons consider that the Bill will be of no use at all without it. I do not go quite so far; but I certainly am far from thinking, with the Right Honourable Gentleman, that the clause will have the effect of protecting the officers of the House when they exceed their duty. Under that clause, all these disputes will be put an end to, harmony will prevail, and the question of privilege will be satisfactorily adjusted. As it stands at present, it proceeds on this ground, that vexatious actions have been brought, and may again be brought, to harass the officers of the House, when no grievance has been done, and where no compensation is due. Such actions, I think, may be stayed without any injustice. There were a great number of actions brought under the Non-Residence Act, all of which were estopped; and on various other occasions similar proceedings took place with respect to actions. The action against the Sergeant is purely vexatious; and if proceedings to stop actions were taken in other cases, I do not see why such a course should not be adopted in this respect. It is beyond all doubt, that the actions to which I allude have been brought, not in order to obtain the redress of any real grievance, but in order to raise the question of privilege, and to test the powers of the House of Commons. In my opinion, all persons who wish that these harassing proceedings should be put an end to, will see the necessity of such an Act.

Mr. DARBY. — I do not wish at present to enter fully into the question; but I wish to know what are the intentions of the Noble Lord opposite with respect to the suggestions of my Right Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Ripon. I shall support the second reading of the Bill; but I sincerely hope that some means of security against libel may be adopted. I hope we shall have a real security in this respect. As regards the general question, I, for one, shall be exceedingly happy to have that unfortunate question settled.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — I rise merely to state that those who have taken a part in supporting the privileges of this House have not by any means overlooked the individual suffering which might result from the course they had taken; but that, on the contrary, they have invariably indicated a regard for such considerations. For when the Report of the Committee of 1837 was made to this House, on the subject of our privileges, as involved in the present question, at my suggestion these words were appended to it. And I now wish to be permitted to read them to the House, to show that some, at least, of those who have been the most strenuous supporters of its privileges have also been the last to desire to assert them to the injury of individuals, or the prejudice of private character. In the concluding pages of this Report I find the following remarks: —

> In concluding their Report, your Committee feel it incumbent upon them to observe, that although they have expressed a decided opinion that it is absolutely essential to the effective discharge of the most important functions of the House of Commons, that the privilege of publication should exist without restriction, and that the authority to determine the extent of that privilege and the occasion for exercising it should rest exclusively with Parliament, they are not insensible to the evil which may arise from an incautious printing of parliamentary documents, in cases wherein the character of individuals is involved, and wherein no public necessity calls for publication, or no opportunity is afforded to the party affected to give an immediate answer to the inculpation. But amidst the pressure of the important and multifarious business which occupies its attention, it is impossible to exercise, on all occasions, that precautionary vigilance which might effectu-> guard against the evil to which we have thus adverted. Much, therefore, must depend upon the discretion and sense of justice of individual Members respecting the presentation and printing of petitions, and of the chairman and members of Committees of Inquiry, in respect to the prosecution of their inquiries, and particularly in respect to the printing of the evidence which may affect private character, until the opportunity be given of rebutting it. To prescribe any positive rule upon such a subject is manifestly impossible. The invariable adherence to such a rule might protect public delinquents from a disclosure of their misconduct, or prevent the notoriety of facts important to the ends for which inquiry was instituted. It appears, however, to your Committee (and they think the practical experience of Members will support the conclusion to which they have come) that it would not be difficult, on a mature consideration of each case wherein the exercise of a discretion may be called for, so to apply it, in the great majority of instances, as completely to reconcile all proper regard for the character and feelings of individuals with the faithful and effectual discharge of public functions. The more essential the privilege, the more urgent the necessity for an exclusive and unfettered authority in deciding upon the exercise and the limits of it, the more important and the more becoming is it to take as much precaution as possible against the infliction of individual injury or unnecessary pain to private feelings.

And that this has not been an idle boast I can bear witness; for I myself have seen, on more than one occasion, the exercise of a similar sound discretion by Committees of this House. I have known a case where reflections cast upon the character of an individual, in the evidence taken before a Committee of this House, were suppressed in the publication of that evidence and the Report of that Committee; and I have known another case where, when a public officer was accused of misconduct, the accusation was suppressed until the party accused should have had due notice, and sufficient time, to put in his defence. I think, generally, that this rule ought to be followed; and, I think, moreover, that, in cases of presenting petitions to this House, containing allegations against individuals, the greatest care should be taken to inflict as little pain as possible. There are cases, no doubt, in which the infliction of pain becomes unavoidable from necessity; the case of the public officer to which I have alluded, for instance, and others of an analogous character. But this general rule should, in my opinion, be strictly adhered to and observed, — that no pain should be inflicted gratuitously. The stronger our clam of privilege may be, and the more incontestable our right, the more urgent and imperative it is upon us, and the greater it is our duty, to see that no injury be done to individuals. I am sure that that is a rule which all will be unanimous in affirming. I do not mean to enter on the discussion of the Bill before the House, as the Noble Lord has agreed to take it on a future occasion; and I shall reserve what I may have to say until then. I rose merely to show to Honourable Members near me that the privilege of this House has been exercised, as far as I was concerned, with every delicacy to character and person; and I wished to place on record my own conduct and sentiments in respect to the main question.

MR. WALLACE. — What is the date of the Report from which the Right Honourable Baronet has read the extract?

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — The date is the 8th of May, 1837.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I beg the attention of the House for a few moments; for so strongly do I feel the importance of the Bill, that, notwithstanding my Right Honourable Friend near me has given his assent to it without any comment, yet I cannot avoid offering one or two observations upon it. I must say, that I object, most strongly, to the principle of ex post facto legislation, which is involved in it. It is true that a precedent for ex post facto legislation has been adduced; but that precedent is one which bears no analogy to the question before us: it was a case where there was no direct personal wrong; and we are not justified, under such a precedent, in inflicting injury unnecessarily upon the character of an individual. But I have still a stronger objection to the second clause; which is intended not only to stop an action against our printer, but, also, to stop an action against any person who may even abuse authority delegated to him by this House. Now, I wish to hold myself free from the supposition that, by a tacit assent, I gave my support to such a clause as that. I must also object to the provision which goes to make the certificate of the Speaker a plea in bar to an action: it may lead to a great abuse; and it is an undue assumption of power. I shall, however, not oppose the second reading, as those objections may be raised at another stage of the Bill.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I shall certainly give my most serious attention to the suggestions of the Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon; but I think it is much better not to enter on their discussion at present. It is a very important subject to which they refer; caused an increase, as compared with 1836, of nearly 3,000,000*l.* for the present year. The House is now called on to vote 137,232 men for the army, navy, and ordnance; and I should like to know what are the grounds on which we are asked to grant such a great increase. I think it is the duty of her Majesty's Ministers to explain this to the House, in order that we may see why we are required to create so large a drain on the public resources. I always find that, when the estimates are before the House, the heads of each department are anxious to have their own votes as high as possible; there appears to be an esprit du corps amongst them, which induces each to wish to have his own establishment as high in the scale as it can be pushed. It is, however, of the utmost importance to the country that we should ascertain why so large an establishment is to be supported during a time of peace. In my opinion, the country should not be called on to support an establishment greater in amount than that which existing circumstances may require.

If we compare the establishments of this year with those of 1822, when the Duke of Wellington was in office, we shall find a vast increase; although it was proved, in a Committee up-stairs, that, in time of peace, we might reduce our naval establishment to what it was in 1792. There were, in 1792, only 16,000 men voted for the navy; and the whole army, navy, and ordnance for that year was only 65,000 men. It is therefore our duty to be satisfied that there is some good reason for the increase. What are the principal reasons assigned for this increase? It has been said, that part of it was caused by the disturbances in Canada; but that cause has ceased to exist; for peace now reigns in Canada. We shall require no troops in Canada, if we allow them to manage their own internal affairs; and we should thus be saved the expenses of 15,000 men. There has, I understand, been a message sent from the President of America, containing a proposition, which, if assented to, will, in all probability, produce a settlement of the question; and, if that question were settled, I do not see that we could require this great number of troops now in British America. We shall not require troops in Canada, if we allow the people of that portion of our empire to manage their internal affairs. Formerly, the disturbances in Ireland were assigned as a cause for keeping up a military establishment; but that cause exists no longer, for Ireland has changed places with England, and is now perfectly tranquil. Regiments have been removed from that country, and they can spare more regiments. And what, let me ask, has produced this change? The Government have shown an inclination to do justice to Ireland, and the Irish people place dependence upon them. Nothing more was wanted to produce tranquillity in Ireland but an inclination to do justice to the people. Then, there are no disturbances in England; for I look upon that which took place at Newport as merely an accidental occurrence. I wish to know why the Noble Lord requires such a mass of troops in this country? It can only be because the people are dissatisfied to a very considerable extent. This dissatisfaction arises from the feeling that they do not experience justice at the hands of their rulers; and the fact is, that such numerous military forces are maintained to keep down the people. The Noble Lord has, now, the benefit of steam-boats and railroads to facilitate the movements of the military in the three kingdoms; so that 5000 men could be rendered as effective now as 15,000 were in the time of the Duke of Wellington's government. We could now send troops 100 miles in a few hours by the assistance of railroads; and these greater facilities of moving our military force are, in my mind, a sufficient reason for a comparative reduction. Besides the amount of our army, there is a force in Ireland of 9000 men, who are quite as efficient a body as the military; and we have, in London, 4000 men, who are just as much military as any other body of men. In addition to these, we have a police force in Bristol, Liverpool, and other towns which did not formerly exist; and all these form additional reasons why we should not require so large a military establishment as formerly. We are, I fear, going on too like a spendthrift, who is regardless of the means of paying the debts he may incur, and who becomes more careless as he becomes more involved. I hope the Noble Lord will not forget those principles of economy and retrenchment which we heard of when he was in opposition; for I have no doubt that, if we go on increasing our expenditure in this way, the Noble Lord will find that, so soon as his difficulties increase, Honourable Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House will not neglect to point out to the country the extravagance which has produced those difficulties. I must say that, during the whole time I have been in Parliament, I never recollect so extravagant a military establishment. I shall insist upon hearing the reasons assigned for this enormous increase; and I shall take the sense of the House by a resolution, proposing a reduction of the amount of the military establishment, if my questions respecting this enormous outlay be not satisfactorily answered.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I have heard the same speeches and charges from the Honourable Gentleman, against all Governments, for the last twenty years; but, although the Honourable Gentleman has been particularly severe on the present Ministers, he has never ventured to make any effective motion to turn them out of office. On the contrary, he has been satisfied to sit down, after speaking till he was tired against them, and then voting black was white in their favour, in the teeth of his own statements and calculations. Certainly, the present are the most ignorant set of men I ever saw in office; and, if it were not for the able and efficient gentlemen who fill the offices of their clerks, they could not get on, and the Government would, I am confident, be brought to a standstill.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I shall not attempt to reply to all that the Honourable Member for Kilkenny has stated; for, as the Gallant Colonel has truly said, we hear from him the same speech every year. The Honourable Member has gone over the old ground of exhibiting the deficient state of the revenue; and argued that, having ascertained that point, we ought to conform our expenditure to it,—without considering what the necessities of the nation may require in respect to its various and important relations aud obligations. I think he ought, in consistency, to have made these charges some nights since, on the subject of the navy estimates, which showed an increase of 400,000l., instead of bringing them forward on these army estimates, which exhibit 30,000*l.* reduction, as compared with the amount for the past year. Yet the tone of the House, on that occasion, was to blame Government for not asking more! I stated, in August last, the reason for that augmentation of which he complains; and it met with very general concurrence, in consequence of the very general excitement existing, and the necessity for affording protection to person and property. Certainly, things are better now; although I cannot agree with the Honourable Member, that what happened in Newport was quite accidental, or that it should be taken as a sample of the general dissatisfaction existing through the country; but, if it were, that argument would be a bad one to urge as a ground for reduction. The inference he draws from the state of Canada is equally unfortunate for his argument; for the demand of the party whose claims he advocates was, virtually, the establishment of a French republic in Canada,—a party whose violent proceedings it was necessary to resist by force. I felt no hesitation, at that time, in recommending that course to be pursued; and this House, in pursuance of that policy, granted the forces, which have, alone, enabled us to keep those provinces in subjection to the British Crown. I regret that a number of regiments have now been in Canada, some of them eleven, twelve, and thirteen years, absent from their native country, contrary to the rule of the service, which is, that they should return in ten years; but the large number abroad has prevented the system of relief being carried into proper effect of late. However, my Honourable Friend at the head of the war department has proposed a plan, by which we expect that this desirable object can be attained in future with greater regularity, and which I am sure nobody will oppose. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny appears to have been misled, by the newspapers, respecting the boundary question. The facts are, that my Noble Friend, in the course of the last season, sent a communication on the subject to the Government of the United States, and received in reply a project of their own, containing several different propositions. About the same time, gentlemen had arrived there to make a survey of the whole boundary. They have now completed their work, and are drawing up their Report. As soon as it is completed, an answer will be given to the American Government. The subject of encroachment by the citizens of the State of Maine is quite a different question, arising out of the proceedings of those very disorderly gangs of persons that rove about the frontiers, which have not been decided on as belonging to either party. This state of things has led to the necessity of making some provision for the protection of the road by which our troops move to and from New Brunswick and Canada; and the result of which precautionary measures has been, that the disturbances alluded to will not be likely to occur again; and I expect my Noble Friend will be able to show, in his place, and I trust that this House will be fully convinced, that, in every department, and on whatever service Her Majesty's forces have been employed, nothing has been neglected, either for the honour, welfare, and efficiency of the service, or for the proper maintenance of the power, the interest, and the dignity of the empire whose banner they defend.

Question, "That the Speaker leave the chair," put, and agreed to.

ARMY ESTIMATES.

The House went into Committee of Supply on the Army Estimates.

Mr. MACAULAY. — Sir, my Noble Friend has relieved me from the necessity of making some remarks which, otherwise, I should have thought it necessary to offer on the speech of the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny. I will therefore, at present, only say, that I think any person who has heard that speech, and who was acquainted with the previous transactions of the country, would have been very slow to believe that the military establishment proposed for this year is actually lower, both as to men and charge, than that in favour of which the Honourable Gentleman himself, only last August, both voted and spoke. It was only on the 2d day of August last, that my Noble Friend came down to this House to propose a supplementary estimate of 75,000*l.*, and an addition of 5000 men to the army, and that the Honourable Gentleman declared that he would not take upon himself the responsibilty of refusing to the Ministers of the Crown those men, and that sum of money, which they declared to be necessary for the preservation of peace, and for the honour of the state; and I should be glad to know whether those same arguments, which have been used this evening, might not have been urged, with equal effect, in August last? All that the Honourable Gentleman has said, this night, about the refusal of justice to Canada,— all that he has said about the people of this country, — all that he has said about the condition of the people of Ireland, — might have been said, with exactly equal propriety and effect, on the 2d of August, last year. I conceive, therefore, that at all events, in bringing forward the estimate which I have now the honour to lay before the House, I cannot be considered as liable to the charge of profusion, if the Honourable Gentleman himself is acquitted of it. The estimate brought forward, last year, by the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland was 6,119,068*l.*; to that sum, in August, 75,000*l.* were added, making the whole charge, last year, 6,194,068*l.* The whole charge of this year is about 30,000*l.* more. This is, unquestionably, a considerable addition; but, of that addition, the greater part has been made for Indian purposes; and will be defrayed out of the Indian revenues. The whole force for which the estimate was taken in February, 1839, including the force for India, amounted to 109,818 men. The present establishment amounts to 121,112 men. The additional force is 11,294 men; but, of this force, 7206 men are employed in the defence of our Indian empire, and are charged upon the revenues of that country. There remains, therefore, an increase of 4088 men. 5000 men, I believe, was the addition for which the Honourable Member for Kilkenny voted last August; and the additional force we propose, this year, amounts to 4088 men. I may, perhaps, be permitted to state the mode in which this addition is made; because, in doing so, I shall most conclusively refute the invidious insinuations of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny. About 500 men have been added to the army, in order to increase the colonial branch of it. Three companies, amounting to 33 men each, have been added to the West Indian Regiment: About 100 men — I think 102 — have been added to the establishment at Malta. The necessity for this addition has been made out to the Government by the local authorities, who have represented that it is necessary both for the duties of the garrison and of the coast guard. A small militia force, if it may be so termed, has been raised at Bermuda, as it is thought desirable that a portion of the youth of Bermuda should be formed into a separate force, in the hope that they may learn, in company with the best troops of England, the very best system of military discipline; so that, after being accustomed, for a short time, to military discipline, in the course of a few years, the Bermudians will constitute a population almost every man of which will be able to use arms with effect whenever the public service may require his aid. In this manner we have made an addition of about 500 men. The remaining addition has been made in this way: — to every one of the eighty-one battalions of infantry in the United Kingdom has been made an addition of 65 men; thus raising every one of these battalions from 835 men to 900 men. These 65 men are composed of 4 sergeants, 4 corporals, and 57 privates. To every one of the twenty battalions which were, at the beginning of last year, in India, has an addition been made of 250 men; raising the force of those battalions from 853 men to 1103 men each; and, lastly, two battalions, of circumstances, I therefore hoice left for us, but to establish e peculiar force for this peculiar ser-rice. I consider that St. Helena requires peculiar force; and I propose, there-ore, to take upon account a sum of 000l., to meet the expenses of such a orps. The precise plan is not yet aranged; but it is desirable, before the House assembles again, that the Governnent should have the means of accomlishing this object. The whole charge or the land force, then, is 3,511,870l.; he whole amount voted last year, with he supplemental estimate of 75,000l., vas 3,496,383l., being an increase, this ear, of 15,487l.

I now come to the staff. On the home taff there is a slight increase, occasioned y the necessary presence of a greater umber of medical officers receiving addiion pay at home this year than last; but hen, to balance this, there is a decrease n the estimate for the foreign staff, a maller number of medical officers being equired abroad. The total increase is bout 550l.; and, in explanation of this ncrease, I should state that it is princi-ally owing to the peculiar situation of the wo provinces of New Brunswick and ova Scotia. The Government has thought hat, in the peculiar position of those rovinces, the command which has hiherto been considered as a major-geneal's, should be henceforth considered as lieutenant-general's command. That is position calling upon the officer for the performance of additional duties; it is a position of great responsibility, and one requiring to be held by a man of talent and firmness; and the Government therefore proposes that the officer in command should be placed on the staff pay and allowances of a lieutenant-general. For staff contingencies, the increase is almost entirely confined to Canada and Jamaica; and why it has increased in Canada, I need hardly explain. This part of the estimate is framed in this way: the general estimate being framed from the actual expenditure of the last year, of course, with respect to remote colonies, the estimate annot be framed upon the expenditure of e year which has just expired; and, equently, in these cases, the estimate
9 had to be framed upon the ex-re of 1837; and the estimate of 0 upon the expenditure of 1838; and when Honourable Gentlemen remember how great a change has been necessary in the military establishment of Canada, between the years 1837 and 1838, it is impossible that the increase under this head of staff contingencies can create any surprise. As to Jamaica, the increase is owing to the refusal of the House of Assembly to vote those items of expenditure which have always been so much treated as matters of course that they have not before been included in the estimates; but, if I am rightly informed, there is no reason to expect that that difficulty will occur again. The total charge for the staff last year was 155,359l.; the estimate for the present year is 164,740l.; making the increase for the present year about 9000l. With respect to the allowances to the principal officers of the public departments, there is a small increase, arising from the progressive increase of salaries of clerks, and from a circumstance indicating economy rather than extravagance. As to the Royal Military College, I have nothing to say; as that department defrays its own expenses. With regard to the Military Asylum, there is a decrease in the estimate of this year, as compared with that of the last. The estimate of last year amounted to 17,486l; the estimate for the present year is only 16,701l.; making a diminution of 785l. The charge for the volunteer corps, last year, was 79,137l.; the estimate for the present year is 92,993l. The difference which exists between the estimates for the two years is on account of expenses actually incurred in employing the yeomanry in aid of the civil power; and the House, I am sure, will grant that sum with the greatest readi-would; for it appears that, in one regiment, instances of theft have occurred, which had been previously wholly unknown. In consequence of the high price of provisions in these colonies, therefore, I have added to the estimate of 240,000*l.* for provisions, forage, and fuel, — "for money allowances and contingent expenses in the colonies, this sum of 5000*l.* There are in these estimates, also, three charges which are perfectly new. The first is 3500*l.* for schoolmistresses. I have no doubt that some Honourable Members will smile at this charge; and I was not made aware, till a few weeks ago, of its necessity. Accounts have been received at the War Office, that schools have been formed in several corps by subscriptions among the soldiers. Upon inquiry, it has appeared, to my great surprise, that the number of female children accompanying our regiments of the line, is not less than 10,000. Now, these children are, in a most emphatic sense, the children of the state. For the public service, they are hurried along with their parents from place to place, — whether from Malta to Gibraltar, from Gibraltar to the West Indies, or from the West Indies to Halifax; and I think they have a powerful claim upon the country for a small sum for their education, to enable them, when they are of age, to earn their own bread. I have considered that a small allowance for schoolmistresses, who might be chosen, probably, as they hitherto have been, from the wives of any sergeants who might be capable of instructing the female children of soldiers in reading, writing, and needlework, and the rudiments of common knowledge, with such simple precepts of morality and religion as a good plain woman of that rank might be supposed to be able to impart, would not be refused by Parliament.

The other two charges to which I wish to call the attention of the Committee may, perhaps, require a further explanation. The first is, 10,000*l.* for a veteran battalion, to be formed for service in Canada, in which colony desertion has been carried to a great extent. About six years ago, an inquiry was made into this subject; and the result was, that, there being then only about 2500 rank and file in Canada, the number of desertions within three years and a half was 650; the whole number of desertions from the whole British army during the same period being no more than 2240. These desertions have not been confined to bad and disreputable characters; for, in many instances, non-commissioned officers and men of respectability and good conduct have deserted. Nor is this system of desertion to be ascribed to distress; for many men have gone away, leaving behind them their necessaries and arrears of pay. But why desertion should take place more frequently in North America than in any other part of the empire it is by no means difficult to explain. In this country, the situation of the soldier is as comfortable as — I may almost say, more so than — that of the labourer, to which class, generally, the soldier has originally belonged. In many of our colonies, physical difficulties oppose themselves to flight; and desertion is, consequently, rare. When in Malta, the soldiers are surrounded by the sea; when at the Cape, they can only escape from their quarters to fly to the dwellings of savages; and as to India, I can imagine no situation more miserable than that of a deserter in that country, wandering amidst its vast regions, amongst people of a strange race and colour, and his footsteps constantly pursued by the power of British law. But with respect to the American colonies, the case is widely different. There the facilities of escape to the United States are many, and the temptation strong. The soil is rich and bountiful, and the wages of labour are high. The consequence is, that high wages, but still more the exaggerated representations that are put forth of the ease and luxury enjoyed by the labourer in America, have constantly drawn away our soldiers from Canada. Several plans have been proposed for meeting this evil. It has been proposed, and, I think, wisely, that Canada should be the last point in rotation to which our troops on colonial service should be sent. There would then be a great number of men with additional and good-conduct pay; and those higher advantages would tend to keep the men faithful to their colours. It has, also, been thought that advantages would arise, and the temptation to which I have adverted be counteracted, if the Government were to hold out to the oldest and most tried of the troops in Canada a sort of military retirement, which should serve as a reward to those who had remained faithful to their colours. Such was the opinion of my Noble Friend the late Secretary at War, as well as of Lord Seaton; and I have reason to believe that that opinion is generally entertained amongst those who possess the best information upon the subject. The precise details of the plan, however, have not yet been made out, and much correspondence must take place before it can be produced; but as it is not improbable that, before the House again assembles, some regiments will be removed from Canada, it will be desirable that some men of good character should be induced to remain there, in order to form a nucleus for future arrangements, in connection with this scheme. On these grounds, and for this object, I am induced to ask the House for the additional grant of 10,000*l.* on account. I also ask for a sum of 5000*l.* on account, for the purpose of forming a corps for service in St. Helena — a place which requires to be defended not according to ordinary system. From communications with military men, we have found that it is not necessary to place a whole battalion there; and if, on the other hand, we divide it, and station only a portion of it there, all military men concur in saying, that to do so seriously injures the whole battalion in point of discipline and efficiency. The 91st Regiment has been divided in that way; and, from the Horse Guards, we have received the strongest assurances that that course is found most injurious to the efficiency and discipline of the regiment. Under these circumstances, I therefore see no choice left for us, but to establish some peculiar force for this peculiar service. I consider that St. Helena requires a peculiar force; and I propose, therefore, to take upon account a sum of 5000*l.*, to meet the expenses of such a corps. The precise plan is not yet arranged; but it is desirable, before the House assembles again, that the Government should have the means of accomplishing this object. The whole charge for the land force, then, is 3,511,870*l.*; the whole amount voted last year, with the supplemental estimate of 75,000*l.*, was 3,496,383*l.*, being an increase, this year, of 15,487*l.*

I now come to the staff. On the home staff there is a slight increase, occasioned by the necessary presence of a greater number of medical officers receiving addition pay at home this year than last; but then, to balance this, there is a decrease in the estimate for the foreign staff, a smaller number of medical officers being required abroad. The total increase is about 550*l.*; and, in explanation of this increase, I should state that it is principally owing to the peculiar situation of the two provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The Government has thought that, in the peculiar position of those provinces, the command which has hitherto been considered as a major-general's, should be henceforth considered as a lieutenant-general's command. That is a position calling upon the officer for the performance of additional duties; it is a position of great responsibility, and one requiring to be held by a man of talent and firmness; and the Government therefore proposes that the officer in command should be placed on the staff pay and allowances of a lieutenant-general. For staff contingencies, the increase is almost entirely confined to Canada and Jamaica; and why it has increased in Canada, I need hardly explain. This part of the estimate is framed in this way: the general estimate being framed from the actual expenditure of the last year, of course, with respect to remote colonies, the estimate cannot be framed upon the expenditure of the year which has just expired; and, consequently, in these cases, the estimate of 1839 had to be framed upon the expenditure of 1837; and the estimate of 1840 upon the expenditure of 1838; and when Honourable Gentlemen remember how great a change has been necessary in the military establishment of Canada, between the years 1837 and 1838, it is impossible that the increase under this head of staff contingencies can create any surprise. As to Jamaica, the increase is owing to the refusal of the House of Assembly to vote those items of expenditure which have always been so much treated as matters of course that they have not before been included in the estimates; but, if I am rightly informed, there is no reason to expect that that difficulty will occur again. The total charge for the staff last year was 155,359*l.*; the estimate for the present year is 164,740*l.*; making the increase for the present year about 9000*l.* With respect to the allowances to the principal officers of the public departments, there is a small increase, arising from the progressive increase of salaries of clerks, and from a circumstance indicating economy rather than extravagance. As to the Royal Military College, I have nothing to say; as that department defrays its own expenses. With regard to the Military Asylum, there is a decrease in the estimate of this year, as compared with that of the last. The estimate of last year amounted to 17,486*l*; the estimate for the present year is only 16,701*l.*; making a diminution of 785*l.* The charge for the volunteer corps, last year, was 79,137*l.*; the estimate for the present year is 92,993*l.* The difference which exists between the estimates for the two years is on account of expenses actually incurred in employing the yeomanry in aid of the civil power; and the House, I am sure, will grant that sum with the greatest readiness, from a knowledge that, in all the trying scenes in which they have recently been engaged, the yeomanry have not only acted with their usual valour and public spirit; but that not a single instance has occurred of undue rigour or severity on their part. The whole estimate for the effective service of the last year, then, is 3,807,073*l.*; that for the present year is 3,846,450*l.*; showing an increase of 39,377*l.* As to the non-effective estimate, there is, I am happy to say, on every head, a reduction. On that of rewards for services, the reduction is, certainly, small; and I rejoice that it is so, as I wish that every farthing should be paid of that estimate. The amount last year was 16,042*l.*; for the present year it is 15,815*l.*, leaving a decrease of 227*l.* The unattached pay of general officers was, last year, 102,000*l.*, and for the present year it is 92,000*l.* The decrease of that estimate is, therefore, 10,000*l.* The number of general officers who have died, receiving that pay, is fifteen; the number who have been promoted to regiments, nine. The following branches of these estimates will speak for themselves: —

Full pay for retired officers, —
Estimate for the last year .	£57,000
Estimate for the present .	53,500
Decrease . . .	3,500
Half pay and military allowances, —
Estimate for the last year .	517,000
Estimate for the present .	505,500
Decrease . . .	11,500

The number of persons receiving was 144.

Foreign half pay, —
Estimate for the last year .	67,204
Estimate for the present . .	63,608
Decrease . . .	3,596
Widows' pensions, —
Estimate for the last year .	143,942
Estimate for the present .	142,984
Decrease . . .	958
Compassionate allowances, —
Estimate for the last year .	131,800
Estimate for the present .	127,300
Decrease . . .	4,500

Of the Chelsea pensioners, the number who have died is 1000. There is a balance remaining of 17,000*l.*, and a reduction, in the estimate for the present year, of 33,367*l.*; the estimate for the last year being 1,308,007*l.*, and, for the present, 1,274,640*l.* The superannuation allowances have been reduced from 44,000*l.* to 42,030*l.* The estimate for the non-effective charge, then, amounted, last year, to 2,386,995*l.*; the estimate for the present year is 2,317,347*l.*; — the whole diminution, therefore, being 69,648*l.* And now, Sir, before I put this vote, I wish to say a few words in answer to some of the observations of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny. I know how zealous that Honourable Gentleman has ever been in supporting all measures which are favourable to popular rights, and how adverse he is to extravagant expenditure; but I feel convinced that he never in his life gave a vote which was more favourable to civil liberty, than when he voted, last August, for the addition of those 5000 men, by which he now wants to see this vote diminished. Although I think that unnecessary taxation is, certainly, a great evil, yet I do not think that there can be any evil in a country of such magnitude as those disturbances which have so recently shaken the national credit, disturbed industry, and put in danger the peace of the empire. I do not believe that any pressure of taxation ever bowed down the people in the way the evils of the recent state of things in some parts of the country have done. I am no alarmist; — I have never thought but that, if any great crisis should arise, there would be found in this country those, who, marshalled on the side of law and order, would put forth their exertions, and, without considering the matter in a vulgar pecuniary light, would not consent to give up this great country to a body of freebooters. I have always been of opinion that the nation, celebrated, as it justly is, for its wealth, for its industry, for the manufacture of fabrics sent forth to all parts of the world, would not, without a powerful struggle, surrender itself into the hands of men elated by extravagant hopes; but, at the same time, when I consider the wealth of our great cities, I cannot say that it is utterly impossible that a mob, exacerbated and infuriated by dishonest leaders, might inflict calamities that might lead to a crisis which the ingenuity and good fortune of years could scarcely succeed in effacing. Once, Sir, and once only, has this great metropolis been abandoned to the power of a mob, who, for a short time, showed themselves to be stronger than the law; and that was on the occasion of the "No Popery" riots in the year 1780. It is a matter of history that, at that time, a sum was awarded for compensation for injuries done in one single street, greater in amount than that which was voted, last year, for the additional 5000 men. Looking at these facts, therefore, I repeat that the Honourable Member for Kilkenny has never given a more economical vote than he did in the month of August, last year. I have seen a just and approved remark of Dr. Adam Smith, that, though a standing army is hostile to the general liberties of the people, still that, under proper modifications and checks, and being well disciplined, a standing army affords to the magistracy, in certain exigencies, the only means of keeping and maintaining the peace. I do not quote the precise language of the author I refer to; but I believe he says the soldiery form the only restraint upon licentiousness; and I think the justice of the remark has been proved by the experience of the past year. The course open to the Government, during last year, was, either to increase the military force, or to revert to that policy which, in times of less danger, was tried by the Governments of Mr. Pitt and Lord Liverpool. I must say, that whoever voted, last year, for the increase of our military force, voted in support of the Habeas Corpus Act, — voted for the perfect freedom of the press, — for the security of property, — for the right of the English people to meet freely, and to discuss the conduct of their rulers, — and for the general liberty of the country. Firmly convinced that the happiest effects have resulted from the course we pursued last year, — firmly convinced that the vote of August last was a vote on behalf of economy and civil freedom, and that nothing has since occurred which can justify Her Majesty's Government in relaxing their vigilance, or in consenting to part with any power which then was given them to maintain the peace and tranquillity of the country, — I shall place this vote in the hands of the Chairman with the strongest confidence that the Committee will assent to it.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I now beg to move, Sir, "That 93,471 men be voted for Her Majesty's land forces, for service at home and abroad (exclusive of those employed in the East Indies), from the 1st of April, 1840, to the 1st of March, 1841."

Question put.

Mr. HUME. — From the eloquent address of the Right Honourable Gentleman, one would almost have supposed that there were no troops at all in England before last August; for he seems to have overlooked, altogether, the 45,000 troops that we had at that period in this country. No doubt the Right Honourable Gentleman considers everything economical as vulgar, and that I am a vulgar person.

[Laughter from both sides of the House.]

But the Right Honourable Gentleman should also consider, that there may be such a thing as economy on the one side, and exaction on the other; and that, however economical a proposition may be, in the view of the Right Honourable Gentleman, that will ever be thought an exaction which is not congenial to the wishes of the people. I have recently seen an anecdote, in the published letters of Lord Dudley, in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day (Mr. Vansittart) and myself, having been remarked standing together, were pointed out as "Penny-wise and Pound-foolish."

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

But I would rather be penny-wise than pound-foolish, any day; and though the lessening of the public burdens may be, in the opinion of some Honourable Gentlemen, a pursuit low and vulgar, yet there may be times when the public mind will be directed to economy. I have received petitions lately from Rochdale, stating, that for the last thirty years distress has not been felt to so great an extent as it exists there, at present. The Duke of Wellington, with 68,000 men, maintained the peace of the country, and its honour, with certainly as much credit as the present Government; and yet the Right Honourable Gentleman and the Noble Lord ask the House for 90,000 or 100,000. In 1837 or 1838 there were only 81,000 men voted; and, supposing that number to have been sufficient then, what are the new circumstances that justify us in now increasing it? The Right Honourable Gentleman says, I voted economically in the vote I gave last year. In the state of the country, which was, at that time, alleged by the Government to be seriously disturbed, I did not refuse the vote demanded; but I added, at the same time, that, in taking that force which would remove as speedily as possible the discontent that prevailed, it was to be understood that it should be diminished as soon as that discontent had ceased. Has, then, that discontent ceased? If not, the Government, I say, is to blame: and, if it have, then the additional force of 5000 men is not wanted at all. I agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman, that it is a great misfortune when riots take place, or when any attempts are made at the destruction of property; and I consider any force which would prevent such disasters to be economical. The Right Honourable Gentleman and myself are both vulgar economists in that. But it should not be forgotten that, with 48,000 troops in the United Kingdom, and with the rapid means of transporting them which we possess at present, we have, besides, a large regularly established police. Is not this police establishment to serve for the maintenance of peace? and, if not, of what use is it, at all? I have ever defended a standing army, and I did so, at a time when the President of the Board of Control attacked it. I have an objection to volunteers and to yeomanry, because I think that sort of half-and-half soldiers are not of equal use with a regular military force: I think that ten regular soldiers are of more use than 100 yeomanry. The Right Honourable Gentleman has not, in my opinion, on the present occasion, made out any case why he should now have more men than were asked by the Duke of Wellington, when at the head of the Government of this country. Since 1837, 11,000 men have been added to the standing army; and no reason has been given for the present increase, except that it is necessary for the relief of the regiments. But that is an old story.

If the argument of the Right Honourable Gentleman — that it is good not to divide the force at St. Helena and the Cape — be well founded, why does he not put an end to the depôt system? My wish is, to bring back the establishment to what it was in 1837. There is, doubtless, great discontent in England; but let the Government repeal the corn laws; and that, it would be seen, would soon put an end to it. The Right Honourable Gentleman says that some great calamity might have occurred, and that the liberty of the country might have been endangered. But, if he wants a military support for the liberties of the country, why does he not ask at once for 500,000 men? As no explanation, Sir, has been offered, either by the Right Honourable Gentleman or by the Noble Lord, why the number of men now asked should be greater than in 1837, I shall propose, as an amendment, that the vote be for 81,319 men.

Mr. WILLIAM WILLIAMS. — I have great pleasure in seconding the amendment.

Question again put.

GENERAL SHARPE. — The Honourable Member for Kilkenny, Sir, may have been "pound-foolish" when he voted for the supplementary increase of 5000 men last August; but I think he has shown evident symptoms of being "penny-wise" on the present occasion. The Honourable Gentleman, I know, considers, and has said, on many occasions, that Members of this House, who happen to be military and naval men, are not to be trusted in matters that relate to any increase or diminution as to their respective professional establishments. Be that as it may, Sir, I am, I believe, the oldest officer in this House; and I may, perhaps, on that ground, be allowed to say, that I have ever acted on this single principle,—that whenever it is pointed out to me, by those most competent to know it, what amount of force is necessary for the preservation of the peace and tranquillity of the country, — for that force I vote. The Honourable Gentleman says, that 10 regular soldiers are of more use than 100 yeomanry; and also that, because we have a large police force, we have no necessity for so many soldiers as are now required by the Government. But will the Honourable Gentleman allow me to ask him whether, — with all deference to the great general utility of the police force, — when matters come to extremities, that body is able to do the thing at all?

My opinion is, that if this country do not keep up a sufficient military force, the risk and danger she runs are great, and that it is very foolish to attempt to stop this vote, for the sake of saving the expense of a few thousand men. There are many parts of the kingdom in which — and I may mention my own neighbourhood among the number — there are great outcries, in consequence of the small number of troops stationed there; and I cannot but consider that I should be guilty of injustice to the country, if I were not to give my vote in favour of the amount of men now proposed by the Right

Honourable Gentleman the Secretary at War.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — So far, Sir, from agreeing with the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, that the number of men now asked is too large, I must say, I think it is too small. I cannot avoid apprehending that the means provided are hardly sufficient to diminish the severe pressure of service which I know to be felt at present by the infantry of the line. Throughout the whole of my tenure of office, I considered this subject to be deserving of the greatest attention, and I frequently impressed upon the Government the necessity of taking decided steps to improve the condition of that portion of the army. I feel, I confess, some disappointment in one or two other respects. I regret that any more correspondence should be required before the proposed veteran force in Canada can be established; and I had also hoped to have heard that some further increase of the black troops in the West Indies had taken place. Experience has shown, and inquiry proved, that the mortality which occurs amongst the British soldiers in our West Indian colonies is of a most frightful magnitude; and there seems to me no other mode of effectually meeting that evil than by some further increase of the black troops in those islands. I cannot perceive, if neither of these measures is to be adopted, and if, as I understand the Right Honourable Gentleman the Secretary at War, no modification of the existing system of depôts is to be made, how, consistently with the demands of our colonial service, he Right Honourable Gentleman will be able, during the present year, to provide hat relief which, in fairness and in justice o the British army, ought to be afforded. The Right Honourable Gentleman stated hat the greater part of the troops in Caada have been there for eleven or twelve years; and yet he says it will not be posible to remove more than one regiment his year. With respect to the general tatement of the Right Honourable Geneman, I think it was highly satisfactory, lthough, at the same time, I certainly ad hoped that, upon the two points I ave alluded to, something more would ave been done.

SIR ADOLPHUS DALRYMPLE. — merely rise, Sir, to say, that I think, with the exception of the increase of the rmy, which was made last year, to the mount of 5000 men, nothing could be learer than the statements and explanations of the Right Honourable Gentleman. I cannot, however, understand why the Right Honourable Gentleman should require a greater army than the Duke of Wellington considered it necessary to keep up when his Grace was at the head of the Government.

Mr. PHILIP HOWARD. — I do not think that the Duke of Wellington entertained the same view as the Honourable and Gallant Gentleman opposite of the force of the country at the time the increase referred to was made; and it certainly does not correspond with an expression which he made use of about the same time,— and which I need scarcely recall to the recollection of the Honourable and Gallant Gentleman, — namely, that "a great country could not have a little war." With respect to what fell from the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, as to the military force now asked for not being required, in consequence of the great improvement that has of late taken place in our police establishments throughout the country, the Honourable Gentleman should recollect that barely six months have elapsed since the Rural Police Bill passed; and it cannot be expected that it can have produced any very great or beneficial effect in so short a period. I hope, then, that the Honourable Gentleman, when he considers the great increase that has taken place of late years in the population of these kingdoms, will, at least, allow to the Government the credit of considering that the increased military force they have asked for, is required. At all events, I am sure that, whatever are the opinions of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, the country will not quarrel with the number of men now proposed.

SIR H. HARDINGE. — I consider, Sir, that the statement which has been made to-night ought to be very convincing to the House that the force which was moved for on the 2d of August, last year, was absolutely necessary for the service of the country; and I would beg to remind the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, when he talks of our forces being more than sufficient for present necessities, that in one quarter alone, — in Canada,— instead of 9 battalions of the line, for the performance of the ordinary duties in time of peace, we have there, at this moment, 19 battalions of the line; showing, in one quarter alone, an addition of 10 battalions of the line. The Right Honourable Gentleman the Secretary at War has stated that 2 battalions have been transferred to India; so that, instead of 20 battalions, we have now 22 battalions in India. This accounts at once for the chief difficulty under which the service is labouring, — namely, the impossibility — for such I may almost call it — of relieving the troops, in the rotation laid down.

The Right Honourable Gentleman has properly stated that the rule laid down is, that the troops abroad should remain there ten years, and those at home five years. But what is the state of things at present? The Right Honourable Gentleman has very fairly informed the House that many battalions in Canada have been eleven, twelve, and even fourteen years out of the country; and some of those in India, seventeen, eighteen, and twenty years abroad. Exclusively of these facts, let the House observe the state of the battalions at home whose turn it will be to relieve those abroad. At this moment there is not one, out of the twenty or twenty-one battalions in this country, which has been in England more than four years! It is therefore almost impossible to afford the required relief to battalions upon foreign service: and I confess, I think that this additional force of 5000 men is very useful in having enabled Her Majesty's Government to bring home three or four battalions of the line. I also think that the arrangement now existing, and which was proposed by the Duke of Wellington in 1825, respecting the division of the battalions, is the most efficient that could be adopted. With regard to an increase of the black troops in the West Indies, as suggested by the Noble Lord, I conceive that to be a question which cannot be fairly discussed in this House. That is a question not even for the Secretary at War or the Commander-in-chief, but for the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who alone can judge whether the state of the West Indian population is such as to enable us to maintain, with safety, a black corps in those colonies. It is a question which the Secretary for the Colonies will do well to take time to consider before he makes up his mind upon it. Now, Sir, with respect to the present battalions in Canada. When the Right Honourable Gentleman talked of the numerous desertions from them, he ought to have mentioned, at least, one noble exception; — that from the Guards, during two years, there has not been a single desertion. I think, as a set-off, the Right Honourable Gentleman ought to have stated that they have conducted themselves in the most irreproachable manner.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — I think the greatest credit is due to the troops generally, considering the positions and the exigencies in which they are sometimes placed. I may mention, as an instance, what has recently occurred at Newport. Several of the soldiers were billeted at small public houses, where they had to associate with the most discontented characters in the district; drink was offered them, and attempts were made to induce them to swerve from their duty; but, under all the temptations which were held out, they remained firm in their allegiance. I believe that in no troops in the world can such confidence be placed as in British troops. Now, what would have taken place in France under such circumstances? If a body of troops had been ordered to Lyons, and sufficient accommodation could not have been afforded them in that place, the French Government would sooner have depopulated a village than have allowed the men to remain in the town on billets. Sir, with respect to the duty imposed on the troops, I wish to remind the House that they are, now, on duty every other night; and that the wear and tear of the constitution is so severe as to be most prejudicial to the service. I wish, also, to state, that they are not sufficiently protected by the Government; for, on a recent occasion, where a soldier was maltreated by a large body of Chartists, the Government determined not to prosecute; but said "that that must be done by the county." I think the Government ought to have instituted a prosecution in such a case, and not to have left it in the hands of any other persons. I shall give my decided opposition to the amendment of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny; and I have not the least doubt that almost every Member in the House will vote against it.

Mr. HUME. — Really, Sir, with respect to the remark of the Gallant Captain, I would beg to observe, that the duty of the troops is unnecessarily severe, and that the number of sentries might be greatly reduced. At the present time, there are upwards of 600 in London. Now, I would ask any Honourable Member whether 200 would not be amply sufficient, considering that we have about 4000 police officers. The people are so obedient to the civil authorities, that I am quite convinced we might safely withdraw a large portion of our military sentries. I consider the proposed increase enormous, and shall certainly divide the Committee on the subject.

The Committee divided on the amendment: —Ayes 8, Noes 100; Majority 92.

Original question put.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — I wish to ask the Right Honqurable Gentleman, the President of the Board of Control, whether any change has yet been effected with reference to the pay of the British troops serving in India, so as to equalise the value of the coin issued in India, with its value in this country?

SIR J. C. HOBHOUSE. — I beg to inform my Noble Friend that no change has yet been made with respect to the payment of British troops in India; but neither myself nor the East India Company are at all to blame in the matter. We have long been aware of the necessity of making some equalisation of the pay of the soldiers in the different presidencies. There is, at present, a difference between the pay of men serving in the Bengal presidency and the pay received by men serving in the Bombay and Madras presidencies. The East India Company, with the entire concurrence of the Board of Control, are extremely willing to equalise that payment, although the equalisation will cost the Company not less than 45,000*l.* a-year. Yet, understanding that such a step is necessary, in order to prevent any jealousies that may arise, or to terminate any differences of opinion that may have already arisen, with respect to that payment, the Company are prepared to send out to India a despatch giving to the British soldier, serving at Bombay and Madras, exactly the same pay as that which is received by the soldiers serving in the Bengal presidency.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—I can assure the Committee that I am extremely unwilling to bring this subject under consideration at this time; but, with the views which I entertain upon the question, I feel myself compelled to say a few words in reference to it; because it so happens that, during the time I had the honour of holding the office of Secretary at War, I was anxious to bring the subject before the House, and deferred doing so in consequence of the discussions which were then going on. Perhaps I ought to take blame to myself for having allowed so long a time to elapse without bringing the matter forward; but I was constantly in expectation that the East India Company and my Right Honourable Friend would see the necessity of effectuating the change for which I contended. However, as they have not done so, and as I understand there is no prospect of this grievance being redressed, I am under the necessity of expressing my opinion; and I trust the House will concur with me in endeavouring to induce the East India Company, and the Right Honourable Gentleman, to carry out the change to which I have alluded. This is no question of the expediency of an equalisation of pay in the different presidencies. The simple point at issue is, whether it is fair or just that the troops in India shall be paid in rupees, calculated each at the value of 2*s*. 6*d*., when, in England, the rupee is only credited to the soldier at the rate of 2*s*. The British officer serving in India is required to receive the rupee as equal to 2*s*. 6*d*., and when it is sent to England he receives for it only 2*s*.; and often only 1*s*. 10*d*. When Lord William Bentinck was in India, he took a great interest in this question, and strongly condemned the injustice done to the British troops in that country, by the mode in which they are paid. That Noble Lord, in a paper which does equal honour to his heart and his abilities, has recorded his opinion that the pay of the troops ought to be issued, not at the nominal, but at the intrinsic value of the rupee. Sir Charles Dalbiac also informs me, in a letter which I hold in my hand, that the army complain much of the injustice done them in this particular. He says, that the troops with which he went to India were paid at the full rate before leaving England, but when they arrived in India, they were paid in rupees valued at 2*s*. 6*d*. each. Great dissatisfaction, consequently, prevailed; and Sir Charles adds, — "This was the only occasion, throughout a very long military service, wherein I found myself in a situation in which no British officer ought to be placed. I knew that there was justice in the remonstrance of the soldier, and I felt that I had not the power to afford him redress." Now, it appears to me that, in justice to our gallant troops, who have always distinguished themselves in whatever service they have been engaged, this serious grievance ought to be redressed. We have lately voted the thanks of this House to the troops in India; and while we have in this manner expressed our approbation of their gallant conduct, it is certainly our duty to see justice done them in a matter so seriously affecting their comforts. These troops have entered into a solemn contract to perform certain duties for a certain rate of pay; and as they are compelled to embark for India, and punished if they refuse obedience, it is absolutely incumbent on the House to see that they receive their pay according to the real value of the coin in which they are paid. Now, the real value of the rupee is not more, if sent to this country, than 2*s*., while it is often less. I can read the words of a despatch from Lord W. Bentinck, stating, "that while the soldier is required to receive payment of rupees, at the value of 2*s*. 6*d*., there is an official circular, issued by the East India Company in the upper province, declaring that a British shilling is equivalent to half a rupee; and I therefore think it a very great hardship that the troops should be obliged to receive the rupee as of the value of 2*s*. 6*d*." It seems to me that the case is perfectly clear and simple, and ought not to be confounded with the question as to allowances, from which it is perfectly distinct. Let the pay be issued according to the real value of the rupee; and, having agreed to that principle, then let such alterations be made with respect to allowances as economy and justice may require. I feel strongly upon this subject; and as I have been unable to get any assurance from the Right Honourable Gentleman that the change will be effected, and as I see no prospect of a change being made, I consider myself bound to call upon the House to express its opinion on the question; for it is but just, when we require the services of the troops in India, that we should insist on their receiving the full amount of pay to which they are fairly entitled.

Mr. MACAULAY. — I quite agree with the Noble Lord, that there has existed a grievance in reference to this matter, of which the troops in India have a right to complain; but I think the offer which has been made by the East India Company is a perfectly fair one. I believe the grievance complained of affects the troops in the Madras and Bombay presidencies only. Now, let us see what a soldier is entitled to on any station out of the United Kingdom. A private soldier is allowed daily a ration of one pound of bread, and one pound of meat, and 7*d*. a-day. In Bengal, the soldier receives a ration of a pound of bread and a pound of meat, and 8¾*d*. a-day, calculated at the false rate of exchange to which the Noble Lord has alluded, and being really equal to 7*d*. a-day. Besides this, the soldier, in the lower provinces, receives 1 rupee and 9 annas a-month, or 1¼*d*. a-day, for spirit compensation; while, in the upper province, he receives 2½*d*. a-day. Now, the royal pay warrant sent out by the Noble Lord himself gives the soldier 7*d*. a-day, and rations; and also an allowance of 1¼*d*. as spirit compensation. The soldier in India gets more, in fact, than he has a right to by the royal pay warrant. Therefore, there is no reason to consider, that, in Bengal, the soldier is worse off than in any other part of the world. I admit that there is a grievance as to the difference of pay; and we are prepared to remedy it. The East India Company is prepared to put all the presidencies upon the same footing as Bengal, and to give the troops in India 7*d.* per day, besides the usual rations and allowances, and spirit compensation. I think that proposal a perfectly fair one; and I am prepared to take any share of the responsibility which may be incurred, by carrying it into effect.

SIR H. HARDINGE. — I think the Committee cannot fail to be of opinion, after the statements made by the Noble Lord and the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, that, up to a recent period, in consequence of a false exchange, there must have been something very wrong in the mode of paying the troops in India. I must say, in the first place, that the soldier is entitled to receive his pay according to the terms of the royal pay warrant, at the fair rate of exchange, and that it is unjust to make him receive a rupee at the value of 2*s.* 6*d.*, when it is only worth, really, two shillings, and when the civil officers are always paid according to the actual rate of exchange. The consequence of the present mode of payment is, that if a soldier is entitled to receive 10*l.*, he will get only 80 rupees; while, for the same amount of pay, the civil officer will get 100 rupees. Now, is it likely the troops can be satisfied with such an arrangement? The equalisation of pay in the three presidencies may be very desirable; but the question is, when the equalisation shall have been made, will they receive a proper sum? Why should the rupees be issued in false exchange to the soldier, and not to the civil officer? But then, the Right Honourable the Secretary at War says, that the soldiers are allowed a large spirit ration. When I was Secretary at War, I issued instructions that, instead of issuing this spirit compensation in kind, the soldier should receive it in money. This I considered to be a great improvement, and calculated to improve the condition of the soldiers. I am not now capable of entering into the details of this question; but I beg to remind the Right Honourable Gentleman, that it was proved, in 1832, by evidence, that great discontent existed among the troops in India, arising from the difference in the exchange? The question is this, — Is that false currency still to remain? and if so, another question arises, Is the soldier still paid at this rate, that the coin which he receives for two shillings and sixpence, everybody else shall obtain for two shillings? This is a grievance which ought not to exist. I have no doubt that the East India Company will act liberally towards the soldier; but I do not think the arrangement a wise one which leaves the soldier in such a state. This question has become exceedingly important, in consequence of what has fallen from the Noble Lord and the Right Honourable Gentleman; but, in the absence of the necessary documents, I do not see how we can now come to any satisfactory conclusion. It is no answer to the Noble Lord, to say, that there is to be an equalisation of pay in the three dependencies. We ought first to come to an arrangement, to make the payment to the troops in the same way as to the civil servants, — namely, at the real and true value of the money they receive. The Right Honourable Gentleman seems to consider this a question of compromise, but I contend that it is a question of right. I do not wish to see it settled more to the advantage of the soldier than of any other party; but settled it certainly ought to be. This question has been, for ten or twelve years, the source of discontent to the army; and I would advise the Right Honourable Gentleman, who, as Finance Minister, is in a position to protect the soldiery, as well as the public, to come to a settlement of it as soon as he possibly can.

Mr. MACAULAY. — I surely must have been misunderstood by the Right Honourable Gentleman. I did not recommend the smallest compromise. What I said was, that the soldier in Bengal receives more than the words of the royal pay warrant, give him. It is of no consequence by what name the money is called; and if we give the soldier a number of rupees in such proportion as to correct the difference in the value of exchange, it matters little what is the stipulated value of the rupee. The present offer of the East India Company is, to give the soldier a greater amount of silver and provisions than, by the terms of the royal pay warrant, he is entitled to. The real test is this —Does the soldier get as much pay and rations as by his contract he has a right to? The fact is, that although he receives the rupee at the rate of 2*s.* 6*d.*, he receives a greater amount of silver than he would receive at Jamaica, or any other station. I admit that strict justice ought to be done to the troops; and I contend that by the offer of the East India Company he will receive more than he is entitled to.

SIR H. HARDINGE. — I will illustrate my assertion by one fact. If a cavalry soldier wishes to purchase his discharge, he has to pay 30*l.*; but if he has to pay for it in India, he will, on account of the difference in the exchange, in reality, have to pay 40*l.*, instead of 30*l.* If a soldier dies in the hospital, and the balance of his pay is 8*l.*, it only amounts to 6*l.* when remitted to his family in this country. This fictitious value is injurious both to the officer and the soldier. I am far from thinking that the East India Company wish to take any advantage of the soldier. The Right Honourable Gentleman says that he at present gets more than he is entitled to; but, whatever sum you pay him, do not pay it in a false currency.

LORD HOWICK.—I do not think the proposal of the East India Company, to place the three presidencies on the same footing, would be satisfactory. I do not wish to go into details; but I contend that, taking all the advantages of the soldier into consideration, he does not, in Bengal, receive the amount of pay in silver to which he is entitled. That was the opinion of Lord William Bentinck, in 1834; and in that opinion I entirely concur. But, with respect to Madras and Bombay, the case appears to me to be much stronger. The Right Honourable Gentleman has admitted that an injustice is committed; but he says it will be corrected by putting them on the same system as Bengal. Now, in Bengal, the rations are found by the Company; and, in many instances, it would be very difficult to carry into effect any other arrangement. But, in Bombay and Madras, the troops have been accustomed to manage their provisions themselves,—an arrangement which has been found infinitely more satisfactory than the system of supplying them by means of the East India commissariat; and it so happens that, in these provinces, provisions are cheaper; and the East India Company, therefore, are anxious to have the provisioning of the troops, in order to make good the loss which will arise to them from paying in silver rupees according to their intrinsic value. I believe that the Company would be gainers rather than losers by the proposed arrangement. It does appear to me, that you ought to give the soldier his pay, according to the intrinsic value of the silver in which you pay it; and that you have no right to make a change in the mode of supplying the provisions to the troops, unless that change be required by them.

SIR J. C. HOBHOUSE.—Sir, with reference to what has been stated by my Noble Friend, I beg to say, that the arrangement on which the troops are now paid is not a new arrangement. It was first made in 1790, and has continued up to the present moment, without any complaint having been made founded in justice. It is true that, up to 1819, the rupee was worth more, and not less, than the sum at which it was issued; but, in consequence of the great change which took place under the Bill of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, India was affected as well as the other parts of the empire. The Court of Directors, with that liberality which has always distinguished them, took the representation of Lord William Bentinck into their serious consideration; and a despatch was thereupon framed at the India House, and transmitted to the Board of Control, and the Commander-in-chief. I hold that despatch in my hand, together with the answer of Lord Hill; and I will read to the House the conclusion to which the Court of Directors, with the approbation of Lord Hill, came, as to the representations of Lord William Bentinck:—

> In conclusion, we desire to state, that the object of this letter is, to explain to you the incorrectness of the Governor General's assumption, that the King's soldier in India does not now receive as much silver as he is entitled to by His Majesty's warrant. You will perceive that the King's soldier, in fact, receives more than he is entitled to; but we do not entertain the intention of reducing the present amount of his receipts. We think it, however, necessary to state this, in order to prevent all possibility of mistake.

LORD HOWICK.—Hear, hear!

SIR J. C. HOBHOUSE.—My Noble Friend says, "Hear, hear!" but this despatch was certainly sent out with the entire concurrence of the Commander-in-chief.

LORD HOWICK.—Hear, hear!

SIR J. C. HOBHOUSE.—Does my Noble Friend say that that is incorrect? I think he will not say so. The arrangement which was approved of by the Commander-in-chief at that time now prevails in India; and, if there is any just ground of complaint, we are ready to rectify it; and, in fact, it would have been rectified a year and a half ago, but for the controversy to which allusion has been made. I contend that the British soldier receives a larger sum, according to the present arrangement, in some of the provinces, than he would do under the arrangement proposed by my Noble Friend.

I am extremely sorry that my Noble Friend should have thought it necessary to bring this matter before the House; but I am not astonished that he has done so. I need not remind my Noble Friend of the consequence of agitation in India in 1798. At that time, a King's warrant was proposed, with reference to the payment of the troops; and a representation of the circumstance reached India, through some unofficial channel, before it was promulgated in the usual manner. And what was the consequence? — A mutiny. The troops took to their arms, and wrung from the Commander-in-chief a promise that what they called their wrongs should be redressed. It is true, that the Government did not afterwards act upon that promise; but what transpired on that occasion shows how extremely dangerous it is to raise discussions on such a subject. But there is another consideration with respect to the allowances. My Noble Friend is aware that the officers in India enjoy advantages which are not enjoyed in any other part of the world; but, if the mode of payment is to be interfered with without just cause, my Noble Friend cannot suppose that the allowances will remain the same. If the present rate of payment be unjust, what a fraud has been continued since the year 1819; and what would be the amount of arrears? It would be so large, that I should very much doubt the ability of the East India Company to pay it. I contend that the soldiers have received all that they are entitled to; and that is the opinion of those who are the most likely to form a correct judgment on this subject, and who may justly be considered the best guardians of the British soldier. I contend that there exists, now, no cause of complaint, in respect to the mode of paying the troops in India. Of this, I have had repeated assurances from Lord Auckland, the Governor General, who has consulted, on this point, one of the best authorities,—Sir James Carnac,—who confirms the Governor General in the opinion he entertains on the subject. At the same time, the Governor General expressed a wish that the subject might not be again agitated; and that no change in the mode of payment of the troops in India should again be attempted, under and by virtue of a warrant from the office of the Secretary at War, similar to that issued in the year 1837.

SIR H. HARDINGE.—I consider it of the utmost importance to the military service in India, that this question should, at once, be set at rest. I assure the Committee that, up to this time, complaints have been made by the service upon the Indian stations. Sir Edward Paget, when Commander-in-chief, said, the manner of receiving their pay, and the variation between the actual and nominal value of the rupee, was a great cause of complaint. I fully appreciate the remark of the Right Honourable the President of the Board of Control, that it is very desirable the question should not be agitated in Parliament; because, I think, that is the worst possible mode of settling the question. I would rather see a remedy spontaneously applied by the Government itself.

SIR R. JENKINS. — I cannot refrain from saying a few words upon this subject before the close of the debate, for the purpose of showing that the Board of Directors have done their duty in reference to this question. In 1835, it was fully discussed, both by the East India Company and the Board of Control; and a despatch was sent out to India. The Noble Lord, however, on coming into office, took a different view of the subject, and sent out a warrant, without any communication with the Court of Directors, who afterwards entered a unanimous protest against the measure. This protest was made, not upon pecuniary grounds, but on account of its effect upon the comfort and convenience of the soldier in that part of the world. In that protest, the Court of Directors begged to call the attention of the Government to the King's warrant of March, 1837, fixing the rate of the regimental pay and allowances to the soldiers in His Majesty's service, and unanimously to protest against the literal application of that warrant to India; because it would subject the troops in Bengal, with very few exceptions, to serious loss; would be attended with disastrous consequences; and make it necessary to change the system of paying the troops in India. The letter written on that occasion formed the basis of a despatch which was sent to the Noble Lord nearly fourteen months ago, but which still remains unsettled. The fault certainly does not rest with the directors. In answer to the justification set up by the Noble Lord, of the warrant of 1837, that it was issued under the impression that it would conduce to the interests of our Indian empire, I beg to suggest to the Committee, that the Court of Directors must be, at least, as deeply interested in the welfare of that country as any individual filling the office of Secretary at War; and their view was, that it would be beneficial to the service to raise the rate of the pay and allowance of the Madras and Bombay army to that of the Bengal force, which is considerably above what they are entitled to under the warrant. I think the Board of Directors have done their duty in this arrangement; which has the effect of increasing the pay of the soldier in the field 2½*d.* per diem, and that of the soldier in quarters, or in barracks, to 1½*d.* a-day, in the presidencies of Madras and Bombay.

SIR CHARLES GREY.—As I have had some experience in the Indian currency, I, perhaps, may be permitted to address a few observations to the House on the present occasion. The intrinsic value of the rupee has always been kept different in the three presidencies; and that circumstance, coupled with the fluctuating state of the exchange, has occasioned considerable confusion and irregularity, and great discontent in every branch of the service. It is utterly impossible for the Government to relieve the service from the difficulties arising from the exchanges, which are fluctuating from day to day. When the exchanges were in favour of the service, and the rupee was worth more than its intrinsic value, it was gladly taken; but when the exchanges turned against them, they very naturally expected to have the deficiency made up. But there is another evil, which constitutes the real gravamen of the charge of the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland; that where the amount was fixed in England, the parties in India obtained less than the intrinsic value of the money they were entitled to receive. That grievance admitted of an easy remedy; because the intrinsic value of the rupee is as well known in India as the value of a shilling is in England; and whenever a case was brought forward on this ground, it was met with the utmost liberality by the Indian Government. I can mention one instance, greatly to the credit of that Government. The salaries of the judges at Madras were fixed at a certain number of pounds sterling, to be calculated by the star pagoda. That coin disappeared from the currency, and the only coin was the Madras rupee, which bore a certain proportion to the gold coin of the presidency; but, on looking at the corresponding value, it was quite evident that the annual loss to the judges was about one eighth of the whole salary, by their being paid in rupees. A statement to that effect was made to the Government, and they not only acknowledged the justice of the claim, and agreed to pay the difference in future; but they actually paid up all the arrears to the parties who sent in their claims. In 1826, an arrangement was made to pay the salaries in rupees, and a calculation was made as to how many were to be paid for a pound sterling. Now, I think, if the army would lay aside the notion of any losses suffered by the exchanges, it would be no difficult matter to remedy the inconvenience and injustice of which the Noble Lord complains. There are two modes in which the soldier is paid. He is entitled to 7*d.* per day. The company give certain allowances beyond that sum. Now, the chairman of the Board of Directors, the President of the Board of Control, and the Secretary at War, have stated that, in Bengal, the pay and allowances together make up more in solid silver than the soldier is entitled to under the warrant. But that, I think, is not a satisfactory arrangement; because the soldier is not likely to be contented, if, when he expects something more from the bounty of the Government, he finds that the two sums together amount to very little more than he is entitled to under the warrant. I think the 7*d.* ought to be secured to the soldier in the intrinsic value of the coin, and that anything above that should be received by him as a bounty from the Government.

Mr. HUME.—I think the Government ought at once to settle the question. I have no doubt that the pay and allowances are more than the soldier is entitled to under the warrant; but that is not the question. The pay should be made distinct from the allowances; and there can be no difficulty in ascertaining the real amount of silver which the soldier ought to receive.

LORD HOWICK.—Sir, having already spoken in this debate, I cannot think of detaining the House at any length; but it is impossible for me altogether to pass over what has fallen from the Honourable Gentleman opposite, the chairman of the East India Company. The Honourable Gentleman stated that I, when Secretary at War, was guilty of the gross impropriety of advising His late Majesty to make a change in the rate of payment of the troops in India, without communicating my intentions to the Board of Directors of the East India Company; and of transmitting a warrant to India, in accordance with those views. Now, nothing can be more unfounded than that statement. When I came into office, I found a warrant in preparation, which made no alteration in the rate of payment. That warrant I submitted to His Majesty in 1837, and it was then issued to the army in general; but it was not at once transmitted to India, because my Right Honourable Friend the President of the Board of Control wished me to withhold it for a time, conceiving that it might be injurious to the discussions then going on. It was withheld, at the desire of my Right Honourable Friend, and was not sent out until some months afterwards, when I found that no advantage would arise from further delay. I therefore must say, that I was a good deal surprised that my Right Honourable Friend should have alluded to that warrant. My Right Honourable Friend laid great stress on the despatch written by the East India Company, and approved of by the Commander-in-chief. Now, my Right Honourable Friend is perfectly aware that, on financial matters, the Commander-in-chief is no authority whatever; and, as his attention had not been called to the material parts of the case, it was impossible that he could give a fair opinion on the subject. But the Right Honourable Gentleman ought to have added that the despatch was not communicated to the War Office before it was sent to India. I will now only add, that, in my opinion, the soldier ought to receive his pay according to the intrinsic value of the silver which the rupee contains, and not accord- to its nominal value. The question of allowances may afterwards be settled.

SIR H. HARDINGE. — It should seem, from the statement of the Right Honourable Gentleman, that the value of the money paid to the soldier, according to the rate at which the rupee is taken, is 8¼*d.* per diem, which is equivalent to the 7¼*d.* rate fixed by the warrant. If that be the case, the army ought to be satisfied with such an arrangement in point of value. But why should you not issue a pay warrant in rupees, instead of in sterling pounds and shillings. There would be this advantage attending the adoption of this principle, — that the payment would be in sterling silver, and would not fluctuate. Until something of this kind be done, the grievances of which the soldiers complain will still continue.

SIR J. C. HOBHOUSE. — The real facts of the case are these: the warrant of my Noble Friend, by inserting the words "soldier abroad," was made applicable to troops in India. I had, at the time, particularly impressed on my Noble Friend the importance of his warrant not applying to India; and I pointed out to him that the use of the words "soldier abroad," as well as "soldier at home," must, of course, make the warrant applicable to India, whether sent out officially to India, or not. That warrant was, however, sent out officially by my Noble Friend to the Governor General. The Court of Directors were not only not consulted by my Noble Friend, but my Noble Friend took the very course which they begged and implored him — and which I, also, begged and implored him — not to take. I, therefore, acting under a sense of the responsibility belonging to my office, took upon myself, notwithstanding the warrant sent out by my Noble Friend, to write to the Governor General, telling him that it was not desirable to act upon the warrant, as an amicable discussion upon the subject was going on very comfortably between me and my Noble Friend, which would, no doubt, terminate in a satisfactory manner. I also mentioned to my Noble Friend at the head of the Government that I could not continue to hold my present office unless the misconception on the part of the Secretary at War was removed. In that condition the matter stands at present. The warrant has gone out, but it has not been acted upon; and there is a sum of 65,000*l.* due to the Bombay and Madras army. I can only add, that the despatch raising the pay of the troops in the Madras and Bombay presidencies will, with the concurrence of my Right Honourable Friend the present Secretary at War, go out in the course of a few days.

LORD HOWICK. — I wish to ask whether my Right Honourable Friend will undertake to say, in his place in this House, that the warrant which I sent out contained one line that was not a consolidation of former warrants?

SIR J. C. HOBHOUSE. — There was a line in the schedule which made the warrant necessarily applicable to India; and I could not help its so applying, though I thought it most improper.

LORD HOWICK. — I beg to state that the warrant contained no reference to the rupee question. It merely stated the amount, in English money, to which the soldier was entitled. It made no change whatever, but was a mere consolidation of former warrants; this, however, it made clear to the troops, — that, when they were serving abroad without rations, they were entitled to 1*s.* a-day, instead of 8½*d.* When the House resumes, I will move for a Return, showing the changes which have been made in the pay of the troops serving at home or abroad by His late Majesty's warrant of March 4. 1838.

SIR R. PEEL. — Before anything is done in this matter, I think it would be well to refer to the evidence given before the Select Committee on Indian Affairs by several distinguished officers, in the year 1833. It appears that, in 1824, a general order was given that the rupee should be valued, comparatively with the sterling money of this country, at 2*s.* 6*d.* per rupee, at which it had been fixed in 1797. It would seem more analogous to sound principles to issue the rupee at its real value. At all events, a very distinct, full, and intelligible explanation of the ground on which we are proceeding ought to be given.

LORD HOWICK. — I wish to impress upon the House that the pay in Bengal is not so much as the soldier is entitled to; whilst, in Bombay or Madras, this is a clear and unmitigated injustice. And the question between myself and my Right Honourable Friend is this. Because an injustice is to be redressed, shall the East India Company be permitted, in order to reimburse themselves the amount of the money, to alter the established system of regimental messes and contracts?

Question agreed to.

Resolution to be reported this day; Committee to sit again on Wednesday. House resumed.

UNION WORKHOUSES BILL.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I beg leave to move the second reading of the Union Workhouses Bill.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I would suggest to the Honourable Member the propriety of extending the Bill to hospitals and other charitable institutions.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — The proposition can be taken into consideration in Committee.

Motion agreed to; Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday.

PRISONS BILL.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I move the second reading of the Prisons Bill.

Mr. GREENE. — I hope the Government will take into consideration the rules relating to the debtors' side of the gaols, in order that some uniform system may be adopted throughout the country.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I agree with the Honourable Member that uniformity of treatment is desirable, not only with respect to debtors, but to other prisoners; and it is with this view that I have brought in the Bill.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I do not mean to object to the second reading of this Bill; but I wish to give notice that, in Committee, I shall propose the insertion of a clause enacting that persons convicted of a political libel shall not be treated, under the regulations of the prison, as those convicted of criminal misdemeanours. I have been induced to give this notice in consequence of the treatment to which Lovett and Collins have been exposed in Warwick gaol.

The Bill was then read a second time.

Motion agreed to; Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday.

LAW OF EVIDENCE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Committee deferred till Monday next

PARLIAMENTARY BURGHS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

Brought from the Commons.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — My Lords, I move that this Bill be now read a first time. I beg, at the same time, to state that I do not intend to propose the second reading of it until Monday, the 30th of March, as it is considered desirable that time should be given to those Peers connected with Ireland to peruse it, and to be in their places to take part in the discussion.

Bill read a first time; to be printed; and to be read a second time on Monday, the 30th instant; and the Lords summoned.

CHURCH PATRONAGE (SCOTLAND).

The EARL of GALLOWAY. — My Lords, I hold in my hand petitions on the subject of church patronage in Scotland, — from the magistrates and town council of Whithorn; from the kirk session of St. Andrew's parish, Dunfermline; and from the inhabitants of Ferreglas, Mousewald, and Kirkmahoe, all of which proceed on the principle that no minister ought to be obtruded on a non-consenting congregation. The petitioners pray your Lordships to take the law of patronage into your serious consideration, and to deal with it as in your wisdom you may think proper, so as to prevent the improper intrusion of ministers on parishes. In that prayer I most cordially concur; and I hope that some measure will be speedily introduced to heal the dissensions to which this question has given rise in Scotland.

Petitions read, and ordered to lie on the table.

VACCINATION.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — My Lords, I rise to call your Lordships' attention to a petition of rather an unusual nature, from a body of persons who do not frequently appear as petitioners; the petitioners are a very large number of the medical profession in this country, who are desirous of calling your Lordships' attention to a subject, not only interesting in every view of public utility and expediency, but also interesting to many of your Lordships in your private stations, and as it affects your Lordships' domestic feelings and relations. It is from the president, council, and members of the Provincial Medical and Surgical Association held at Liverpool, and relates to the present state of vaccination in this country; and though signed by only a few persons bearing office in the Medical Society of London, it expresses the opinion of not less than 1200 provincial medical practitioners, who are desirous of calling attention to the fact, that the small-pox, so far from having diminished of late years, has been on the increase; and they are also desirous of stating to your Lordships the opinion which, after much deliberation, they have formed on the subject, that the increase is owing, on the one hand, to the imperfect state of vaccination in many parts of the country; and, on the other, that it has spread and increased through the perseverance of persons not connected with the medical profession, and not entitled to act in a medical capacity, in the practice of inoculation. The petitioners also state, as an important fact connected with the subject, and as one established beyond the possibility of contradiction, that there is a perfect identity between vaccination and the small-pox, although the symptoms are different; and that this has been proved by the inoculation of a cow with variola matter, and the production, by that inoculation of a disease similar, in all respects, to that which results from vaccination in the human subject. It has been made a matter of complaint that, although a person shall have been vaccinated, yet, after the lapse of several years, he may have an attack of small-pox; but this, they state, has not been the fact, except in cases where the vaccine matter has not been of the proper description. It is, undoubtedly, true, that very few deaths have resulted from small-pox which has been taken subsequently to vaccination, for it always then has appeared in a very mitigated form. The petitioners, however, submit, that no conclusion can be drawn from this against the theory of vaccination; but they state that the imperfect means of vaccinating adopted in this country, through the licence given to persons who are not capable of forming an opinion on the subject, has been attended with increasing evils; and in those particular places in which no vaccination has been adopted, there have been thousands of deaths in the course of a few years; and that there is one city in the south of England where no less than 500 persons have died of the small-pox in one year. Under all these circumstances, the petitioners approach your Lordships, praying you to consider whether any means can be adopted, by the enactment of a law or otherwise, to extend the present system of vaccination. The petitioners do not wish that this evil should be remedied by having recourse to those rigorous measures or despotic proceedings which have been had recourse to in some countries in Europe, namely, a positive prohibition to inoculate with variola matter; and that some penalties should be imposed on those who do not take care that their children be regularly vaccinated. They suggest, that the House should consider how far it would be proper to prohibit persons from inoculating for the small-pox, such persons not being members of the medical profession, and, therefore, not influenced by those considerations which impel the latter to abstain from doing so. They also recommend that a great number of persons should be employed in vaccinating the poor of the country. I need not tell your Lordships that it is the duty of the higher classes of society to discountenance any practice which may be found to be annually productive of a great amount of misery and disease; and that can effectually be done by promoting this easy and simple remedy, which is calculated to mitigate and remove one of the greatest pests which ever afflicted humanity.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I entirely agree with the Noble Marquess as to the urgency of the case; but I differ from him as to the difficulty of finding a remedy. Nothing, in my opinion, would be easier. A short Bill should be speedily brought in, to enable poor law guardians to make contracts for the vaccination of the poor.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — Would that obviate the evil?

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — It is entirely a question of expense to the poor. Some medical gentlemen vaccinate gratis for the poor; others, however, do not, — and their charges are higher than those of the quacks who inoculate for the small-pox. This is the only reason why the poor prefer inoculation.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — I have no doubt that the Poor Law Commissioners will attend to the suggestion of the Noble Lord.

LORD COLCHESTER. — I can testify that the poorer classes are not averse from vaccination; but the truth is, that they have not the means of getting it. In one district, in Sussex, the board of guardians have provided the means of vaccination; and there has been no small-pox there at all.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — My Lords, I have only to say, that I consider the subject so important that I shall cause every inquiry to be made, whether the evil may not be remedied by the measure suggested by the Noble Baron opposite, and thus the good practice be encouraged, and the bad discouraged.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—It might be done by a short Bill, which could be passed in a few days.

The EARL of HADDINGTON.—The remedy of my Noble Friend would not serve for Scotland, where there are no poor laws, and consequently no poor law guardians.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SHERIFFS' SUBSTITUTES.

The Duke of Argyll presented a petition of justices of the peace for the county of Argyll, in quarter sessions assembled, praying for an increase of salary to the sheriffs' substitutes within the said county. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

EDINBURGH MARKET AND PETTY CUSTOMS BILL.

The Earl of Haddington presented a petition of heritors, merchants, ship-owners, and others of the town of Leith, praying to be heard by counsel against the Bill. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The Duke of Argyll, the Marquess of Londonderry, the Earl of Aberdeen, and the Marquess of Bute presented petitions in favour of the principle of non-intrusion, — of the minister and elders of Holburn church and parish: of the presbytery of Glendermotte, in connection with the general synod of Ulster. Muchart; Lochrutton; Kelso; Abbotshall; Kirkpatrick juxta; Holburn (Aberdeen); Bathgate; and Benholme. — Read and ordered to lie on the table.

CORN LAWS.

The Earl of Clarendon presented a petition for the repeal of, — of inhabitants of Broakside. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT ACT.

The Marquess of Normanby presented a petition for alteration of, in relation to the bastardy clause, — of guardians of the Dewsbury union. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FOREIGN FLOUR (IRELAND).

The EARL of CLARE presented a petition against the importation of foreign flour into Ireland,—from the high sheriff and landowners of the county of Limerick.

CASE OF THE NEWPORT CONVICTS.

LORD TEYNHAM.—My Lords, in consequence of what fell from the Noble Marquess the Secretary for the Home Department, last night, on the subject of a petition presented by me, from Newport, praying for the pardon of Frost and his companions, I feel called upon to make one or two observations. First, as to the population of Newport, I find, notwithstanding the statement of the Noble Marquess, that, in the last population Returns, it was stated at only 7000. With respect to the petition, I have been informed that it was signed by five persons who were or had been town-councillors of Newport. Undoubtedly, one of these persons was the uncle of John Frost; but he had resided all his life at Newport, and had retired from business with an unimpeachable character. It is true that he was taken up for looking out of the window of his house at the mob, at the time of the outbreak; but Government did not think it advisable to prosecute him. The petition was placed in a public situation in the town, so that every one who wished might sign it. I understand it is intended to call a public meeting of the inhabitants during the Easter week, in order to give every person an opportunity of expressing his opinion on the subject. I am sure that, if there were the least chance of mercy being extended to these unhappy individuals, your Lordships would be the last persons to give any opposition to it.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.—I am sure your Lordships will think it quite unnecessary for me to add anything to what I said last night. The Noble Lord must, I think, be aware that the petition did not, in any respect, merit the character he had given of it. He has, I have no doubt, been misled; and the petition will be regarded as coming from persons interested in the fate of those men; but it can never be considered as representing the feelings and opinions of the respectable inhabitants of Newport.

PAPERS, &c.

Return of all peerages of Ireland created since the Union, stating the peerages on the extinction or supposed extinction of which each new peerage has been created; and, also, of all other peerages of Ireland supposed to have become extinct during the same period.—Delivered (pursuant to order of 20th of February last), and to be printed.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

The following Bills were severally presented, and read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time; namely, —

Poddle River (Dublin) Bill, —" "To amend the Acts relating to the River Poddle, in the County and City of Dublin." — To be printed.

Ordered, That the said Bill be referred to the Select Committee on Petitions for Private Bills; and that it be an instruction to the said Committee to examine whether the Standing Orders have been complied with, as in the case of a petition for a Private Bill, and under the same rules and regulations.

Mill Bay (Devon) Pier Bill, — "For erecting and maintaining a Pier and other Works in Mill Bay, in the Port of Plymouth, in the County of Devon."

Hull Improvement Bill, — "For better lighting and cleansing the Town of Kingston upon Hull, and certain Parts of the Liberty of Trippett, within, and Part of, the municipal Borough of Kingston upon Hull."

Nairnshire Roads Bill, — "For more effectually making, repairing, and maintaining certain Turnpike Roads, in the Counties of Nairn and Inverness."

Exeter Port Dues Bill, — "For equalising, defining, and regulating the petty Customs, and for facilitating the Collection of the Quay Dues payable to the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the City and Borough of Exeter; and for preserving the Navigation of the River Exe."

Exeter Market Bill, — "To alter, amend, and enlarge the Powers and Provisions of an Act for removing the Markets held in the High and Fore Streets, and other Places within the City of Exeter, and for providing other Markets in lieu thereof."

Austin's Patents Bill, — "For forming and establishing a Company, to be called 'The Deep Sea and General Salvage Company,' and for enabling the said Company to purchase certain Letters Patent."

Garngad Road Bill, — "To alter and amend an Act passed in the third Year of the Reign of His Majesty King George the Fourth, and the Acts therein recited, so far as the same relate to the Road to Provan Mill, commonly called the Garngad Road, and for other Purposes relating thereto."

Birmingham, Bristol, and Thames Junction Railway Bill, — "To amend and enlarge some of the Provisions of the Act relating to the Birmingham, Bristol, and Thames Junction Railway, and to authorise the Company to raise a further Sum of Money for the Purposes of the said Undertaking."

Stoke Bruern Inclosure Bill, — "For inclosing Lands in the Parish of Stoke Bruern and Hamlet of Shutlanger, otherwise Shuttlehanger, in the said Parish of Stoke Bruern, in the County of Northampton."

Austin's Patents. — Order for Bill (6th March) read, and discharged. — Another Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. HAYTER and Mr. GEORGE PALMER.

Wolverhampton Chapel Bill. — Lords' amendments agreed to.

West Stirlingshire Roads. — Order (9th March) for leave to proceed with the Bill, read. — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. WALTER CAMPBELL and LORD DALMENY.

Tweeddale Patent Drain Tile and Brick Company Bill; Garboldisham Inclosure Bill. — Read a third time, and passed.

Birmingham and Derby Junction Railway and Tamworth Approach Bill. — Petition of Ebenezer Robins, against. — Referred to the Committee on the Bill; counsel ordered.

Metropolis Improvement. — Petition of the chairmen of the Greenwich Railway and Croydon Railway Companies, suggesting a line of communication from St. Saviour's Church to Stamford Street. — Referred to the Select Committee on Metropolis Improvement.

Norwich Improvement (No. 1.) Bill. — Petition of the corporation of Norwich, against. — To lie on the table.

Birmingham and Derby Junction Railway and Tamworth Approach Bill. — Petition of the North Midland Railway Company, in favour. — To lie on the table.

Taff Vale Railway Bill. — Petitions in favour, — from Merthyr Tydvil; and proprietors or lessees of collieries upon or near the line of the Taff Vale Railway. — To lie on the table.

Petitions against, — from owners and occupiers of lands, mines, &c. lying near the Taff Vale Railway (three petitions); owners and occupiers of estates lying near the said railway; owners and occupiers of estates within, and inhabitants of, Newbridge; Cardiff; and tradesmen and inhabitants of Merthyr Tydvil. — To lie on the table.

The following Bills were severally read a second time, and committed, as follows: —

Sarum and Ealing Road Bill, — To Mr. BRODIE and the South Wilts list.

Exeter Waterworks Bill, — To Mr. DIVETT and the South Devon list.

General Steam Navigation Company Bill, — To SIR MATTHEW WOOD and the Middlesex list.

Promoli's Naturalisation Bill, — To LORD VISCOUNT SANDON and the South Lancaster list.

Hausburg's Naturalisation Bill, — To LORD VISCOUNT SANDON and the South Lancaster list.

Kingston upon Hull Docks Bill, — To Mr. CHARLES WOOD and the East Riding of York list.

TAFF VALE RAILWAY BILL.

Mr. ROBERT HENRY CLIVE having moved the second reading of this Bill, —

DOCTOR NICHOLL said: — I was in hopes that my Honourable Friend, in moving the second reading of this Bill, would have stated, generally, the grounds upon which he does so. When the original Bill came before the House, I supported it, because I conceived that the inhabitants of those districts through which the railroad was to pass required a cheap mode of conveyance. But, Sir, in this instance, I see an attempt to introduce a most dangerous and objectionable principle; — namely, that, because the work has not been so successful as — and cannot be completed for the sum which — the proprietors originally contemplated, they now come here for authority — not to construct any new works — not for any extension of their works, but — for raising an increased sum of money, and as a consequence of that proceeding, for exacting increased tolls. This is a proposition, it occurs to me, entirely foreign to those principles upon which the House legislates in such matters. If it be acceded to, we may naturally expect, that whenever a company is unsuccessful in the scheme they may have undertaken, they will come to this House, and ask to be relieved from the inconvenience, in a similar way. It has already been tried, by a motion in the case of the Montgomeryshire canal, which my Honourable Friend below me, and my Right Honourable Friend the Member for the county (Mr. Wynn), both opposed. My Right Honourable Friend (Mr. Wynn) upon that occasion said, "If you allow this Bill to proceed, you will establish a precedent of which, I will say, that I know not where it may end." Upon a division, there were but three in favour of the Bill, while seventy-seven voted against it, upon public principle — a principle which I conceive strictly applicable to the Bill now before the House. By allowing persons thus to raise their tariff of tolls after having obtained the required powers for making them, you will induce persons, in future cases, to compute the expenses of an undertaking, in the first instance, at too low a rate; and you will thus invite them — having obtained the required powers — to come back to this House, and apply for a further sum of money, and a further increase of tolls. The adoption of such a principle, I do say, would be most mischievous, and most injurious to the public. What are the simple facts of this case? In 1836, those parties applied to this House for powers to make a railroad; and obtained, under certain conditions, very extensive and compulsory powers. In 1837, they came to the House for leave to deviate, in some degree, from the original line, and make new branches; but it was positively stated, upon that occasion, in evidence before the Committee, that those new branches having been contemplated in the original plan, no further call for money would require to be made; and they never as much as hinted, in the remotest manner, at any proposed increase of the tariff. They took lands, they entered into bargains and contracts; and now that all these are completed, and that their compulsory powers have expired, they come again to Parliament, and ask to be relieved from the conditions on which they obtained those powers. That appears to me to be a monstrous principle, and one which the House ought not to sanction. The original capital was 300,000*l.*, in shares, and 100,000*l.* in mortgages. This, they said, was sufficient, not only for the original line, but the new branches; and yet they now seek for an increase of 60 per cent. on the original capital, although they must have known, in 1837, at least if such be the fact, that they had not sufficient capital. Under these circumstances, I trust the House will support the motion with which I mean to conclude: if not, I can assure Honourable Members that a gross injustice will be done to the original shareholders, who will have to pay 5 per cent. on the 100,000*l.* in mortgages, and 6 per cent. on the advance; while, by this Bill, a bonus is to be given to the new shareholders. The 6¼ per cent. on the money actually subscribed is to be paid to them in preference, and before the original shareholders can receive one sixpence. I therefore move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. DIVETT. — The statement of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman who has just sat down has convinced me, more than anything else, of the necessity of allowing this Bill to go before a Committee, where I know it can be proved that the original shareholders are almost, if not to a man, unanimous in support of this Bill; and also, that no pledge whatever was given that this railway could be completed for the sum stated; while, at the same time, it can be shown, that the original computation was not more erroneous than it has been in many other cases. The real grounds of opposition are not those stated by the Honourable Gentleman. That opposition arises, not from any objection to the small increase of toll which the shareholders ask for, but through a desire to favour the new docks at Cardiff. For such a reason, I am sure the House is not prepared to deprive a large district of country of the benefit of a ready means of communication, by means of a railroad, which I contend, it is entitled to have, in addition to the existing canal. In the event of the House refusing to sanction this Bill, it will be utterly impossible for the work to proceed. With regard to the tolls, I can state that, out of twenty-eight railways, for which Bills have passed since 1835, not above one has the toll so low as in this case. All the alteration we ask for is, to raise the toll on coals from two thirds of a penny per ton — which it is at present — to seven eighths of a penny; and on iron, from 1*d.* per ton to 1¼*d.* I do not think the Honourable Gentleman has shown any analogy between this case and the case of the Montgomeryshire Canal. The first Act for that canal passed in 1794; in 1815, another Act passed, raising the toll; and in 1838, they again asked for an increase. I do not, then, see the analogy. In this case, the work is not completed; and the increase of toll sought for is exceedingly small. By passing this Bill, an essential service will be rendered to a valuable mining district, for the trade of which the canal in insufficient. So far from the coal miners being opposed to it, the greater number of them are of opinion that it will tend very much to their advantage and prosperity; for, in the event of this Bill not being passed, a very high rate of charges will be the result. Indeed, from a paper I have before me, it would appear that iron, conveyed by the canal, will be taxed at 1*s.*, coal at 3*d.*, copper at 1*s.* 8*d.*; and that the other tolls will be in proportion.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET.— As some of my constituents are interested in this question, I am anxious to state, briefly, the grounds on which I mean to oppose this Bill. If the House once sanctions the principle which this Bill involves, I do not see how it can, on any future occasion, object to increase the subscriptions, on the one hand, and the tolls on the other. The promoters of this Bill, although they, in the opinion I at the time stated, and still retain, have taken ample money for their purpose, and ample tolls to remunerate them, —after raising 400,000*l.*, now say, "We must have 280,000*l.* more; and we must have an increase of toll, to enable us to pay the interest of that additional sum." Now, Sir, I contend that parties have no right to come before this House and say, "We have been so egregiously mistaken, that we must increase the tolls to the extent of 60 or 70 per cent. The Honourable Gentleman opposite has stated that it is intended, if this Bill should not pass, greatly to increase the toll of the canal. Sir, there never was a more gratuitous assumption, or one for which there are less grounds. This Bill, on the other hand, will inflict, as has been already shown, a great injury upon the original shareholders. Whether, therefore, as an example to be set with regard to other Bills, or with regard to the particular circumstances of the case, I think this Bill ought not to be allowed to proceed. I have no objection that a certain sum of money should be advanced, on proper terms, to complete the work; but I do object to that clause in the Bill which enables the company to extend their railroad in every possible direction, and to raise money for the purpose. After having been twice before Parliament, and made a bargain with the public and the House of Commons, I do not think sufficient reason has been stated to induce us to abrogate it.

SIR B. HALL. — Having been one of the Committee, I wish to state that I oppose this Bill, because I conceive that the proprietors have been very extravagant in their outlay of money, and have no right, now, to call for an increase of the tolls. Suppose the London and Birmingham Railway Company were to say that, because they had added 1,000,000*l.* to their original expenditure, they required to lay an additional tax upon goods and passengers; surely the House would not sanction such a proposition. If the Honourable Gentleman opposite will consent to withdraw the exacting clauses, I shall give it my support, as I should be glad to see the work completed; which can be done by borrowing a sum of money sufficient for the purpose.

COLONEL WOOD. — The original Bill was very much contested in Committee, and eventually adopted, upon the understanding that the tolls should not exceed or be increased beyond the sums specified in the Act. Like the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down, I think it is most desirable that the work should be completed; and I am ready to assent to a Bill for empowering the proprietors to borrow money for the purpose; but I certainly cannot accede to any infringement of the original understanding, in reference to the amount of the tolls. I shall not now oppose the Bill, but shall certainly endeavour to have those clauses imposing an increase of toll struck out in Committee; while, at the same time, I shall assist in affording every facility for acquiring the necessary loan for the completion of the railroad.

LORD JAMES STUART. — As I have reason to believe that the main line of railway can be completed under the powers of the Act which passed three years ago, and as I know that a great number of the leading iron mine owners of the district are decidedly opposed to this Bill, I shall feel it my duty to vote against its further progress.

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — It does appear to me, Sir, that if the House allows the parties in this case to obtain an increase of toll, it will be obliged, in fairness and consistency, to act similarly in every future case that may be brought forward. Notwithstanding that the Honourable Member for Exeter has stated that the increase in the amount of toll will be very small, I think I have a right to conclude, when I find the amount to be taken for the use of the locomotive power increased by nearly one half, that the charge to the public will be increased in the same ratio. I hold in my hand a statement of the promoters of the Bill, in which they say that the charge for the locomotive power will be one halfpenny, while, under the Act, it is only four tenths of a penny, for carriages furnished by the company. Now, four tenths of a penny is nearly one half less than one halfpenny, and unless the Honourable Gentleman opposite can show that that is not to be the charge for the conveyance of goods where the company are to be the carriers, then, I say, the charge upon the public will be nearly one half more. If the company had confined themselves to the original Bill, their capital would have been quite sufficient. Those new branches may not bring them in anything; and it really seems to me clear that, at all events, they ought to raise money out of their private capital for the purpose, instead of coming to this House for new powers.

Mr. F. H. BERKELEY. — I beg leave to say, Sir, that I shall support this Bill, and for this reason, — that if it be not allowed to proceed, the parties to it, many of them at least, — must inevitably be ruined.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

Mr. MARK PHILIPS. — I am not going to detain the House a moment. I rise merely to suggest, — as the circumstances of this case are somewhat peculiar, as there are various interests to be affected by the Bill, — and as it would be unwise to allow a work upon which there has lready been so large an outlay, to fall nto dilapidation for want of further ca- ital, — that the House ought not hastily o come to a vote for the rejection of this ill, but allow it rather to go before a ommittee, where all those circumstances nay be fully investigated.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — I agree with ny Honourable Friend, that the question s one for a Committee. Even if the ommittee should come to the conclusion hat there are just grounds for increasing he toll, the House will afterwards have n opportunity of negativing that part of he Bill, if it should think proper.

Mr. ROBERT H. CLIVE. — In re- lying to the objections which have been nade to this Bill, I can assure the House shall be as brief as possible. One of he inducements held out to the public to ubscribe was, that there should be a imited scale of profits, and that the tolls hould be framed according to that scale. ow, let it be kept in mind, that, unless a um of money be obtained, the probability s, that it will be impossible to complete he work, after having expended upwards f 300,000l. upon it; and that that money ill have been entirely thrown away. As o public body has offered any objection o the course we are taking, I think I am ustly entitled, under the circumstance I ave just stated, to call upon the House to llow this Bill to be fairly considered and nvestigated. In 1836, powers were iven to raise the sum of 300,000l. by hares, and 100,000l. on mortgage; and, n 1837, powers were obtained to make ertain branches. At the present moment, 5 per cent., altogether, has been called or, the last call of which amounted to 0,000l. Of that call, made in the latter nd of January, 21,000l. has been paid p, so that a great part of it still remains npaid. Of the former calls, only from 1000l. to 1500l. remains due. I state these hings, to show to the House that there as, at least, been honesty of purpose in hose who have subscribed to the work; nd that they are not persons who are esirous of changing their shares from ne day to another; but are bound by interest to the undertaking. The reason of ur coming to Parliament for 150,000l. nore arises from the price of land, of abour, and of iron, having been underestimated; and Honourable Members may well know, that, in almost all cases f great undertaking, the actual expense greatly exceeds the original estimate, — s is witnessed in the instances of the North Midland and the London and Birmingham railways. The power we now ask for is to raise 150,000l., and not 280,000l., as stated by my Noble Friend near me. The additional sum of 90,000l. is also required for locomotive carriages; but this sum was never considered, under the former Act; because it was not then understood whether the proprietors themselves would undertake the management of the conveyance, or allow it to be undertaken by others: therefore we always intended to come to Parliament again, if it were only for that purpose. The increase in the toll is only required to be, — for coal, from two thirds of a penny to seven eighths of a penny; and, for iron, from a penny to a penny and one third. Indeed, I scarcely know a single railroad on which the tolls are so low. At the half yearly meeting in February last, the directors considered it to be their duty to explain to the shareholders, as well as to the traders, the circumstances connected with this Bill; and the shareholders willingly agreed that those who had charge of it should proceed with it, and were perfectly satisfied that the clauses now introduced were essential for the completion of the work. It cannot, then, be said that the shareholders, in any degree, object to this Bill. On the contrary, it would be difficult to find one who does not concur in it. The importance of this measure is evident. Every one knows that there is no part of the kingdom where coal is so abundant, and so easily got at, as in Glamorganshire; so that it must be a very great advantage, provided there be a ready outlet at the sea, to afford every facility for its transmission to the coast. The iron traders, it is said, object to this Bill. Now, I say they have no reason to complain; for they will still have one of the cheapest modes of conveyance in the kingdom. They, at least, are willing that the main line should be completed; and that cannot be done without further powers. The coal proprietors heartily desire the Bill; and I sincerely hope the House will allow it to go to a Committee.

PRINTED PAPERS.

SIR JOHN WALSH. — Sir, I beg leave to say that the motion of which I gave notice for this evening, to the effect that the question of privilege now in dispute ought to be determined by a legislative enactment, being, in my opinion, put an end to by the Bill which the Noble Lord opposite has introduced, I do not feel myself called upon to proceed with it. At the time when I placed the notice on the book, that motion was not so superfluous as it now appears. I should not have attempted to forestall the Noble Lord or the Government, if I could have had the slightest idea that he intended to take up the subject; but it was impossible for me, after the speeches of the Noble Lord, to suppose that the Noble Lord would so soon after have adopted that very principle which I was anxious to have pressed upon the House, although, at the time I gave the notice, I expected I should have had to do so against the declared intention of the Government to oppose it. I shall not detain the House longer upon that point; but I cannot sit down without offering one observation in reference to what fell from the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland on a previous occasion; and that is emphatically to repudiate and repel the charge, that the course adopted by Honourable Members on this side of the House has been dictated by any desire to degrade or lower the character of this House. From the turn which affairs have taken, Sir, I do not feel it necessary to proceed with the motion of which I gave notice.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I wish to ask the Learned Attorney General whether he has any objection to lay on the table of the House the particulars of the actions referred to by the second section of the Bill?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — The particulars are merely these: — Some persons employed by the Sergeant-at-Arms have been served with writs, but no further proceedings have taken place.

BANKING ESTABLISHMENTS.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Sir, in moving, in the words of the notice, for a "Select Committee to inquire into the effects produced on the circulation of the country by the various banking establishments issuing notes payable on demand," I shall not trouble the House with any long statement; but I feel that the question is of so much importance, that it would be disrespectful in me if I were not to state the grounds on which I consider I am justified in recommending to the House the appointment of that Committee, and why I think the House is justified in acceding to that recommendation. As I understand, too, that some erroneous impressions exist as to the nature of the Committee, and the inquiry it is intended to make, I feel it my duty to give such an explanation as will remove that misunderstanding. With regard to the propriety of appointing this Committee, I would first call the attention of the House to the state in which the Bank of England's charter rests at this moment. The House will recollect that Earl Spencer, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, recommended, and carried in this House, the renewal of the charter for a certain period; but, at the same time, made it terminable at the expiration of ten years, on notice being given to the company of the Bank of that intention. That notice must be given in 1844; and if Honourable Members consider the necessity there is for legislating on the subject, — if they observe that the notice must, in point of fact, be given by a resolution of the House, — I apprehend that the latest period at which we can enter upon an inquiry of the matter, whether such notice should be given or not, will be in the beginning of 1842. In addition to that, the House will recollect, that the Bank of Ireland's charter is now continued only by an annual Act. In the course of last year, Lord Monteagle brought in a Bill to continue that charter to a certain extent; but, on that occasion, the whole object of the Bill was to make the Bank of Ireland's charter conterminous with that of the Bank of England; so that the entire question might be the subject of inquiry, and the House might have before it the whole subject of the circulation and currency of the country at the time the renewal of the charters would come under consideration. I state this, in order that the House may see that an inquiry of this nature must be in a very short time forced upon it. It cannot avoid that inquiry; the state of the law of the country renders it inevitable; for I do not conceive it is possible to enter into a fair and proper inquiry touching the renewal of the Bank of England charter, without going, at the same time, into the whole subject. It is not possible to decide a question of this nature, by considering whether the Bank of England has exercised with discretion the powers vested in it; for a question so important does not rest on the conduct of the Bank. But, even supposing that the Bank of England has exercised its powers with the most perfect discretion, there remain the still more important questions, whether the powers which were given to it have been exercised for the public good, and whether it is expedient that the Bank should continue to possess those powers; and it seems to me impossible to give those questions due consideration without going fully into the subject, and reviewing the whole question of the paper circulation of the country.

That is one ground on which I consider it advisable for the House to appoint a Committee to investigate a matter which must of necessity come before the House within a short period; but it is not the only ground on which I venture to propose the appointment of such a Committee. I am not inclined to overrate the importance of public feeling on matters of this kind; but it appears to me, that not only the public in general, but those persons whose attention has been most turned to the subject, and whose opinions are, therefore, most worthy of consideration, are desirous that this question should come under the investigation of Parliament. It is my determination, in the course of what I have to say, not to enter into any charge against the one or the other establishment, but to come to the inquiry in a fair and candid spirit, looking only to the real advantage of the country. Of course, it will be necessary to inquire into the facts of former transactions; but only with the intention of finding, if possible, a remedy for the evils that exist. If you look to what may be considered the means you possess of obtaining the sense of the public mind, you will find that, whatever may be the opinions of parties, —whether they attribute the difficulties the country has had to go through to the conduct of the Bank of England or of other banks,—I think you will find that there does exist on the minds of the most intelligent and best informed persons a strong impression that the present system requires revision and alteration. Even since I gave notice of this motion, I have had additional proofs of the anxiety with which the public look to it; and this I consider another fair and most important reason why the House should not hold itself deaf to wishes so expressed, but should take an early opportunity of giving its attention to this subject. I do not mean to enter fully into the history of former transactions; but when I look to what has passed since the renewal of the Bank of England's charter,—when I recollect the difficulties of 1836 and 1837, the ruin that was then occasioned, and the pressure which the commerce and manufactures of the country underwent at that time; and that, very soon after,—within two years,—the country suffered, if not a crisis of the same difficulties, yet a very severe pressure—(from which, however, I trust it is now recovering, and the effects of which, I trust it will not much longer feel);—recollecting these things, I do say, that the desire of the country is not unreasonable, and that the House ought to give way and accede to the appointment of the Committee. If I may be allowed, I will state, in addition, another reason which induces me more particularly to select this time for an inquiry of so important a nature. I do not know if I be right; but, as far as I can judge of the temper with which the public approach this question, I do not recollect a period when, as it appears to me, they have approached it in a more fair and candid spirit than now. They are aware of all the difficulties attendant on it, and merely request, as prayed by the petition presented to the House this evening by an Honourable Member, that we should appoint a Committee to inquire into the subject. They state the grievances under which they abour; they are anxious to place the investigation in the hands of the House; and they look to the House, if possible, for an adequate remedy for those grievances. I think it is not unwise for the Legislature to take up the inquiry at a moment like this; for if it be left any longer unconsidered, we shall have to bear with recriminations and attacks, and shall find he difficulties of effecting any alteration daily increase; whereas, if we now take t up, at a moment when the public are anxious we should interfere, they will ook with anxiety to our councils, and be disposed cheerfully to receive what we may offer in the way of assistance. It must be remembered that we have to instruct ourselves and the public on this mportant subject; and it is vain to expect hat we can do so properly without inquiring into it, and ascertaining the opinions of men who have given their attention to the question. If we look to the history of our Reports, we shall find that there is no subject upon which more benefit has arisen to the public mind, from inquiries which have taken place before Committees of the House of Commons, than that now before us. Mr. Loyd, in his late pamphlet on the subject of banking, has alluded to that circumstance; and I really think we may attribute all sound measures in this House to inquiries made by Committees, which act on public opinion, and which, though they may not be immediately successful, carry with them ultimate conviction, and bring forth fruit in due season.

I should have almost thought it unnecessary for me to give any explanation as to the nature of the inquiry which I propose, if I had not heard that there is an impression abroad the this inquiry is intended specially to decry certain banks; and that the Bank of England will be altogether excluded from it. I certainly thought that the words of my motion were explicit enough to prevent any misunderstanding of that kind; but, as that impression has gone forth, I beg leave to state that, undoubtedly, I have no intention of appointing this Committee, with a view of making any attack on any particular bank whatever; and that, in point of fact, my anxious wish has been, so to frame my motion as to make the inquiry a general inquiry into the system, and not an inquiry directed against any particular quarter, against either joint stock banks, or private banks. On the other hand, as to the Bank of England being excluded, it certainly appears to me that an inquiry into the paper circulation of the country and banks of issue, without any inquiry into the Bank of England. would very much resemble the play of Hamlet, with the part of Hamlet left out. Now, to inquire into the paper circulation without looking into the conduct or principles of that body, never entered my mind. I should be unwilling to preclude the Committee from entering into the inquiry which is fairly necessary under the words of my motion, and it certainly appears to me that, with regard to the Bank of England, there are many points which naturally will come under the consideration of the Committee. There are many points in the late charter which are new, and to which the Committee will have to give their best attention. They will have to consider the principles on which the Bank was adopted, and whether those principles have been adhered to. They will also have to consider the system of its branch banks, and the arrangement with banks of issue in connection with it. That question was much discussed when the charter was renewed, and is one of considerable importance. There is, also, for consideration, that clause in the Act which renders notes of the Bank of England a legal tender; and, lastly, a point which is now in the charter, the averages of the Bank of England. Much discussion took place on this point, and much fear and alarm were, at the time, expressed at letting the public into the secrets, as they were called, of the Bank. We have now had some experience on that point, and may proceed to consider whether the expected advantage has been derived from it; and if anything turns out to show that the alarm was unfounded, whether the Returns, as they are made at present, afford to the public that information which it is intended should be given to them. These points I mention as worthy of consideration; but I am perfectly aware that there must come under consideration questions much more important. The first of these relates to the existence of the Bank, — to such points as those of its having any peculiar privileges, — whether that existence is right and proper, and whether it would not be a more advisable course to introduce a system of what is called "free banking." If you say that the Bank is to exist, then there is the question, whether it has sufficient power to perform the functions which you think it should perform; and, on the other hand, you will have to determine whether it be not advisable, at this moment, to re-construct the whole system, and to have but one bank of issue. Those are points which have been discussed by men whose opinions are well worthy of consideration, and to which the Committee will have to turn its most serious attention. I am well aware that these are most important and grave matters; but the House must recollect that they are matters which will be forced on them before long, whether they be willing or not to consider them. In my opinion, it is by far the wiser course to inquire early into the subject; so that we may be informed, and that the public may be informed, also, of the questions that are to come before us, and upon which we shall be called to legislate for the interests and security of, I might say, every man in the country. There is one other point to which I wish to allude, before I sit down, and that is the Bank of Ireland. The House will recollect that Lord Monteagle, in the last Session, introduced a Bill for the purpose of continuing the charter until such time, only, as a decision might have taken place with regard to the Bank of England's charter; and if I were now called upon to bring in a Bill on the subject, it would be on the same principle as that which was brought in by Lord Monteagle. The only difficulty which prevents me from now bringing in such a Bill is this, — that to introduce a measure which would tie up the hands of Parliament for four years, at the very time we are about to enter upon an inquiry into the whole subject, would be an inconsistency. My intention, therefore, is not to introduce any such Bill at the present moment, but to bring the question fully before the Committee, and to obtain their opinion as to the course which it will be most advisable to adopt. Some Bill must, of course, be passed upon the subject, before the end of the Session; but I am anxious to introduce such a measure as shall not be inconsistent with the opinions which the Committee may come to. On these grounds, I hope no objection will be offered to the appointment of the Select Committee I have moved for.

Mr. GISBORNE. — I do not rise to object to the present motion, but to observe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not stated any reason why the inquiry proposed to be instituted should not apply to all banking establishments, whether issuing notes payable on demand, or not. I do not see why joint stock banks, not issuing their own notes, should not be equally subject to inquiry; for it is quite a mistake to suppose, because these establishments do not issue notes, that, therefore, they produce no effect upon the circulation of the country. It is scarcely possible to refer to the various existing bargains between the Bank of England and joint stock banks, without coming to the necessary conclusion that the existence of these establishments must produce a very great effect upon the circulation of the country. These establishments are tempted to abstain from issuing notes of their own by the engagement of the Bank of England to discount their bills; and the consequence is, that when the Bank of England is in easy circumstances, as to the supply of gold, these joint stock banks always have the opportunity of supplying themselves, without making application to the Bank of England; but, when the reverse of the state of things exists, and the Bank of England, having but a small supply of gold in its coffers, is compelled to advance its rate of interest, and to demand 5 or 6 per cent. from its other customers, — at such a time, the joint stock banks call for the whole amount to which they are entitled, by their bargain, and obtain it, at a very great advantage; for they receive it from the Bank at 3 per cent., while they issue it to their customers at 5 or 6 per cent. This is so great a gain as to induce the joint stock banks, at such a period, to take the whole sum for which they bargained. The system of oint stock banks acts, further, very materially upon the circulation of the country, by the bills which these banks are the means of bringing into the market. I think it will be found, upon inquiry, that the banks of non-issue are far more mprovident, on the whole, than others. I, for one, from being a shareholder in a arge banking establishment, which does not issue its own notes, can speak, from experience, upon this point; for that bank has lost no less, in the course of three years, than half a million of money by bad debts. They made advances to one firm alone to the amount of 350,000*l.*, that firm never having had property, n any shape, to the extent of more than 40,000*l.* or 50,000*l.* I want to know, then, with such facts before us, why these non-issuing banks should be left out of the inquiry; and why it should not, rather, extend to the operations of banking, generally, throughout the country? There is another point which I think is also deserving of consideration in the proposed Committee. In the Bank Charter Act is a clause restricting all banks, having more than six partners, from accepting bills having more than two months to run. This, I think, it would be well to inquire into. I would therefore suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he ought to word his motion more generally, — say, for instance, o "inquire into the operation of the system of banking in the United Kingdom, as by law established." That wording will let in no questions which it is not desirable to inquire into, and will avoid casting out something of an imputation that banks which do issue notes are worse conducted than those which do not; and will bring the whole subject, and the great object we have in view, more completely before us, than the motion of the Right Honourable Gentleman can do. I hope, too, that care will be taken in nominating the Committee; o select members of sufficiently varied sentiments upon these subjects. The opinions of most Honourable Members, who take an interest in these questions, are known from their speeches; and I hope that the same fault will not be committed on this, as has been committed on former occasions, of appointing none but Honourable Members who entertain one set of opinions.

Mr. JOHN ELLIS. — I do not rise, Sir, to oppose the motion, but merely to make one observation with regard to what the Right Honourable Gentleman has said on the subject of the Bank of Ireland. I understood the Right Honourable Gentleman to say, that if he were left to himself, he would renew the measure brought in, last year, by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer (now Lord Monteagle), while, at the same time, he proposes to regulate his future course by the opinion of the Committee for which he now moves. Now, I protest against the Right Honourable Gentleman thus shrinking from what he considers to be the duty of his office, and transferring its responsibility to others.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, I think that the objection of my Honourable Friend the Member for Carlow, as to the restricted nature of the proposed inquiry, is a groundless one, so far as the matters go to which he has referred; and that all the topics referred to by my Honourable Friend will be open to the inquiry of the Committee. I apprehend, however, that one of the principal objects in proposing an inquiry of this sort is, to put an end to that ever-varying state of currency which arises from the conduct of establishments having power to issue paper in lieu of money. But there is this additional question, which, I think, the Committee should consider, — namely, whether our currency is a correct one, or not. So important are these points, as relating to the subject of banking, that if the Committee be not at liberty to go into them, I fear their labours will be, in a great degree, useless. I certainly entertain a different opinion, now, from what I did some years ago, respecting our present system of currency, composed as it is of metal and paper; which change has arisen from a more attentive consideration of the subject. Since the year 1791, when a metallic currency was fixed in France, there has been very little variation in the exchange there. In proportion as the Bank of France endeavoured to force the circulation of its paper, it found that it was disliked; so much so, that, in the provinces, their notes are never met with of less amount than 250 francs, and, generally, not less than 500 francs; and then there is little favour shown to them. So completely are the French people satisfied with their metallic currency, and so little doubt or dispute exists on the subject, that, since the year 1791, up to last year, as I am informed, there have not been published more than five pamphlets on the subject of currency; whereas, so different is the state of the public mind in England on the subject, that Mr. Richardson, the bookseller, of Cornhill, has printed and sold no less than 2000 pamphlets on the currency question, within the last two years and a half.

I have been informed that that is a fact—2000 different publications on the subject of the currency in the course of two years and a half! Why, there is scarcely a morning in the year that we do not see or receive a new paper or publication on this subject. I am one who believe that the basis on which our circulating medium is founded is not a correct one; and I wish to know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer considers that the Committee will be at liberty to make inquiry upon this part of the subject?

I hear an Honourable Member ask whether I mean to adopt "the little shilling?" I mean no such thing; but I think it is worth while considering whether gold and silver may not be made a joint tender. Some are of opinion that such a system would lead to very beneficial results. So far am I from wishing to clip the King's money, that I have always contended against it whenever such a course has been proposed. I now go further, for I am almost a convert to the opinion, that there should be no currency but a metallic one. The ruinous events of 1825 and 1826, and of 1836 and 1837, which produced a loss to private individuals amounting to, I believe, 50,000,000*l*., convince me of the necessity of inquiring whether a metallic currency ought not to be introduced. I wish, therefore, the Right Honourable Gentleman to state his views upon this point, and also whether he proposes to inquire if the present basis on which the currency is founded be sound, or not. If such be not the Right Honourable Gentleman's intention, the proposed Committee will be as useless as the last which was appointed to inquire into the operation of joint stock banks.

Mr. GROTE. — I agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman who has brought forward this motion, that the present moment is peculiarly appropriate for the proposed inquiry. Independently of the importance and magnitude of the subject, there are, at present, circumstances of a peculiar nature which render it the bounden duty of the House to institute an inquiry. We have just escaped a serious crisis in our monetary system; and, with the events of that crisis fresh in our minds, we are bound to take the earliest opportunity of placing the currency of the country upon the safest and surest basis. I am sure that Gentlemen who have attended to the events of last year will own that, if the causes of the decline of our foreign trade had been a little more aggravated during that period, the consequence to the country would have been very serious. I think, however, that it is not advisable to introduce words into the resolution, in conformity with the suggestions of the Honourable Member behind me (Mr. Hume). Such words would be understood in a larger meaning than any which that Honourable Member intends to denote by them. The Honourable Member has argued, that the currency in France is established on a sounder basis than in this country, because a greater number of pamphlets have been published in England upon the subject of the currency. Now, I think that, when so many works are written upon a subject, there is good reason to conclude that, the most intelligent men in the country having directed their thoughts to that subject, there is greater chance of coming to a correct decision upon it than there can be in France, where no attention has been paid to it. It is not my intention to discuss the various theories which have been proposed upon the question of the currency, as I do not think the present a fitting occasion for such a discussion. If there is one benefit which is to be anticipated, more than another, from the discussions which will attend the inquiry now proposed, it will be the more accurate understanding and appreciation of what the real obligations of the Bank of England, with reference to the currency of the country, are. Scarcely two persons are agreed upon the question of what the Bank ought to do for the purpose of regulating the currency: so that, while every one is calling upon the Bank to do its duty, no one can say, with certainty, what that duty is; and the directors are held responsible for evils which, in all probability, do not arise from any mismanagement on their part. I think that, though the Bank of England may be found open to some censure, yet that it will also, by this inquiry, be rescued from a great deal of undeserved complaint; and that it will be found that a large portion of our monetary difficulties have not been of the creation of the Bank of England, though earlier and more prudential precautions on their part might have lightened them. But, if Gentlemen will feel bound to explain what they mean by the Bank of England regulating the currency, —that being understood, and that duty being imposed upon the Bank of England, — we shall be able to avoid, for the future, much of that vague declamation against the Bank of England, as a body of monopolists, by which the true merits of this question have been too often deviated from. There is another point, also, to which some attention ought to be paid, — namely, the magnitude of the Bank reserves of bullion. It would appear that each Gentleman has an imaginary standard of his own of what the amount of bullion reserved ought to be; and yet no attempts have been made to define clearly what proportion ought to exist between the liabilities and the reserves, so as to enable the public to form an intelligible opinion on the matter. I think that this good will result from the inquiry, — that it will set these points before the public in a clear and intelligible point of view. Unless the country and the Bank be made aware of the principles on which the monetary operations of the country are, in future, to be conducted, it is impossible that they can fulfil their relative duties towards each other. I think, also, that the country bankers are bound to comply with the injunctions of the Bank of England as to the supply of currency; and, unless some definite understanding shall be come to as to the principles upon which the Bank of England itself ought to go, in this matter, it will be impossible to expect any stability of system in the result. There are other points to which the Committee should direct its attention, with a view to giving a decided opinion; as, for instance, to what extent the Bank of England would be justified in administering the currency, with a view to the support and protection of trade; enlarging the currency, not according to the rules of proportion between the bullion and reserves, but as the means of preserving extensive commercial engagements from distress and ruin. I will not go into this point now; but it is one which I think the Committee should give its attention to, in order to afford to the public an intimation of the rules which should guide the Bank of England on future occasions of the kind. My Honourable Friend has complained that the previous Committees appointed on joint stock banks have led to no results. I do not think that this complaint is borne out by the fact. It was in 1832, under Lord Althorp, that the Committee on the Bank of England was appointed; and, since that period, a better system has been adopted for the management of the Bank of England than had ever existed before. On that occasion, very valuable evidence was laid before that Committee by Mr. Horsley Palmer, and other men eminently well acquainted with the monetary concerns of the country. The appendix to the Report of that Committee contained a great mass of valuable documents as to the state of the monetary circulation of the kingdom. I anticipate that the present Committee will derive great assistance from having those documents laid before them. On the former occasion, it was determined that the affairs of the Bank of England ought to be managed on a fixed system; and the attention of the Committee was directed to what that system should be. The publication of the Bank Returns was one very material point effected, on that occasion, by the labours of that Committee. With respect to the Committee now about to be appointed, I apprehend that a great number of documents will be laid before them, which will afford them the means of refuting many public errors, and eliciting many important truths, on the subject of banking. There is another point to which attention should be directed, — namely, the propriety of combining or separating the issues and deposits. This is too large a question to enter upon at present; but it is one deserving of great attention; and no doubt many arguments might be adduced on the subject. I think, whatever may be done in these matters, it will be done much more satisfactorily from being the result of an inquiry like this, than it would be otherwise. I am glad that this inquiry is not to be directed either against the Bank of England, or the joint stock banks, or the private banks. I am satisfied that much useful information will be elicited, from which all parties will derive much useful information. I shall therefore be very glad to lend my support to the Right Honourable Gentleman in voting for this Committee; and I hope it will be conducted in that fair, full, and candid spirit which the Right Honourable Gentleman has prescribed.

Mr. M. ATTWOOD. — I do not think that Banks of issue operate more upon the currency than other banks, so as to produce a prejudicial effect. A great part of the paper currency of the kingdom consists of bills of exchange not payable on demand; but payable at one, two, or three months after date. Now, this kind of circulation is capable of great extension, and is as capable of affecting the currency as the issue of promissory notes payable on demand. Thus, if we take the case of the county of Norfolk, we shall find that the paper circulation consists, nine tenths of promissory notes payable on demand, and one tenth of promissory notes not payable on demand; whilst, in the county of Lancaster, the very reverse is the case. There, nine tenths of the paper circulation consist of notes not payable on demand, and one tenth of notes payable on demand. Now, I ask whether a currency of this kind is not as capable of affecting prices and encouraging speculation as a currency consisting of notes payable on demand? I think the inquiry ought to extend to the circulation generally; and I think it will be shown to the Committee that the circulation of the country is, at one time, greatly raised, and, at another time, as greatly depressed. The Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer did that which, in his statement, he told us he would not do. He told the House that it was not his object, in proposing the Committee, to relieve himself from a difficulty by throwing the responsibility of any future measures on them: but his conduct was directly contrary to his statement; for he appears to have moved for this Committee because he found, on the part of the public, some desire for legislation on this subject. In my opinion, the Right Honourable Gentleman, on the part of the Government, is bound to propose some measure about it; for the country is quite tired of the proceedings of Committees. The Honourable Member for London has said that the Committee of 1832 did much service, in pointing out the means of avoiding danger; but yet there was a panic in 1836, and another in 1839; both of which occurred since the appointment of that Committee. It was stated by the Honourable Member that the importation of foreign corn was the cause of those panics. This assertion might be made with some show of reason as to the panic of 1839; but how can it be justified by that of 1836? There is something radically wrong in our whole system. The Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer should not include a great many subjects in his motion for a Committee, and abstain from giving any opinion, himself, on the subject of the currency. What the people of this country want, is a Government which will pledge itself to carry forward some decided measure that shall prevent the ruinous fluctuations which have taken place of late years. I very well know the difficulties that beset the question; but nothing short of a decided measure will satisfy the country.

Mr. CLAY. — I quite agree with my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that, generally speaking, the Government should not shift the responsibility of any change in the monetary system of the country, upon any Committee; but still I think the subject is one which it is particularly proper to refer to the investigation of a Committee. I differ from the Honourable Member for Whitehaven, in the opinion that useful results have not been obtained from inquiries of this nature. In the first place, let me tell him, that the appointment of this Committee is in conformity with precedent. All the great alterations which have been made in our monetary system were preceded by the inquiries of Committees. I need only refer to the analogous Committees of 1810, 1819, 1826, and again, that of 1832, which preceded the renewal of the Bank of England's charter. I am disposed to think that the Legislature were right in the course they adopted on those occasions; for if there is any question which it would be difficult to handle in discussions in this House, it is a question connected with an alteration of the currency. I believe that, within the last few years, public opinion has been taking a right direction, with respect to this question; but still I do not believe that there is a sufficient concurrence of opinion on the subject, or that the country is prepared for legislation upon it, without previous inquiry. The Honourable Member for Whitehaven has said that there is something radically wrong in the monetary system of this country; and I agree with him. But the solution of that problem is not so easy as the Honourable Member imagines; for it has occupied between twenty and thirty years of the experience and attention of the two greatest commercial countries in the world, — England and America, — and it has not been satisfactorily solved as yet. With respect to the Bill of 1819, brought in by the Honourable Member opposite, it has ever engaged my approbation. I have never heard anything deserving the name of argument to show that any of the evils, which are attributed to it, have followed from that measure. In that measure, we carried out the principle of the legal and immediate convertibility of paper. In 1826, a violent crisis took place; subsequently, in 1837 and 1839, panics occurred in the country; and with all our experience, and though we had a wealthy and powerful bank, exercising a large control, we were, nevertheless, unable to solve the problem to which the Honourable Member has alluded. America pursued a system opposite to ours: — there there are no private banks, but many joint stock banks, eminently powerful and wealthy, and conducted on sound principles; and yet America has not escaped a crisis even more alarming and mischievous than ours. I do not express any opinion on the subject; but I think that it is a fit one to be referred to a Committee. I do not see how it will be possible, without preliminary inquiry, to bring forward any measure, with respect to our monetary system, with any chance of such measure proving satisfactory. The history of the last five years is full of instruction; and one result of this Committee will be, that it will enable us to put on record the principal facts connected with the changes that have taken place during that period. On those grounds, I think the Government are justified in not attempting any change in the monetary system of the country, until after previous inquiry. The Honourable Member for Carlow has said that banks of deposit, as well as banks of issue, should be included in the inquiry; but, for all practical purposes, they are so included, as the Report of the Joint Stock Bank Committee will be referred to the present Committee, on their appointment. To go, however, as far as the Honourable Member wishes, would be to make the motion too vast and too unwieldy. I disagree with the Honourable Member for Whitehaven, that joint stock bank Committees have led to no results; on the contrary, they have produced the most beneficial results, by communicating information on the subject of banking, until our times generally unknown. I anticipate that the labours of the present Committee will be attended with the best effects; and that we shall legislate with more advantage after the inquiry, than we could without it.

SIR R. PEEL.—Sir, I think the utility of the Committee will entirely and exclusively depend on the manner in which it will be conducted. It is very easy to say, "there ought to be a full and comprehensive inquiry;" but I can easily conceive that such an inquiry may be made so full and comprehensive as to be rendered of no practical value. It is easy to encumber a Committee with details, and to overwhelm it with minute particulars; but these are not what is wanted. What we want is, to appoint a Committee, and to conduct its inquiries into subjects which will repay the trouble and attention to be bestowed on them. For instance: one of the chief objects of the Committee should be an inquiry into the probable state of the circulation at the expiration of the Bank charter, and to ascertain what directing power should be substituted in place of that body, so as to occasion as little confusion as possible. It is quite evident that this is one subject which practically leads to most important considerations, in connection with the circulation; and that, therefore, it should be attended to with the greatest care. If the inquiry undertaken by the Committee be of a vague and general and desultory nature, then I predict that its results will not be attended to, and the attendance of Members will be limited; and the commercial portion of the community will be quite dissatisfied with it. But if the Committee of 1832 be taken as an example, — if the statements of such persons as Mr. Horsley Palmer, and others well informed respecting the intentions of the Bank of England on that occasion (to divide its capital into three parts, of which one third was to be bullion), be made a basis on which to ground your inquiries, — then you will be entitled to the praise of having proceeded to work in a practical way; and the probability is, that you will arrive at some important results. If, however, you extend your inquiry into matters minute and trifling, as compared with the great subjects you are called on to deal with, — if you go into the particulars of the management of this or that bank, as the Joint Stock Bank Committee did; or as to how this bank or the other was conducted, — then, let me tell you, that your inquiry will be fruitless, and that your labour will lead to no useful result. Inquire, if you will, — and I think it is a subject which will well repay inquiry, — into the nature and effects of limited responsibility in banks of issue, as compared with unlimited responsibility. Let us exhaust that subject before we begin another; and we shall have done good service to the country at large, if we only deal with that one topic. But let us not confound ourselves in the labyrinth of minute details and petty particulars; or, as I have said, we shall only encumber ourselves in our course, and end without advantage to any party. The terms of the motion answer the views of the Honourable Member for Carlow, and fairly open the subject which he wishes to have investigated. He says that some joint stock banks are banks of issue for the Bank of England, emitting its notes, while they profess to be only banks of deposit. I think that is a very proper subject for inquiry; and, as I have said, the terms of the motion embrace it. As you do admit inquiry into the conduct of the Bank of England, you must, also, by a parity of proceeding, admit it into the conduct of those banks which issue its notes, whatever their ostensible form may be.

It appears to me that every act of the Bank of England, with respect to the circulation, is included in the terms of this motion; and, therefore, that every act of its agents is equally included. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny purposes to extend this inquiry into the basis of the currency. "I would go," says the Honourable Gentleman, "further than the present currency;" but, in my opinion, you cannot think for a moment of superadding such onerous duties to those already apportioned to the Committee, without materially impairing its possible efficiency. You cannot, moreover, extend your inquiries into the state of the currency without leading the public at large to believe that the mind of Parliament is not yet made up on the subject, but that it is in a state of vacillation, uncertainty, and doubt. And, however cogent may be the reasons, or however plausible the arguments adduced, in favour of such an extension of the powers of the Committee, in favour of such an inquiry, I, for one, will not agree to it; because I look upon it that Parliament, in 1819, solemnly adopted the present metallic currency as the currency of the kingdom, and that it should not now be changed. If you consent to such an inquiry, you will unsettle the public faith in your stability of purpose, and you will leave an impression on the public mind that your acts are not permanent or lasting on subjects the most important to the welfare of the country. I hope, therefore, that the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will never consent to such a course as that suggested. But the Honourable Member "would go farther," as he says, "than those who support the present metallic standard." He would abolish, in short, the whole paper currency. Surely the Honourable Gentleman cannot have given the subject a moment's consideration, or he never would make such an absurd statement. You may abolish 1*l.* notes and 2*l.* notes, and, if you will, 5*l.* notes; but you cannot abolish the paper currency of the country, do what you will, unless you at the same time determine to destroy public credit. What is a promissory note? A paper promising to pay twenty sovereigns at a given time and place. How will you abolish this kind of circulating medium? If you abolish paper currency, you must abolish promissory notes; and, if you abolish promissory notes, what becomes of commercial credit? In fact, Sir, it is utterly impossible to do as the Honourable Gentleman desires, without reverting to the first principles of traffic among barbarous nations, — the practice of exchange and barter. It is therefore I say that the Honourable Gentleman could not have considered his observation when he made it. There is great truth in the remarks of my Honourable Friend, that the prices of articles are not affected by paper, payable on demand, but by other paper, also. But to entertain that question would lead the Committee into an interminable labyrinth of inquiry, altogether beside its present purpose. If it be found desirable, hereafter, to extend the limits set to the inquiry by the motion, then it will be better that the Committee should call for extended powers, rather than that the House should impose on them, in the beginning of their labours, a task the end of which cannot be foreseen, and the difficulty of which is almost insuperable. I think, as I have said, it is far better that the Committee should address itself to one subject at a time, — for instance, the way in which the circulation is affected by the issue of notes payable on demand, — than embarrass itself with a variety of topics. That is one of the most important topics that can come before it; as is also the question of the difference between banks of issue and banks of deposit. These questions will force themselves on the Committee, and it will be well that they should deal with them first. The Honourable Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny aims at the introduction of a system of currency in this country similar to that of France; in which so large a portion of the precious metals is employed. Now, I do not think that it would be possible to establish that plan, without effecting a great change both in our mercantile and financial relations. But this discussion is rather premature. It will be time enough to enter into it when we have the question of the settlement of the Bank charter before us. Then its discussion may be useful; but such a system argued in reference to joint stock banks can do no good. I trust that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the representative of the Government, will, in the first instance, direct the attention of the Committee to one great practical object.

otherwise, I would, for my own part, infinitely rather the Government would undertake the settlement of these questions, than leave them to a Committee; which, in the hour of trial, would leave all the responsibility to fall upon Government, and shrink from action when it might be most necessary, and when it might be most usefully existed.

Mr. C. WOOD.—I do not concur in the opinion that the currency of this country could be conducted with the same proportion of the precious metals as is the case in France. On the contrary, I believe it would be impossible to carry on the circulation of this great country without a large proportion of paper. As to putting down the 5*l.* and 10*l.* notes, I, for my part, do not consider such a measure desirable. I do not think that the absence of pamphlets, with respect to the currency n France, is any proof of the superiority of the monetary system of that country. Opinions, the most various and contradictory, certainly, are to be found in pamphlets published at this side of the water; some stating that the issues of the Bank of England regulate all prices throughout he country, and cause the fluctuations n the currency; others, asserting directly he reverse:—a conflict of opinion which proves the great necessity for an inquiry nto the state of the currency,—which, however, I think ought to be limited to he date of 1832. I think that the inquiry, hus limited, could not fail to lead to the most valuable results. The Right Honourable Gentleman (Sir R. Peel) has suggested, that it would be useful for the Committee to inquire how far the Bank of England has departed from the rules aid down for its guidance in 1832. I hink that nobody can deny that the Bank has deviated from those rules. Nobody can ook at the Bank Returns without being convinced of this fact. The Returns do not give the information that is required; and it would be of great importance that we should have before us the experience of the last five years, from which, no doubt, the most useful lessons might be derived. It would be of importance that he inquiry respecting those years should be made whilst the facts are fresh, and when the necessary evidence could be easily procured. I believe the inquiry will lead to the most practical results. I believe it will be beneficial to the Bank of England itself, and will relieve it from many of those imputations that have been cast upon it; and I believe, also, that it will be beneficial to private banks, as affording hem information as to the principles on which the operations of the Bank of England are conducted. I agree with the Honourable Member for the Tower Hamlets, that all the great improvements that have taken place in the circulation have proceeded from Committees of this House. I am sure that when, on sufficient investigation, all the facts are established, the members of the Committee will carry to those facts the application of the most enlightened principles.

Mr. HAWES.—I hope that this inquiry will be of a thoroughly practical character. However, the tendency of the speech of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, as well as of the terms of the motion, go to limit the inquiry, in my opinion, somewhat too strictly. I think it will be impossible to shut out from the inquiry, not only the general question of the currency, but one or two collateral questions. I think it will be quite impossible to shut out of any general inquiry into the currency a parallel one into the condition of the law of partnership, to enable us to come at just conclusions with respect either to the banks of issue or of deposit. I think that the pamphlets by Tooke, by H. Palmer, by Jones Loyd, and by Ricardo, contain much sound and valuable information, and comprise nearly as much as a Committee would be able to attain by the most industrious inquiry. The question of a single bank of issue, is one of great importance; and it is of moment to consider thoroughly the points whether it is to be independent of Government, and what privileges it is to be allowed. As to the high prices of gold at times, I do not see why the loss should fall on the public, or a bank of issue, instead of on the persons who want it. Though I am inclined, perhaps, to regret that the information which has already been acquired in investigations before various Committees, has not been thought sufficient to justify legislation; still, however, the inconvenience of further delay will, probably, be well purchased by the result.

Mr. HUME.—I think that the Right Honourable Baronet (Sir R. Peel) has mistaken my meaning with respect to the basis of the currency. What I said was, that we ought to return nearer to a bullion currency than we are. In the present circumstances of the country, it is by no means my wish to see a wholly metallic currency.

Mr. E. TURNER.—For my part, Sir, I believe that it would be quite impossible to come to a gold currency. I believe that any attempts to do so must necessarily fail. The wants of the country are such, that it would be quite impossible to come to a gold currency, or to supply the demands of a metallic circulating medium. I feel inclined to attribute much of the difficulties that have arisen to the jealousies existing between joint stock banks and the Bank of England. I anticipate the most important results from this inquiry; and I trust it will be conducted in such a way as to lead to a practical result.

SIR JOHN RAE REID.—I did not intend to trouble the House with any observations on this occasion; and I should have adhered to that intention, but for what has been stated by the Honourable Member, as to the existence of jealousies on the part of the Bank of England. I beg to assure the House that there exists no jealousy on the part of the Bank of England towards the joint stock banks; and that the Bank of England will go into an inquiry with the greatest pleasure, confident that many erroneous impressions will thereby be removed, and that the public will be all the better satisfied with the Bank of England. I will not, now, enter into any discussion of the question, as I merely rose in consequence of the observation to which I have alluded.

Mr. SLANEY.—It will be matter of congratulation to the country, that this Committee is to be appointed. I hope that measures will be considered in the Committee by which banks of issue may be obliged to provide some sort of security that their notes are good; whether this shall be done by means of deposits, or of certain and periodical Returns. For want of some test of this kind, very great inconvenience has been felt, especially among the humbler classes. In districts of the country where the notes of the Bank of England, and those of private and joint stock banks, are circulating together, it is impossible for the people to refuse to take those notes; and it is impossible for the people to tell whether the notes they take may be worth 20*s*. or not. I think that this matter would be worthy of notice in the Committee.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON.—I think the Honourable Member has overrated the matter. It appears to me, that since the extinction of the 1*l*. notes, the humbler classes have been relieved from any material suffering on this account. Indeed, I almost think that no receiver or holder of notes has suffered at all, during the last two crises. It is shareholders in banks who have felt the evil. This question, therefore, it is not necessary, in my opinion, to submit to the Committee.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—Though, upon the motion for the appointment of a Committee, the discussion is not, of course, so full as it might be under other circumstances, yet the country may fairly congratulate itself on the spirit that has been shown throughout this debate; and they may fairly anticipate what may be expected in the Committee. I do not want to open the question of the standard of currency, in any reference to the Committee. That has been already decided in Earl Spencer's time, and, as an honest man, I could not wish to re-open it. I would rather not leave the inquiry open to be extended to matters which would be interminable. I would rather the Committee would apply for further powers, if they felt they wanted them; and those powers, I am satisfied, the House could not refuse to grant. I have nothing more to say than to express my satisfaction at the manner in which the discussion has been conducted.

The motion was then agreed to.

POOR LAW (IRELAND).

Mr. W. S. O'BRIEN.—It was my intention to have moved for certain Returns respecting the Act for the relief of the Irish Poor, but the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland has assured me that the information I want will be contained in the Report of the Poor Law Commissioners for Ireland, which will be placed on the table by the 1st of May. I shall therefore, at present, content myself by moving for "a Return, showing whether any application has been made by the Poor Law Commissioners, for the purpose of ascertaining the opinions of the respective boards of guardians, in regard to the propriety of enacting a law for the suppression of mendicancy and vagrancy; and what has, in each case, been the result of such application."

The motion was agreed to, and the Return ordered.

THE CASE OF FROST, WILLIAMS, AND JONES.

Mr. LEADER.—I beg leave, Sir, to present the following petitions, in favour of a free pardon to the prisoners Frost, Williams, and Jones, now on their way to Van Diemen's Land, — from Stoke upon Trent; Newport, Monmouth (two petitions); Shelton; Fenton; Longton; Hanley; Tunstall; Burslem; St. John, Westminster; Tredegar and Sirhowy; Girvan; Saint Pancras; Finsbury; Saint Leonard, Shoreditch; Bath (chairman); Glasgow (chairman); Patrick (chairman); Westminster; Brighton (chairman); George Loveless, and others, the Dorchester labourers, who state that they consider the punishment of transportation for life to be an infliction worse than death itself: from Smithfield Bars (chairman); John Templer; and John Frost.

The petitions were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LEADER. — I now rise, Sir, to bring forward the motion of which I have given notice, and, in the present state of the House, I shall make my statement as brief as possible. I appeal to the House in behalf of these prisoners, not on account of any sympathy which I feel in their recent conduct, — not upon the merits of their case,— but because I think that the law has been strained against the prisoners, and that, there being a doubt in the case, that doubt ought to have been — but has not been— interpreted in their favour. The strong feeling which exists in this country upon this subject is evidenced by the number of petitions, which, with those presented to-night, amount to upwards of 100, with an aggregate of 120,000 signatures; many of them, too, it is to be remembered, having been signed only by the chairman, on behalf of large public meetings in Glasgow and in other great towns. I am ready to admit that this feeling does not prevail, perhaps, to any very great extent, in the higher or middle classes; but amongst the working classes, it does prevail very extensively; not because they sympathise with Frost, in his attempt, but because they believe that the law has been strained against him. I ask the House, therefore, to consider the case on the broad constitutional ground of having the law strictly and literally administered, as it is written and laid down, and not merely as expounded by the judges, called on to give their opinions upon this case. It is a part of the law of treason, that a copy of the indictment, and a copy of the list of witnesses, shall be delivered together to the prisoner, a certain time before the trial; and it is notorious that, in the present case, the copy of the indictment was delivered at one time, and the copy of the list of witnesses at another. To this, it has been answered, that it was a circumstance of no consequence, and that the prisoners were not injured thereby; because, although one list was delivered before the other, both were delivered in full time to give the prisoners all the benefit which the Act intended to give them; and I understand that the objection was treated by the Attorney General as one of a very light and trivial character. But the law of treason, according to my view of it, is meant as a protection to the subject against the persecution of arbitrary or despotic Governments; and if these points of form are not to be strictly adhered to, the whole law may be frittered away, and any of us be, at any time, at the mercy of an arbitrary Government, which could strain the law against individuals who might be obnoxious to it. Thus, instead of the law being strictly and impartially administered, we should soon have a sort of judge-made law. It is not denied that the copy of the indictment and the lists of witnesses were badly and improperly delivered; and nine out of the fifteen judges allowed that the objection was valid, though they, at the same time, decided that it was not made in time. Then, if that be the case, it is undeniable, I contend, that the prisoners were tried sooner than they ought to have been, and that, therefore, they were illegally convicted. But it is urged, that, even if the objection had been taken in time, the trial would have been put off; and the only result would have been, that the men would have been convicted a few days later. But is such an argument to be allowed in a case where the lives and property of men are at stake? Am I to be told that it makes no difference whether a man is tried for high treason ten days earlier than he ought to be? I beg to remind the House, that, in that interval, the public panic might subside; men's minds might become more calm; and that feeling of revenge, than which nothing is more cruel, by which frightened cowards are generally influenced, might entirely disappear; besides which, a material witness might die, and the prosecution might fail. The only court before which these three prisoners could be tried was that composed of the three judges named in the commission. Those three judges were sent down to Newport; and the objection to which I have referred was raised; and I have been told that the custom in such cases is, if they do not agree, to overrule the objection at the time, and then refer it to the rest of the judges. That course has been adopted, and nine out of the fifteen judges have thought it a valid objection; but there are also nine out of the fifteen who have thought that it was not taken in time. Of the six who thought that it was taken in time, there were two out of the three judges who tried the prisoners. I have been told, by lawyers of the greatest authority, that the prisoners might have insisted on having the objection decided at the trial; and it seems to me only reasonable and just, that they should either have had power to insist upon that, or, that they should, at all events, have the benefit of the opinion of the three judges who tried the cause separate from that of the rest of the judges. The three judges named in the commission were not bound to adopt the opinion of the other judges; and judges in such cases only say, that they will consult their learned brethren. It has always appeared to me a great defect in our law, that there is no court of appeal in criminal cases. This system of reference to the fifteen judges, merely produces an extra-judicial opinion, which ought not to overrule, as it has in this case, the opinion of that court before which prisoners are tried. It is true, that, in cases of treason, the Crown may grant a pardon, on the judges advising that the objection raised is a valid objection; but it requires an Act of Parliament to remove the attaint; and the Crown cannot grant that. Now, I have been told by the learned counsel for the prisoners, that it was clearly understood at the trial, that the prisoners should be placed in no worse position than if the objection had been then and there decided. That has been stated to me by the learned counsel for the prisoners; at all events, I have so understood them. I regret that they are not now in their places here, that I might appeal to them for confirmation. And how can it be said that the prisoners have not been placed in a worse position? This subject, too, possesses an importance beyond that attached to the particular case; because the working classes will lose all confidence in the law, unless they believe that it is in all cases literally and strictly interpreted; and in this instance, I repeat, there prevails a strong opinion amongst them, that it has been strained against these prisoners, and that they have been punished more with reference to the great guilt of their attempt, and the mischief that would be caused by it, than in accordance with the strict interpretation of the law. What, I ask, can possibly be more mischievous, than such a notion as this gaining ground among the working classes?

It has been said, that to pardon these men would cause great mischief in the country, and add to the violence that has already been perpetrated; but, on the contrary, I believe that it would have the effect of putting down all violence,—that the moral effect of such a course upon the working classes would be such as would be calculated, more than anything else, to suppress all attempts at violence upon their part. I have heard it stated elsewhere, that, after the point had been decided, the Cabinet determined that the men should be hanged; and that it was only upon a re-consideration of the point of law, that a commutation of the sentence was decided on. But if that argument be good for anything, it goes to the full extent of a free pardon. If the consideration of a point of law could have influenced the decision of the Government at all, it ought to have done so in favour of the entire pardon of the prisoners. What is transportation for life? In my opinion, there is very little to choose between transportation for life and hanging; and having sat upon the Committee of Inquiry into the transportation system, and been made acquainted with its horrors, I hesitate whether I should not say that transportation for life is a worse punishment than instant death; for, in the former case, the man has nothing to look forward to but death, after years of torture,—perhaps not so bad as that which used to be inflicted under the Holy Inquisition in Spain, but, at all events, the most terrible which, in modern times, can be inflicted upon human nature,—torture, indeed, so great, that many prisoners in Norfolk Island have killed each other, or committed suicide, rather than endure it. And this it is to which, in our mercy, we have condemned these men, after having had it admitted that a doubt upon a point of law justified a commutation of their sentence. I shall be told, perhaps, that the House of Commons is not the proper place for the discussion of such a question; but it is the only place to which these parties, who feel themselves aggrieved, can come for redress; and, beyond all question, it is just as consistent with justice, that this House should address the Queen upon this as upon any other subject. There is no doubt that the feeling which prevails among the working classes is very strong upon this subject: but I believe that, if the Government had taken a middle course, they would have considered that the prisoners had had far greater justice done them than they now look upon them as having received. Why should not the Government have come to an agreement with the prisoners in this way, and have said, "You are in our power; we can order you to be executed; but if you consent to leave the country, we shall be satisfied;"—because the only desire among the middle classes was to get rid of these men, in order that they might be the cause of no more mischief, although, no doubt, there were some who were sorry that they were not executed. This sanguinary disposition, however, I am sure, was confined to a very few individuals; as the people, in general, would only, unquestionably, have been satisfied with getting the prisoners fairly out of this country. In conclusion, then, Sir, I have only to say, that I have been very anxious to bring this matter forward much earlier, and certainly before the prisoners had left these shores for Van Diemen's Land; but I have postponed it several times, in consequence of a request which the legal advisers of the prisoners made to me, stating that negotiations were pending between the Government and themselves, with which this motion might interfere. A great deal of misrepresentation has gone abroad on the subject: I believe the learned counsel have been accused of not urging the case of their clients as much as they ought to have done. But I entirely acquit them of such a charge; I have never made any such accusation, but I have myself, also, been accused of not having done my best to bring forward the subject. All I can say is, that I have done what I considered to be best, and what I have been advised to do by the most experienced of my friends, with respect to bringing the subject forward, in order that the prisoners might have the benefit of any doubt raised in this House. I have, now, only to move, "that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased, under the special circumstances of the case, to grant a free pardon to Frost, Williams, and Jones."

Mr. HUME. — In rising, Sir, to second the motion of my Honourable Friend, I will, at the outset, state that I do so, not on the merits of the case itself, because I consider that the crime of these men has been most detrimental to the country and to the cause of public liberty in general; and that, so far as their offence is concerned, they have decidedly merited the fate they have met with. But, Sir, there prevails a great impression abroad, that, in this case, the parties have not been treated in the same manner as others have been in cases of high treason; and I believe and hope that, in the course of this discussion, we shall hear something stated that will be calculated to remove this impression; for nothing can possibly be worse for the country than anything which tends to bring the administration of justice into discredit. The ground of the complaint against the Government in this case is, that, a Commission having been appointed to try these prisoners, the usual legal forms were not attended to, and the lists of witnesses not delivered in, in proper time. I am told that it is not usual for a criminal case of this sort to be referred to the fifteen judges; but that the judges at the trial should give their opinion upon any objection taken.

Now, another feature of the ground of complaint is, that two out of the three judges who tried the case stated that the prisoners would not be in a worse position than before the trial. It is also alleged, that two of those judges have recommended the removal of the criminal punishment. The answer of the bench to Sir F. Pollock certainly was, that these men should not be in a worse position; and we have the avowal of the Marquess of Normanby, that, but for this opinion of the judges, they would have been hanged. If, then, the Secretary of State thought that the objection which was taken was of sufficient importance to justify the removal of the capital punishment, why, let me ask, should not these men have been pardoned? If I am correct in the facts I have alluded to, I can have no hesitation in saying, that, if these men were entitled to the remission of the capital punishment, they were also entitled to a full and free pardon. With respect to an Address to Her Majesty, there cannot, possibly, be a subject of greater importance than this, on which to adopt such a recommendation; and I should certainly wish that the impression which has taken so strong a hold of the public mind should be communicated to Her Majesty in such a manner as to insure her gracious attention. We are without any knowledge of what took place at the meeting of the fifteen judges; and, independently of this, I am given to understand that this is the only case of high treason in which a reference to the whole of the judges was ever made. Coupling this with the fact of two out of three of the judges who tried the prisoners having morally acquitted them, I confess that I am at a loss to determine on what ground the Secretary of State should conclude that such a combination of circumstances favourable to these men ought not to have led to an entire acquittal. There is, also, another objection which I have to make to the course which has been adopted; it is, that such a proceeding appears to me to involve the establishment of a very bad precedent; and for this reason, that the result of it will be, that cases will arise in which judges, not having the courage to act on their own judgment, will not like to take upon themselves the responsibility of condemning a prisoner; but will, on the contrary, endeavour to shift it from their own shoulders to that of the fifteen. I say, then, that this alone is enough to show the danger of establishing a precedent like this, — a precedent upon which many a really innocent man might be considered guilty. Besides, if this sort of reference is to be made in one case, why not in all? And what, under such a system, would speedily be the state of the criminal law of this country? The grounds, then, Sir, on which I support this motion, are these: — that, a Commission having been appointed to try these men, an objection to the legality of the proceedings was taken at the trial; that that objection was taken in time, according to the opinion of six of the judges; and that, as it appears that two out of the three judges that presided at the trial were among the six who were of that opinion, these men ought to have been acquitted. These, I know, are the opinions of a great body of the people; and if I am correct — and I am open to contradiction from any Honourable Gentleman if I am not — in these statements, I must maintain that a pardon, and not a punishment, ought to have been the portion of these prisoners. I am sorry to have detained the House so long; but I still more regret that any necessity should have arisen for a motion like that which I now beg to second.

Question put.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I am extremely sorry to have to address the House on a motion of this sort; and I deeply regret that the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Westminster should have thought it right to make this House a court of appeal from that tribunal from which he has declared that no appeal exists. The Honourable Member has laid aside, entirely, all reference to the prerogative of mercy as exercised by the Crown; and states, that what he seeks is an act of right and justice to these individuals. The Honourable Gentleman has said that these three individuals have been tried for a political offence. Now, in my mind, the crimes with which they were charged were not mere political offences, but deserve a much stronger name; inasmuch as the object which they had in view was, to overturn the whole system of society in this country; and, by an act of violence, to strike at the very root of the constitution under which we live. A preliminary objection was taken at the trial, to the extent that the forms of the law of treason had not been fulfilled. It was urged that the delivery of the copy of the indictment, and of the lists of witnesses, was not simultaneous. This point was referred to the three judges at the Commission; and it is stated that two out of those three judges entertained an opinion that the objection raised was a valid objection, and that, entertaining such an opinion, they ought to have decided the point on the spot, and in favour of the prisoners, giving them the benefit of the objection. Now, it appears to me, that the very fact of the judges having declined to decide the question upon the instant, shows that a great doubt existed in their minds, and that they were anxious to have the opinion of the rest of the judges before an ultimate decision was given upon it: they consequently reserved the point. It has been stated that this is not the usual practice in cases of treason. I shall probably, however, be followed by others who are more conversant with the law than I can be, and who will inform the House correctly upon that point; but I apprehend it will be found that the usual legal forms have not, in this instance, been departed from; but that the judges gave the prisoners all the advantages that could be derived from the objection that was raised in their favour. This is made perfectly clear from the narrative of the trial, which the House is familiar with, and from which it appears that, in reply to the question put to the court by the prisoners' counsel (Sir F. Pollock), the Chief Justice stated, that the common course taken at assizes was, to reserve any difficult point in which an objection might be raised for the opinion of the fifteen judges in London; and said that, if the point in the present case were decided by the fifteen judges in favour of the prisoners, they would thereby be placed in the same position in which they would be, in case the point were decided at the trial; but he also added, that, in case the point were decided in their favour, it would not have the effect of giving the prisoners a verdict of acquittal, but merely of postponing the trial until the forms of the law of treason should have been properly and legally gone through. I will not, however, go into the whole case; but confine myself, as I think I shall be more justified in doing, to that portion of the circumstances which relates more particularly to the department with which I have the honour to be connected. The first intimation which my Noble Friend at the head of the Home department had, of the decision of the fifteen judges, was a letter from the Chief Justice, which stated, that the argument in the three cases of Frost, Williams, and Jones had closed, and that the judges had come to a determination on the two questions reserved for their opinions. That letter was to the following effect:—

Westminster Hall, 28th January, 1840.

My Lord,— I have the honour to inform your Lordship that the argument upon the three cases of the Queen v. Frost, the Queen v. Williams, and the Queen v. Jones closed this afternoon, and that the judges, after considering the subject, have come to the following determination upon the two questions which have been argued before them; namely:—

First, a majority of the judges, in the proportion of nine to six, are of opinion that the delivery of the list of witnesses was not a good delivery in point of law.

But, secondly, a majority of the judges, in the proportion of nine to six, are of opinion that the objection to the delivery of the list of witnesses was not taken in due time.

All the judges agreed, that if the objection had been made in due time, the effect of it would have been a postponement of the trial, in order to give time for a proper delivery of the list.

The result, therefore, of the determination of the judges is, that the conviction is right.

I will have the honour of calling on your Lordship to-morrow at the rising of the court, if I should receive any intimation to that effect.

I have the honour to remain,
My Lord,
Your Lordship's faithful and obedient servant,
N. C. TINDAL.
The Lord Marquess of Normanby,
&c. &c. &c.

Such was the result, then, of the resolution to which the fifteen judges came; and, when the House considers the terms of it, and what would have been the consequence of their decision having been in favour of the prisoners, I think it will agree with me, that the objection of the Honourable Gentleman who has made this motion, as to their being tried ten days sooner or later, carries with it very little weight. Upon the trial of the prisoners, an objection was raised, that they had not had sufficient time to be prepared for it; but, I must say, that I have not yet seen or heard anything to induce me to believe that they would have been a whit more prepared afterwards, than they were at the time this objection was made. But, Sir, this is not all; for, in addition to this, the learned counsel for the prisoners had put in a memorial, in which all was stated, in effect, which has been stated, this evening, by the Honourable Member for Westminster; and to that memorial, the judges gave a clear, distinct, and conclusive answer, and which I will read to the House. The answer to that memorial was in the following terms:—

Westminster Hall, Jan. 31. 1840.

My Lord,—We have perused and considered the memorial of Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Kelly, counsel for the prisoner John Frost, who was tried under the late special commission at Monmouth, and beg to inform your Lordship, that the memorial appears to us to be founded upon an entire misconception of the law relating to the course of proceeding in criminal cases; and, so far as we the judges under the special commission are concerned, an entire misapprehension of the fact.

As to the law, the uniform practice has been, so far back as we have any means of knowledge, that if the judge upon the trial of an indictment feels any serious doubt as to an objection that occurs in point of law, he decides the point against the prisoner, and allows the trial to proceed; reserving such point of law, in order that he may take the advice and opinion of all the other judges thereon. After consulting them, and hearing argument thereon (if thought necessary), the opinion of the judges is taken; and that of the majority binds the judge who has reserved the question. If that opinion should be against the prisoner, the law is suffered to take its course, and the sentence which has been passed remains. If the opinion of the judges is in favour of the prisoner, the constant course is for the judge who tried the prisoner, and passed the sentence, to apply to the Secretary of State for a free pardon. And this course in no way depends on any consent, expressed or implied, on the part of the prisoner; the judge pursues it at his own discretion, and decides the point, for the present, against the prisoner, giving him the benefit of further consideration and advice with the other judges. And this course is pursued for the manifest purpose of preventing a failure of justice, inasmuch as if the judge decided under his immediate impression, supposing it to be in favour of the prisoner, and directed an acquittal, there could be no new trial, although, upon reference to the other judges, his own opinion was held to be wrong. On the other hand, if the opinion of the judge is at the time unfavourable to the prisoner, it can be reserved by that course, and, if erroneous, set right.

With respect to the statement in the memorial of what took place at the trial, so far as relates to ourselves, we cannot but remark that the learned counsel labour under a complete misapprehension; at which we are the more surprised, as we expressly stated that no distinction would be made between this and other cases tried at the assizes, but that it must follow the ordinary course.

At the time of the discussion, we all of us entertained serious doubts, more or less strong, on the objection that was raised before us. And if the law had obliged us to come to an immediate and final decision, without the power of consulting the judges, which the law does not, we were not prepared, without much further consideration, nor without hearing the argument on the part of the Crown concluded, to come to any determination on the point. We, therefore, following the ordinary course pursued on similar occasions, decided the point against the prisoner, by allowing the trial to proceed, subject to the revision before referred to.

We beg to inform your Lordship that we think the circumstance stated and relied on in the memorial, namely, that two of the judges under the special commission ultimately declared their opinion in favour of the objection, does, in our judgment, make no difference whatever; nor do we think that any inclination in their minds at the time of the trial ought to affect the question: the law is taken from the majority of the judges when consulted.

It is needless to state to your Lordship, that as to any of the communications with, or understanding between, the learned counsel and the prisoner, which are stated at length in the memorial, we are entirely ignorant.

Under the circumstances above mentioned, we beg leave to represent to your Lordship, that, in our opinion, there is no ground whatever to entitle the prisoner, John Frost, to a free pardon.

N. E. Tindal.
J. Parke.
J. Williams.

To the Lord Marquess of Normanby, &c.

Under these circumstances, my Noble Friend the Secretary of State felt that he had but one course to pursue, — namely, to consider that the verdict passed against Frost and the two other prisoners was a right verdict, in point of law, and that the sentence passed upon them was the sentence which the law awarded to the offence of which they had been found guilty: and, without entering into the grounds upon which my Noble Friend came to the conclusion of so far recommending the Royal clemency, I can only say, that those who attribute any other motives to the application of the Royal clemency than those of vindicating the law of the land, on a crime of such magnitude, are completely mistaken. For my own part, the more I consider the circumstances of the offence of these individuals, the more I think that they and their families ought to consider, that to be allowed to go into banishment with their lives, which were forfeited to the country, is as much as they could reasonably expect. With regard to what has fallen from the Honourable Member for Westminster, with reference to the views of these unhappy men, as to the commutation of their sentence, I can only say that, in my short experience in dealing with criminal sentences, I have never yet seen an instance in which any man stated he would rather be executed than have his sentence commuted to transportation; and I have never known an instance in which the family of an individual, standing in the awful predicament of a capital convict, did not feel deeply grateful for such a commutation. In conclusion, I have only to add, that I think the remarks which have fallen from the Honourable Member for Westminster, on this point, do not tend much to support the arguments which were urged in favour of the motion of the Honourable Member for Wigan, the other night, the object of which was, the abolition of capital punishment; and that, on the grounds to which I have referred, I feel bound to give this motion that opposition which I certainly consider it calls for.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — Although there is much in the argument which has just been addressed to the House by the Honourable Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Home Department, still I must say, Sir, that, in the concluding part of his speech, he has mixed up feelings of pity with points of law in a manner of which I cannot but disapprove. If this was a mere question of crime, and not one of law, I should be prepared to say that there never were criminals whose lives were more justly forfeited to the offended laws of their country than the individuals whose case has now been brought under the consideration of the House. But this is not a question of crime, but of law; and if there is one thing of more importance than another, in discussing such a question, it is, that the crime of these individuals, and the question as to the impartial administration of justice, should be kept distinct and separate; and I cannot help remarking, that I think it was not only due to their unhappy clients, but also to this House, that those Honourable and Learned Members who were counsel for these men should have endeavoured to have been present, here, to-night, in order to have guided us towards the formation of a proper and just opinion upon this case. The Honourable Gentleman the Under Secretary of State has told us that it could be a matter of very little signification to these prisoners whether they were tried ten days sooner or later; but, if so, why, I would ask, was the statute of Anne passed? Why should not the prisoners, even now, have the benefit of that statute? I maintain that the language of the 7th of Anne, c. 12., with regard to the delivery of copies of indictments, and lists of witnesses in cases of high treason, is so clear, that I am utterly at a loss to discover how any man can possibly misunderstand it. It is so clear, that, in order to understand it, a reference to Dr. Johnson's Dictionary is only necessary, and recourse to the opinions of the fifteen judges altogether superfluous. I defy any man to say that the words "at the same time" can, by any construction that can be put on them, mean "at a different time;" and that the time at which the copy of the indictment, and that at which the list of witnesses was delivered, in this case, was according to the sole and simple meaning of these words, — "one and the same time." The meaning of the statute is so plain, that the feeling of the people of this country is, that, if these unhappy men could not legally be executed, they could not, legally, be transported. I wish to know whether, if the writ had gone down to Monmouth, ordering these men to be executed, "at the same time," any man would say that it meant that one of them should be executed on Monday, another on Thursday, and the other on Saturday? I am surprised, I repeat, at the absence, on the present occasion, of the Honourable and Learned Gentlemen who were counsel for the prisoner Frost. I have seen a letter from one of those Honourable and Learned Gentlemen, requesting my Honourable Friend the Member for Westminster to postpone his motion, when it stood for a former day, in the hope that something would be done in the mean time; but the prisoners are now on the wide seas, and those Honourable and Learned Gentlemen are not in their seats. As to the question whether or not the objection was taken in time, it appears that the Honourable and Learned Member for Huntingdon, on leaving the court, after arguing it before the fifteen judges, protested, before God and the country, that he could not find, after the fullest consideration, any principle, precedent, or authority for his taking the objection at any other time than that of which he had availed himself in the case of Frost. But, even supposing the objection not to have been taken in time; in that case, how stands the matter in the case of Zephaniah Williams? I have this day received a letter from the learned gentleman who was assigned as counsel to Zephaniah Williams; and, in that letter, Mr. Thomas maintains that he took the objection in time, and that he took it as soon as he was assigned, and before any juryman was sworn. But I will read the letter to the House, and allow it to speak for itself. It is in the following terms: —

11. Abbey Place, St. John's Wood,
9th March, 1840.

Dear Sir, — Finding Mr. Leader's motion, in the case of Frost, Williams, and Jones, comes on to-morrow night, I am anxious to present you with a few facts and remarks, more particularly respecting the case of Zephaniah Williams, for whom you presented a petition.

The subject now embraces a wider scope than party sympathy, and men of different politics in both Houses of Parliament have expressed their concurrence with the six judges who decided in favour of the men upon the law. The reasons assigned by Lord Normanby for the commutation of their sentence appear to me not only to warrant, but to require, a free pardon to be granted them. His Lordship said he had "withheld from the Crown the jury's recommendation to mercy." It was too bad a case to regard the signatures of sympathising thousands, but "there was a great diversity of opinion among the judges." The doubts were enough, therefore, in this very bad case, to render it imperative on his Lordship to commute the sentence.

A majority of the judges who tried the prisoners held that they ought to have rejected each and every witness as he came to be sworn. Upon the statutable objection, four other learned judges concurred in their opinion, and three other learned judges thought the objection good; but that it should have been urged when it would have been of no avail.

In the case of Zephaniah Williams, I took the objection before a juryman was called (as soon as I was assigned), on account of the contention in Frost's case. The Attorney General said, "Do you object to the trial proceeding?" I answered, "That is not for me to do; I repeat, that I object to the service of the lists; it is for you to say if you will go on or not." The Attorney General then proceeded to empanel a jury. I had no power to stop the trial; the Attorney General had, no juryman having been sworn; but the objection was not considered by the Attorney General sufficiently significant to put off the proceedings. All that is required by the objections, as to the point of time, is, that the opportunity should have been given to correct the error. This opportunity was offered in Williams's case; and, indeed, the Attorney General might have put off both the trials without risking the objection, had he deemed it of weight. I again took the objection on the first witness being called, and to the whole proceeding when Baron Parke was about to sum up. There were two other lists of witnesses served upon the prisoners subsequently to the first list. The objection to these lists was, that they had not been served ten clear days. The Attorney General did not attempt to say, as to these, that we ought to have presented each list, and objected to the service before the jury was sworn. The objection was taken when each witness was called, and was allowed without opposition. But if the objection was too late to a witness in one list, it was too late to any witness in another list. Had we made the objection earlier, we might have been told to wait and see whether the witnesses were called or not.

Penal Acts of Parliament should be clear enough to be understood by all whom they affect; and unanimity of judges as imperative in matters of written law affecting our lives as the unanimity, so much lauded, of our juries upon matters of fact. A reasonable doubt on the minds of juries saves the prisoner: if one juryman holds out, they are all discharged. Here, consider the remarkable diversity of opinion of the judges upon this subject. Queen Anne, in the case of Damarce v. Purchase, where there was a diversity of opinion among the judges, pardoned the prisoners found guilty of high treason. I will only add, that if this had been the trial of a cause at common law, the judges of the court would determine the law, although all the rest of the fifteen judges, upon argument, differed with them in opinion.

Hoping the matter will be determined in conformity with the humane spirit of our law, and to the honour of our country,

I am, dear Sir,
Most obligedly yours,
RALPH THOMAS.

Such, then, is the opinion of the learned gentleman who was assigned as counsel to Zephaniah Williams; and I am sure he has no other wish than that justice should be fairly and impartially administered. That is the object, also, of my Honourable Friend the Member for Westminster, in bringing forward this motion; and I am sure it ought to be the object of this House to see justice done to every one. It may be expedient to transport these unhappy individuals; but that is by no means a sufficient reason why the law of the land should have been strained, as it appears undoubtedly to have been in the present instance. I do not wish to palliate the crime which these unfortunate men have committed; but, inasmuch as I desire to see a fair and impartial administration of the law, and as I think them justly entitled to their discharge from custody and from punishment, according to the law of the land, I shall most certainly give my support to the motion of my Honourable Friend, if he press it, as I hope he will, to a division.

DOCTOR LUSHINGTON.—Although, Sir, this question has been raised in a House not very full of Members, yet I deem it one of considerable importance, with reference to the interests of the country at large; and I do hope that one of the results of this discussion will be, to dispel many of those doubts and erroneous opinions that have been circulated, especially among the manufacturing classes, upon this subject. I am prepared to say, that the sentence which has been carried into effect upon these individuals is perfectly consonant with law, with justice, and with every consideration of public expediency. It is most material, as has already been said, to preserve perfectly distinct the question of guilt and the question of law; and it is a great satisfaction to my mind that we have had so frank and full an admission from the Honourable Member for Finsbury, as well as from others, that the crime of which these persons have been convicted is one of the most atrocious nature. I rejoice in this admission; because it is most important that no misunderstanding upon that question should exist. It ought not to be supposed that there is any party in this House which can view the matter in the nature of a mere political offence; but that, equally on the one side as on the other, they deem it to be that which in reality it is—a deliberate attempt, by bloodshed and destruction, to overthrow all the foundations upon which the liberties and the government of this or any other country can stand. I am delighted, therefore, to think that it will now go forth to the world that the House of Commons is unanimous in this opinion, and that we shall disabuse the public mind of the impression by which it has been poisoned by mistaken publications which have appeared, and which have cast, as it were, the protection of a political offence upon that which in itself was a great crime and outrage against the law of the land. Having said thus much of the guilt, I will now say a word or two as to the law, of the case, upon which the Honourable Member for Finsbury seems chiefly to rely. I cannot help observing that, though cases may arise under which it may be justifiable and right to appeal to the House of Commons in the last extremity, yet I, for one, deprecate, above all things, making the House of Commons a court of appeal from the courts of justice, with respect to the exercise of that prerogative of mercy which the Crown possesses, and which often must be, and ought to be, exercised, for reasons that ought not to be stated. But, to proceed to the question of the law, as impugned in this case. The moral guilt of the parties is admitted; and the real point at issue is, the feeble one of whether, in the course of the trial, there has been an erroneous decision on a point of law, which, if otherwise decided, would have entitled the prisoners to the benefit of an entire acquittal? Now, what was the point of law? The complaint is, that the statute declares that the list of witnesses and the copy of the indictment should be delivered at the same time. But does that complaint, even if well founded, prove one atom of hardship, one iota of injustice, or the least inconvenience to the prisoners, in respect of their defence? On the contrary, the course that was pursued in the delivery of the lists afforded them a fuller and more ample opportunity of providing themselves with the means of defence.

Then comes the question, as to what took place at the trial of these prisoners, and as to the ordinary usage and practice in similar cases; and, also, whether it was departed from in the one under consideration. I will not touch upon the second point at all; because the judges have themselves utterly denied that they have departed from the accustomed rule upon this occasion. What the judges who tried the case say is, that they reserved the point that was raised for the opinion of the judges at large; the meaning of which is, that whichever way the opinion of the majority of the judges should be, that opinion should decide the law upon the question. But it is said that these prisoners are entitled to a remission of their sentence, because two of the judges who tried them have declared their opinion in favour of the validity of the objection taken at the trial; and that the decision on that question ought to have been made at the time the objection was urged. Now, it behoves the House to consider whether it is consistent with justice, reason, or the due administration of the law, that the judges ought to have decided upon the objection at once. As to the practice upon this point, I dare not pretend, on my own knowledge alone, to speak; but we have the opinion of the learned judges upon the subject, as read, just now, by my Honourable Friend below me; and I very well remember an instance corroborative of that usage and practice, as laid down by them, in a case which occurred to myself, when practising at the Old Bailey, during the Admiralty Sessions, as they formerly existed. On the occasion to which I refer, I had upon me the heavy burden of pleading for the lives of thirty-ive men, charged with a capital crime. Lord Stowell sat, with Lord Tenterden, and the late Mr. Justice Park. I took an objection, and strongly pressed for an immediate decision upon it, inasmuch as, if t had been referred to the judges, I could not have had the advantage of Lord Stowell's judgment upon it. Lord Tenerden, however, stopped me, and said he question was one of difficulty and mportance, and refused to decide it intanter and upon the spot. Of course, I ould not persist; but if I had done so, what is the rule? Why, that the point aised is always decided against the prioner, but reserved for consideration afterwards; and thereby the prisoner has the benefit of the opinions and the decisions f all the judges of the land. In the present case, it is said that, when the uestion was under discussion, the result was, that two of the judges out of the hree upon the Commission were in favour f the objection, and therefore that the prisoners were entitled to a verdict of cquittal. Now, I should like to know he reciprocity of this argument; and how the case would have stood if two of the judges on the Commission had been of the opposite opinion? But if this practice is to prevail with respect to three judges, it must with respect to one also; and the consequence will be, that in a nice and complicated case, the opinion of one judge must be taken, and not the opinion of the majority. I am clearly of opinion that the course adopted by the learned judges was a correct course, and one consonant with the administration of justice; and I am confident that any attempt to alter that established course of proceeding would be productive of the greatest injury to society. Now, with respect to the absence of the Honourable and Learned Member for Huntingdon, on the present occasion, I have had no conversation with him on this subject; but I believe I can form a pretty correct estimate of the cause of his absence. That Honourable and Learned Gentleman made a splendid defence for the prisoners; he exerted his great talents with unexampled industry on their behalf; he did not fail them, after the conviction had taken place, but very laudably endeavoured to obtain for them a remission of their sentence; and having gone to this extremity, I have no doubt that he considered that no such flagrant violation of justice had been committed as would justly call for the interference of this House; and therefore he is not now present. Now, what is the opinion of the judges? They have said that the conviction is legal, — they have said that, if taken before trial, it might have been a good ground for postponement, — some of them have said that it was taken in time; but the great majority have said the objection was not valid. And is the House to review that decision? Is it competent to do so? Are we prepared to say that the majority of the judges are in error, and that we are capable of pronouncing a better and safer opinion on a question which necessarily calls for long experience in the consideration of Acts of Parliament and the common law of the land. Can a more fearful or dangerous attempt be made, than to call upon the House to impeach the judgment of the superior court, and constitute itself — for the first time in the history of this country — a court of appeal, in cases of life and death, from the decision of the judges? I fearlessly say that, according to law, the persons thus convicted could have been executed. Nay, more, I say that hundreds of persons have been sent to the scaffold under similar circumstances, and where the like difference of opinion existed among the judges, without treason. I will only add, that if this had been the trial of a cause at common law, the judges of the court would determine the law, although all the rest of the fifteen judges, upon argument, differed with them in opinion.

Hoping the matter will be determined in conformity with the humane spirit of our law, and to the honour of our country,

I am, dear Sir,
Most obligedly yours,
Ralph Thomas.

Such, then, is the opinion of the learned gentleman who was assigned as counsel to Zephaniah Williams; and I am sure he has no other wish than that justice should be fairly and impartially administered. That is the object, also, of my Honourable Friend the Member for Westminster, in bringing forward this motion; and I am sure it ought to be the object of this House to see justice done to every one. It may be expedient to transport these unhappy individuals; but that is by no means a sufficient reason why the law of the land should have been strained, as it appears undoubtedly to have been in the present instance. I do not wish to palliate the crime which these unfortunate men have committed; but, inasmuch as I desire to see a fair and impartial administration of the law, and as I think them justly entitled to their discharge from custody and from punishment, according to the law of the land, I shall most certainly give my support to the motion of my Honourable Friend, if he press it, as I hope he will, to a division.

DOCTOR LUSHINGTON.—Although, Sir, this question has been raised in a House not very full of Members, yet I deem it one of considerable importance, with reference to the interests of the country at large; and I do hope that one of the results of this discussion will be, to dispel many of those doubts and erroneous opinions that have been circulated, especially among the manufacturing classes, upon this subject. I am prepared to say, that the sentence which has been carried into effect upon these individuals is perfectly consonant with law, with justice, and with every consideration of public expediency. It is most material, as has already been said, to preserve perfectly distinct the question of guilt and the question of law; and it is a great satisfaction to my mind that we have had so frank and full an admission from the Honourable Member for Finsbury, as well as from others, that the crime of which these persons have been convicted is one of the most atrocious nature. I rejoice in this admission; because it is most important that no misunderstanding upon that question should exist. It ought not to be supposed that there is any party in this House which can view the matter in the nature of a mere political offence; but that, equally on the one side as on the other, they deem it to be that which in reality it is—a deliberate attempt, by bloodshed and destruction, to overthrow all the foundations upon which the liberties and the government of this or any other country can stand. I am delighted, therefore, to think that it will now go forth to the world that the House of Commons is unanimous in this opinion, and that we shall disabuse the public mind of the impression by which it has been poisoned by mistaken publications which have appeared, and which have cast, as it were, the protection of a political offence upon that which in itself was a great crime and outrage against the law of the land. Having said thus much of the guilt, I will now say a word or two as to the law, of the case, upon which the Honourable Member for Finsbury seems chiefly to rely. I cannot help observing that, though cases may arise under which it may be justifiable and right to appeal to the House of Commons in the last extremity, yet I, for one, deprecate, above all things, making the House of Commons a court of appeal from the courts of justice, with respect to the exercise of that prerogative of mercy which the Crown possesses, and which often must be, and ought to be, exercised, for reasons that ought not to be stated. But, to proceed to the question of the law, as impugned in this case. The moral guilt of the parties is admitted; and the real point at issue is, the feeble one of whether, in the course of the trial, there has been an erroneous decision on a point of law, which, if otherwise decided, would have entitled the prisoners to the benefit of an entire acquittal? Now, what was the point of law? The complaint is, that the statute declares that the list of witnesses and the copy of the indictment should be delivered at the same time. But does that complaint, even if well founded, prove one atom of hardship, one iota of injustice, or the least inconvenience to the prisoners, in respect of their defence? On the contrary, the course that was pursued in the delivery of the lists afforded them a fuller and more ample opportunity of providing themselves with the means of defence.

Then comes the question, as to what took place at the trial of these prisoners, and as to the ordinary usage and practice in similar cases; and, also, whether it was departed from in the one under consideration. I will not touch upon the second point at all; because the judges have themselves utterly denied that they have departed from the accustomed rule upon this occasion. What the judges who tried the case say is, that they reserved the point that was raised for the opinion of the judges at large; the meaning of which is, that whichever way the opinion of the majority of the judges should be, that opinion should decide the law upon the question. But it is said that these prisoners are entitled to a remission of their sentence, because two of the judges who tried them have declared their opinion in favour of the validity of the objection taken at the trial; and that the decision on that question ought to have been made at the time the objection was urged. Now, it behoves the House to consider whether it is consistent with justice, reason, or the due administration of the law, that the judges ought to have decided upon the objection at once. As to the practice upon this point, I dare not pretend, on my own knowledge alone, to speak; but we have the opinion of the learned judges upon the subject, as read, just now, by my Honourable Friend below me; and I very well remember an instance corroborative of that usage and practice, as laid down by them, in a case which occurred to myself, when practising at the Old Bailey, during the Admiralty Sessions, as they formerly existed. On the occasion to which I refer, I had upon me the heavy burden of pleading for the lives of thirty-five men, charged with a capital crime. Lord Stowell sat, with Lord Tenterden, and the late Mr. Justice Park. I took an objection, and strongly pressed for an immediate decision upon it, inasmuch as, if it had been referred to the judges, I could not have had the advantage of Lord Stowell's judgment upon it. Lord Tenterden, however, stopped me, and said the question was one of difficulty and importance, and refused to decide it instanter and upon the spot. Of course, I could not persist; but if I had done so, what is the rule? Why, that the point raised is always decided against the prisoner, but reserved for consideration afterwards; and thereby the prisoner has the benefit of the opinions and the decisions of all the judges of the land. In the present case, it is said that, when the question was under discussion, the result was, that two of the judges out of the three upon the Commission were in favour of the objection, and therefore that the prisoners were entitled to a verdict of acquittal. Now, I should like to know the reciprocity of this argument; and how the case would have stood if two of the judges on the Commission had been of the opposite opinion? But if this practice is to prevail with respect to three judges, it must with respect to one also; and the consequence will be, that in a nice and complicated case, the opinion of one judge must be taken, and not the opinion of the majority. I am clearly of opinion that the course adopted by the learned judges was a correct course, and one consonant with the administration of justice; and I am confident that any attempt to alter that established course of proceeding would be productive of the greatest injury to society. Now, with respect to the absence of the Honourable and Learned Member for Huntingdon, on the present occasion, I have had no conversation with him on this subject; but I believe I can form a pretty correct estimate of the cause of his absence. That Honourable and Learned Gentleman made a splendid defence for the prisoners; he exerted his great talents with unexampled industry on their behalf; he did not fail them, after the conviction had taken place, but very laudably endeavoured to obtain for them a remission of their sentence; and having gone to this extremity, I have no doubt that he considered that no such flagrant violation of justice had been committed as would justly call for the interference of this House; and therefore he is not now present. Now, what is the opinion of the judges? They have said that the conviction is legal, — they have said that, if taken before trial, it might have been a good ground for postponement, — some of them have said that it was taken in time; but the great majority have said the objection was not valid. And is the House to review that decision? Is it competent to do so? Are we prepared to say that the majority of the judges are in error, and that we are capable of pronouncing a better and safer opinion on a question which necessarily calls for long experience in the consideration of Acts of Parliament and the common law of the land. Can a more fearful or dangerous attempt be made, than to call upon the House to impeach the judgment of the superior court, and constitute itself — for the first time in the history of this country — a court of appeal, in cases of life and death, from the decision of the judges? I fearlessly say that, according to law, the persons thus convicted could have been executed. Nay, more, I say that hundreds of persons have been sent to the scaffold under similar circumstances, and where the like difference of opinion existed among the judges, without the subject having been made the theme of discussion in this House.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE.—It ought to have been.

DOCTOR LUSHINGTON. — "It ought to have been," says the Honourable Member for Finsbury. It ought to have been! I say, it ought not to have been. I say, the House of Commons is not competent to discuss questions of this nature. Competent, it may be, to discuss a question of severity of punishment; but incompetent, in my judgment, is it to consider any legal question of so deep, and difficult, and complicated a character; and not only so, but I maintain that it is an unconstitutional practice for any individual to call upon the House of Commons to do an act by which it would make itself, not only superior to the judges of the land, but would overrule the power and prerogative of the Crown. If it be done in one case, no one can tell the moment when it will be attempted in another; and thus the House may go on to weaken the authority, and to diminish the opinion now entertained, of the judges, to the entire destruction of justice itself. I perfectly agree with my Honourable Friend the Under Secretary for the Home Department, that the cause wherefore mercy was extended ought not to form a subject of discussion. For my own part, I will not attempt to discuss it; but I will, at the same time, say, that no person can rejoice more than I do at the extension of mercy in the present case; and I consider it the wisest and safest course which could, under the circumstances, have been pursued. If these parties had been executed, there would have been a revulsion of public opinion with respect to the causes which led to their crime; and the feeling which is spreading throughout the country against capital punishment would have been increased, not by means of reasoning, but through the operation of political feelings, which are now so rife from one end of the kingdom to the other. Instead of a just punishment, inflicted for a most atrocious offence, the case would have been looked upon in a light in which no thinking man can now view it,—namely, that those persons were the victims of the Government, who would not extend mercy to them. I repeat my solemn belief, that the conviction and sentence were strictly according to law; and I pray the House not to interfere either with the law or the sentence. I do not undervalue the atrocity of the guilt of these individuals; but I think the punishment commensurate with the crime; and I am glad that the last punishment which man can inflict on man has not been resorted to in this instance.

Mr. WAKLEY.—The Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman who has just sat down has said that my Honourable Colleague has argued the case like a lawyer. Now, I entirely differ with the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman on that point. My impression is, that he did not argue it like a lawyer; for he founded his arguments entirely upon principles of common sense. My Honourable Colleague adverted, particularly, to the practice of past times, in cases where objections have been taken, and stated that no occurrence like the present could be found; but the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, who certainly made a very clever speech, has passed that point over entirely. The Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman says that hundreds of persons have been executed where differences of opinion have existed among the judges, but that none of those cases have been brought before the House of Commons; and the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman added, that, in his opinion, they ought not to have been brought before the House, because the House is incompetent to comprehend these questions. If so, why should the House of Commons exist at all? What are we here for? Why, to make the law: and, after having made it, we are told by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman that we are not capable of comprehending it. That is, absolutely and positively, the argument of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman. Does the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman deny that we are competent to make the laws which we are unable to comprehend? Now, in order to carry out his argument fully, he must contend that we are not competent to legislate. That may be the case; but still I think we are capable of deciding whether there is any difference between two and four, whether Monday is Thursday, or Thursday Monday, as well as the fifteen judges. The public are incapable of comprehending how it is that fifteen grave and learned gentlemen, who have been placed upon the judicial bench of this country, and who reap an enormous sum of money out of the public taxes for comprehending the law, should have been divided in such a chequered and peculiar manner upon so simple a question as was proposed to them in the case of Frost, which a little common sense would have solved in a few minutes. The public imagine their decision to be of this nature, — that nine against six have decided that Monday is Saturday, whilst six against nine are of opinion that Saturday is Monday; and that they proceeded with their decisions until they determined that twelve o'clock was two, and that a quarter past three was half past four. Now, that is the real nature of their decision; and I think it rather extraordinary that such a decision should not be approached in debate by the representatives of the people. When I see the judges governed in their decisions by the plain principles of common sense, and when I see their decisions characterised by that clearness and that distinctness which are calculated to obtain for the law the respect of the people, I, for one, will be the first to bow to their superior knowledge; but when I find them giving decisions of so contradictory and absurd a character, I will not be deterred from expressing my opinion, in reference to their decision, or any portion of their public conduct. Sir, I think it most unfortunate that we have to argue this question in the absence of the two learned counsel who so ably advocated the cause of the prisoners; and, feeling that justice can scarcely be done to the case in their absence, I would recommend my Honourable Friend the Member for Westminster not to press his motion to a ivision, but to ask permission of the House to withdraw it. Those Learned Gentlemen, as the Right Honourable and Learned Member for the Tower Hamlets bserved, not content with the services vhich they had rendered at the trial, have ince been indefatigable in the cause of he prisoners; and it is known that they ntertain strong opinions upon the subect. I believe they would not, in the ouse, discuss the question of the innoence or the guilt of the prisoners; and t is not just towards them, or the public, hat that question should be taken into ccount. We ought to look, alone, at the lain question, whether these individuals re rightfully suffering by a due administration of the law. I believe the House ill think that, whatever offence an individual may have committed, it is of the tmost importance, in order to obtain espect for the law, that no person should onsider he is suffering the penalty of the w, when, by the forms of the law, he ught to have been acquitted. In this ase, I feel confident that we cannot do stice to this great constitutional quesion in the absence of those Learned Genemen; and I therefore implore my Honourable Friend not to divide the House; for, by so doing, he will most effectually damage the cause of the prisoners, and will, in fact, seal their fate in the colony. No more impolitic step can be taken than to divide the House in the absence of the Honourable and Learned Member for Huntingdon and the Honourable and Learned Member for Ipswich. I know that, if they were here, they would enter into the spirit of the debate; for their opinion has undergone no change since the trial, and their firm conviction is, that the prisoners ought to be released; and one of them, in the course of a conversation with me, said, "If these men were executed, he would not hesitate to rise in his place in this House and say that their execution was a judicial murder." I therefore again press on the Honourable Member not to divide the House; for no injury can arise from postponing the consideration of the subject for a short time.

Mr. LEADER. — I really cannot see what advantage would arise from the presence of the learned counsel, except the advantage of their argument and legal knowledge. If the subject have not been sufficiently well argued, or if there be a prospect of a larger division at another time, the subject can again be brought before the House in the presence of those Learned Gentlemen. For my own part, I shall be ready to attend, at any time, but I do not see the use of troubling the House with a long debate; and, then, abstaining from a division, because two Learned Gentlemen are not present. I cannot imagine how the case of the prisoners can be damaged by the course which I am now pursuing.

Mr. WAKLEY. — Why, by a small minority.

Mr. LEADER. — I never expected anything but a small minority, and so I told the friends of the parties, adding, that if they held out any hope to the prisoners, they would do a very unfair, wicked, and cruel thing. I said I believed that strict justice had not been done to these unfortunate men, and that I was quite ready to do all I could for them, but I was quite confident I should fail. Having promised to press the question to a division, I cannot accede to the request of the Honourable Member for Finsbury.

The House divided: — Ayes 5, Noes 68; Majority 63.

judges. That course has been adopted, and nine out of the fifteen judges have thought it a valid objection; but there are also nine out of the fifteen who have thought that it was not taken in time. Of the six who thought that it was taken in time, there were two out of the three judges who tried the prisoners. I have been told, by lawyers of the greatest authority, that the prisoners might have insisted on having the objection decided at the trial; and it seems to me only reasonable and just, that they should either have had power to insist upon that, or, that they should, at all events, have the benefit of the opinion of the three judges who tried the cause separate from that of the rest of the judges. The three judges named in the commission were not bound to adopt the opinion of the other judges; and judges in such cases only say, that they will consult their learned brethren. It has always appeared to me a great defect in our law, that there is no court of appeal in criminal cases. This system of reference to the fifteen judges, merely produces an extra-judicial opinion, which ought not to overrule, as it has in this case, the opinion of that court before which prisoners are tried. It is true, that, in cases of treason, the Crown may grant a pardon, on the judges advising that the objection raised is a valid objection; but it requires an Act of Parliament to remove the attaint; and the Crown cannot grant that. Now, I have been told by the learned counsel for the prisoners, that it was clearly understood at the trial, that the prisoners should be placed in no worse position than if the objection had been then and there decided. That has been stated to me by the learned counsel for the prisoners; at all events, I have so understood them. I regret that they are not now in their places here, that I might appeal to them for confirmation. And how can it be said that the prisoners have not been placed in a worse position? This subject, too, possesses an importance beyond that attached to the particular case; because the working classes will lose all confidence in the law, unless they believe that it is in all cases literally and strictly interpreted; and in this instance, I repeat, there prevails a strong opinion amongst them, that it has been strained against these prisoners, and that they have been punished more with reference to the great guilt of their attempt, and the mischief that would be caused by it, than in accordance with the strict interpretation of the law. What, I ask, can possibly be more mischievous, than such a notion as this gaining ground among the working classes?

It has been said, that to pardon these men would cause great mischief in the country, and add to the violence that has already been perpetrated; but, on the contrary, I believe that it would have the effect of putting down all violence,—that the moral effect of such a course upon the working classes would be such as would be calculated, more than anything else, to suppress all attempts at violence upon their part. I have heard it stated elsewhere, that, after the point had been decided, the Cabinet determined that the men should be hanged; and that it was only upon a re-consideration of the point of law, that a commutation of the sentence was decided on. But if that argument be good for anything, it goes to the full extent of a free pardon. If the consideration of a point of law could have influenced the decision of the Government at all, it ought to have done so in favour of the entire pardon of the prisoners. What is transportation for life? In my opinion, there is very little to choose between transportation for life and hanging; and having sat upon the Committee of Inquiry into the transportation system, and been made acquainted with its horrors, I hesitate whether I should not say that transportation for life is a worse punishment than instant death; for, in the former case, the man has nothing to look forward to but death, after years of torture,—perhaps not so bad as that which used to be inflicted under the Holy Inquisition in Spain, but, at all events, the most terrible which, in modern times, can be inflicted upon human nature, — torture, indeed, so great, that many prisoners in Norfolk Island have killed each other, or committed suicide, rather than endure it. And this it is to which, in our mercy, we have condemned these men, after having had it admitted that a doubt upon a point of law justified a commutation of their sentence. I shall be told, perhaps, that the House of Commons is not the proper place for the discussion of such a question; but it is the only place to which these parties, who feel themselves aggrieved, can come for redress; and, beyond all question, it is just as consistent with justice, that this House should address the Queen upon this as upon any other subject. There is no doubt that the feeling which prevails among the working classes is very strong upon this subject; but I believe that, if the Government had taken a middle course, they would have considered that the prisoners had had far greater justice done them than they now look upon them as having received. Why should not the Government have come to an agreement with the prisoners in this way, and have said, "You are in our power; we can order you to be executed; but if you consent to leave the country, we shall be satisfied;"—because the only desire among the middle classes was to get rid of these men, in order that they might be the cause of no more mischief, although, no doubt, there were some who were sorry that they were not executed. This sanguinary disposition, however, I am sure, was confined to a very few individuals; as the people, in general, would only, unquestionably, have been satisfied with getting the prisoners fairly out of this country. In conclusion, then, Sir, I have only to say, that I have been very anxious to bring this matter forward much earlier, and certainly before the prisoners had left these shores for Van Diemen's Land; but I have postponed it several times, in consequence of a request which the legal advisers of the prisoners made to me, stating that negotiations were pending between the Government and themselves, with which this motion might interfere. A great deal of misrepresentation has gone abroad on the subject: I believe the learned counsel have been accused of not urging the case of their clients as much as they ought to have done. But I entirely acquit them of such a charge; I have never made any such accusation, but I have myself, also, been accused of not having done my best to bring forward the subject. All I can say is, that I have done what I considered to be best, and what I have been advised to do by the most experienced of my friends, with respect to bringing the subject forward, in order that the prisoners might have the benefit of any doubt raised in this House. I have, now, only to move, "that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased, under the special circumstances of the case, to grant a free pardon to Frost, Williams, and Jones."

Mr. HUME. — In rising, Sir, to second the motion of my Honourable Friend, I will, at the outset, state that I do so, not on the merits of the case itself, because I consider that the crime of these men has been most detrimental to the country and to the cause of public liberty in general; and that, so far as their offence is concerned, they have decidedly merited the fate they have met with. But, Sir, there prevails a great impression abroad, that, in this case, the parties have not been treated in the same manner as others have been in cases of high treason; and I believe and hope that, in the course of this discussion, we shall hear something stated that will be calculated to remove this impression; for nothing can possibly be worse for the country than anything which tends to bring the administration of justice into discredit. The ground of the complaint against the Government in this case is, that, a Commission having been appointed to try these prisoners, the usual legal forms were not attended to, and the lists of witnesses not delivered in, in proper time. I am told that it is not usual for a criminal case of this sort to be referred to the fifteen judges; but that the judges at the trial should give their opinion upon any objection taken.

Now, another feature of the ground of complaint is, that two out of the three judges who tried the case stated that the prisoners would not be in a worse position than before the trial. It is also alleged, that two of those judges have recommended the removal of the criminal punishment. The answer of the bench to Sir F. Pollock certainly was, that these men should not be in a worse position; and we have the avowal of the Marquess of Normanby, that, but for this opinion of the judges, they would have been hanged. If, then, the Secretary of State thought that the objection which was taken was of sufficient importance to justify the removal of the capital punishment, why, let me ask, should not these men have been pardoned? If I am correct in the facts I have alluded to, I can have no hesitation in saying, that, if these men were entitled to the remission of the capital punishment, they were also entitled to a full and free pardon. With respect to an Address to Her Majesty, there cannot, possibly, be a subject of greater importance than this, on which to adopt such a recommendation; and I should certainly wish that the impression which has taken so strong a hold of the public mind should be communicated to Her Majesty in such a manner as to insure her gracious attention. We are without any knowledge of what took place at the meeting of the fifteen judges; and, independently of this, I am given to understand that this is the only case of high treason in which a reference to the whole of the judges was ever made. Coupling this with the fact of two out of three of the judges who tried the prisoners having morally acquitted them, I confess that I am at a loss to determine on what ground the Secretary of State should conclude that such a combination of circumstances favourable to these men ought not to have led to an entire acquittal. There is, also, another objection which I have to make to the course which has been adopted; it is, that such a proceeding appears to me to involve the establishment of a very bad precedent; and for this reason, that the result of it will be, that cases will arise in which judges, not having the courage to act on their own judgment, will not like to take upon themselves the responsibility of condemning a prisoner; but will, on the contrary, endeavour to shift it from their own shoulders to that of the fifteen. I say, then, that this alone is enough to show the danger of establishing a precedent like this, — a precedent upon which many a really innocent man might be considered guilty. Besides, if this sort of reference is to be made in one case, why not in all? And what, under such a system, would speedily be the state of the criminal law of this country? The grounds, then, Sir, on which I support this motion, are these: — that, a Commission having been appointed to try these men, an objection to the legality of the proceedings was taken at the trial; that that objection was taken in time, according to the opinion of six of the judges; and that, as it appears that two out of the three judges that presided at the trial were among the six who were of that opinion, these men ought to have been acquitted. These, I know, are the opinions of a great body of the people; and if I am correct — and I am open to contradiction from any Honourable Gentleman if I am not — in these statements, I must maintain that a pardon, and not a punishment, ought to have been the portion of these prisoners. I am sorry to have detained the House so long; but I still more regret that any necessity should have arisen for a motion like that which I now beg to second.

Question put.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I am extremely sorry to have to address the House on a motion of this sort; and I deeply regret that the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Westminster should have thought it right to make this House a court of appeal from that tribunal from which he has declared that no appeal exists. The Honourable Member has laid aside, entirely, all reference to the prerogative of mercy as exercised by the Crown; and states, that what he seeks is an act of right and justice to these individuals. The Honourable Gentleman has said that these three individuals have been tried for a political offence. Now, in my mind, the crimes with which they were charged were not mere political offences, but deserve a much stronger name; inasmuch as the object which they had in view was, to overturn the whole system of society in this country; and, by an act of violence, to strike at the very root of the constitution under which we live. A preliminary objection was taken at the trial, to the extent that the forms of the law of treason had not been fulfilled. It was urged that the delivery of the copy of the indictment, and of the lists of witnesses, was not simultaneous. This point was referred to the three judges at the Commission; and it is stated that two out of those three judges entertained an opinion that the objection raised was a valid objection, and that, entertaining such an opinion, they ought to have decided the point on the spot, and in favour of the prisoners, giving them the benefit of the objection. Now, it appears to me, that the very fact of the judges having declined to decide the question upon the instant, shows that a great doubt existed in their minds, and that they were anxious to have the opinion of the rest of the judges before an ultimate decision was given upon it: they consequently reserved the point. It has been stated that this is not the usual practice in cases of treason. I shall probably, however, be followed by others who are more conversant with the law than I can be, and who will inform the House correctly upon that point; but I apprehend it will be found that the usual legal forms have not, in this instance, been departed from; but that the judges gave the prisoners all the advantages that could be derived from the objection that was raised in their favour. This is made perfectly clear from the narrative of the trial, which the House is familiar with, and from which it appears that, in reply to the question put to the court by the prisoners' counsel (Sir F. Pollock), the Chief Justice stated, that the common course taken at assizes was, to reserve any difficult point in which an objection might be raised for the opinion of the fifteen judges in London; and said that, if the point in the present case were decided by the fifteen judges in favour of the prisoners, they would thereby be placed in the same position in which they would be, in case the point were decided at the trial; but he also added, that, in case the point were decided in their favour, it would not have the effect of giving the prisoners a verdict of acquittal, but merely of postponing the trial until the forms of the law of treason should have been properly and legally gone through. I will not, however, go into the whole case; but onfine myself, as I think I shall be more ustified in doing, to that portion of the ircumstances which relates more partiularly to the department with which I ave the honour to be connected. The irst intimation which my Noble Friend t the head of the Home department had, f the decision of the fifteen judges, was letter from the Chief Justice, which tated, that the argument in the three ases of Frost, Williams, and Jones had losed, and that the judges had come to a etermination on the two questions reerved for their opinions. That letter was to the following effect: —

Westminster Hall, 28th January, 1840.

My Lord, — I have the honour to inform our Lordship that the argument upon the three ases of the Queen v. Frost, the Queen v. Williams, and the Queen v. Jones closed this afernoon, and that the judges, after considering he subject, have come to the following deterination upon the two questions which have een argued before them; namely: —

First, a majority of the judges, in the proporion of nine to six, are of opinion that the deliery of the list of witnesses was not a good deivery in point of law.

But, secondly, a majority of the judges, in the roportion of nine to six, are of opinion that he objection to the delivery of the list of witesses was not taken in due time.

All the judges agreed, that if the objection ad been made in due time, the effect of it would ave been a postponement of the trial, in order o give time for a proper delivery of the list.

The result, therefore, of the determination of he judges is, that the conviction is right.

I will have the honour of calling on your ordship to-morrow at the rising of the court, if should receive any intimation to that effect.

I have the honour to remain,
My Lord,
Your Lordship's faithful and obedient servant,
N. C. Tindal.

The Lord Marquess of Normanby,
&c. &c. &c.

Such was the result, then, of the resoution to which the fifteen judges came; nd, when the House considers the terms f it, and what would have been the conequence of their decision having been in avour of the prisoners, I think it will gree with me, that the objection of the Honourable Gentleman who has made his motion, as to their being tried ten days sooner or later, carries with it very ittle weight. Upon the trial of the prisoners, an objection was raised, that they ad not had sufficient time to be prepared or it; but, I must say, that I have not et seen or heard anything to induce me o believe that they would have been a whit more prepared afterwards, than they were at the time this objection was made. But, Sir, this is not all; for, in addition o this, the learned counsel for the prisoners had put in a memorial, in which all was stated, in effect, which has been stated, this evening, by the Honourable Member for Westminster; and to that memorial, the judges gave a clear, distinct, and conclusive answer, and which I will read to the House. The answer to that memorial was in the following terms: —

Westminster Hall, Jan. 31. 1840.

My Lord, — We have perused and considered the memorial of Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Kelly, counsel for the prisoner John Frost, who was tried under the late special commission at Monmouth, and beg to inform your Lordship, that the memorial appears to us to be founded upon an entire misconception of the law relating to the course of proceeding in criminal cases; and, so far as we the judges under the special commission are concerned, an entire misapprehension of the fact.

As to the law, the uniform practice has been, so far back as we have any means of knowledge, that if the judge upon the trial of an indictment feels any serious doubt as to an objection that occurs in point of law, he decides the point against the prisoner, and allows the trial to proceed; reserving such point of law, in order that he may take the advice and opinion of all the other judges thereon. After consulting them, and hearing argument thereon (if thought necessary), the opinion of the judges is taken; and that of the majority binds the judge who has reserved the question. If that opinion should be against the prisoner, the law is suffered to take its course, and the sentence which has been passed remains. If the opinion of the judges is in favour of the prisoner, the constant course is for the judge who tried the prisoner, and passed the sentence, to apply to the Secretary of State for a free pardon. And this course in no way depends on any consent, expressed or implied, on the part of the prisoner; the judge pursues it at his own discretion, and decides the point, for the present, against the prisoner, giving him the benefit of further consideration and advice with the other judges. And this course is pursued for the manifest purpose of preventing a failure of justice, inasmuch as if the judge decided under his immediate impression, supposing it to be in favour of the prisoner, and directed an acquittal, there could be no new trial, although, upon reference to the other judges, his own opinion was held to be wrong. On the other hand, if the opinion of the judge is at the time unfavourable to the prisoner, it can be reserved by that course, and, if erroneous, set right.

With respect to the statement in the memorial of what took place at the trial, so far as relates to ourselves, we cannot but remark that the learned counsel labour under a complete misapprehension; at which we are the more surprised, as we expressly stated that no distinction would be made between this and other cases tried at the assizes, but that it must follow the ordinary course.

At the time of the discussion, we all of us entertained serious doubts, more or less strong, on the objection that was raised before us. And if the law had obliged us to come to an immediate and final decision, without the power of consulting the judges, which the law does not, we were not prepared, without much further consideration, nor without hearing the argument on the part of the Crown concluded, to come to

NEWPORT RIOTS.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — I have a petition to present from the parish of Clerkenwell, praying for a free pardon to Frost, Williams, and Jones. This petition is signed by upwards of 1000 persons. There is one passage in it which I deem it right to make known to the House, in order that any Honourable Member may object to the reception of the petition, if he should think it necessary, although I see no objection to the passage. The petitioners state, that they consider they have a claim on the House for its interference on behalf of the individuals already named, inasmuch as, if the House had paid proper attention to the great national petition which was presented last Session, complaining of grievances, and praying for redress of them and which petition was more numerously signed than any that has ever before been presented to Parliament, the unfortunate events at Newport would never have taken place; but that the people, stung by the neglect of the House, and despairing of relief from Parliament, had been compelled to resort to force.

To lie on the table.

PRINTED PAPERS.

SIR FRANCIS BURDETT. — Sir, I have been intrusted with the following petition from Mr. Thomas George Johnston Pearce, now a prisoner of this House, and in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. The petition humbly showeth that your petitioner is confined under the authority of the warrant of the Right Honourable the Speaker of your Honourable House, for having been guilty of an alleged high contempt and breach of the privileges thereof; but which he is insensible of having wilfully committed, your petitioner having only done that which was imperatively demanded of him in the performance of his duties as clerk to Thomas Burton Howard, the attorney in the cause of "Stockdale v. Hansard:" That, upon the incarceration of your petitioner, he was deprived of his means of supporting himself and his family, and is now without any pecuniary resources other than the contributions of a charitable and sympathising public: That your petitioner was supplied with provisions by Mr. Bellamy, the keeper of your Honourable House, from the 9th day of February last, the day of his committal, until Friday, the 6th of March instant, when, to the great surprise of your petitioner, he had a bill delivered to him by that gentleman, amounting to the sum of 4*l.* 19*s.*, being the cost of the maintenance of your petitioner during that period: That your petitioner being unable, from the circumstances above set forth, to meet this demand, humbly prays your Honourable House to direct that the payment of the said sum may be excused to him, and further to order that the Sergeant-at-Arms attending your Honourable House may, in future, supply your petitioner with rations free of cost. I move, Sir, that the petition be printed with the Votes, so as to give Honourable Members an opportunity of considering, between this time and to-morrow, whether this gentleman shall not be discharged without any payment whatever.

Ordered to be printed.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I have a petition to present, Sir, from the Messrs. Hansard, which I move shall be read by the clerk. I also move that it be printed and taken into consideration to-morrow.

Petition read, as follows: —

The humble petition of James Hansard, Luke Graves Hansard, and Luke James Hansard, printers to this Honourable House,

Showeth, — That your petitioners were, on Monday, the 9th day of March, instant, served with notice of a writ of inquiry of damages in the further or fifth suit commenced against your petitioners in the Court of Queen's Bench by John Joseph Stockdale.

That the following is a copy of such notice:—

"In the Queen's Bench.

"Between John Joseph Stockdale, plaintiff, and James Hansard, Luke Graves Hansard, and Luke James Hansard, defendants.

"Take notice, that a declaration against you is this day filed in the Queen's Bench Declaration Office, Temple, London, at the suit of the above-named plaintiff, in an action on the case, and that unless you plead thereto in eight days from the service hereof, judgment will be signed against you by default.

"Dated this 9th day of March, 1840.

"Yours, &c.,
"T. B. Howard,
"Plaintiff's Attorney,
"Norfolk Street, Strand."

"To James Hansard, Luke Graves
Hansard, and Luke James Hansard, the above-named defendants.

"Messrs. Hansard. Delivered at the office door in Westminster, 9th March, at ½ p. 12, P.M."

That your petitioners, in order to ascertain correctly the cause of action in such further or fifth suit, caused the declaration filed by the plaintiff in the Queen's Bench Declaration Office to be taken out of the said office, and of which declaration the following is a copy: —

"In the Queen's Bench.

"The ninth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty.

"Herts, to wit: John Joseph Stockdale, the plaintiff in this suit, by Thomas Burton Howard, his attorney, complains of James Hansard, Luke Graves Hansard, and Luke James Hansard, the defendants in this suit, who have been summoned to answer the said John Joseph Stockdale in an action on the case. For that whereas, before and at the time of committing the grievance hereinafter complained of, the said plaintiff was, and for a long time had been, a bookseller and publisher of books, and as such bookseller and publisher of books, had published divers and very many scientific books, and particularly, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, a certain physiological and anatomical book, written by a learned physician on the generative system, illustrated by anatomical plates. And whereas the said defendants, on the twenty-sixth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, did publish, and cause to be published, of and concerning the said plaintiff, in his said trade and business of a bookseller and publisher, in a certain book purporting to be Reports of the Inspectors of Prisons of Great Britain, the passage following, that is to say, 'This last is a book (meaning the said physiological and anatomical book) of a most disgusting nature, and the plates are indecent and obscene in the extreme.' Whereas, in truth and in fact, the said book is purely of a scientific character; yet the said defendants, well knowing the premises, but contriving and maliciously intending to defame and injure the said plaintiff in his said trade and business of a bookseller and publisher, and cause it to be believed that he published indecent and obscene books, on the second day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, maliciously and falsely did publish, and cause to be published, of and concerning the plaintiff, in his said trade and business of a bookseller and publisher, in a certain printed paper purporting to be a copy of the reply of the Inspectors of Prisons for the Home District, with regard to the Report of the Court of Aldermen to whom it was referred to consider the First Report of the Inspectors of Prisons, so far as relates to the gaol of Newgate; which said copy of the reply purports to be a letter from William Crawford and Whitworth Russell, Esquires, Inspectors of Prisons for the Home District, to the Right Honourable Lord John Russell, &c. &c. &c., the false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory libel following, that is to say; — 'But we deny that that book is a scientific work (using that term in its ordinary acceptation), or that the plates are purely anatomical, calculated only to attract the attention of persons connected with surgical science; and we adhere to the terms which we have already employed as those only by which to characterise such a book' (meaning thereby that the said book was disgusting and obscene, as stated in the above-mentioned Report of the Inspectors of Prisons of Great Britain). And, in another part of the said libel, to the tenour and effect following, that is to say;—'We also applied to several medical booksellers, who all gave it the same character. They described it as one of Stockdale's obscene books' (meaning thereby that the plaintiff was a common publisher of obscene books); 'that it never was considered a scientific work; that it never was written for, or bought by, the members of the profession as such; that it was intended to take young men in, by inducing them to give an exorbitant price for an indecent work,' to the great injury of the said plaintiff in his said trade and business, and also of his fair fame and reputation, and to the damage of the said plaintiff of fifty thousand pounds; and therefore he brings suit, &c.

"268. — In the Queen's Bench, the 9th day of March, 1840. Stockdale v. Hansard and others. The defendants must plead hereto in eight days, or judgment; and the plaintiff hereby demands a plea or judgment.

"T. B. Howard."

That your petitioners find, on examining the foregoing declaration with the declarations in the former actions against your petitioners, at the suit of the said John Joseph Stockdale, that the cause of action is identical, — namely, for the alleged publication of a libel of and concerning the plaintiff, contained in the Reports of the Inspectors of Prisons of Great Britain, and also in a letter addressed by the said inspectors to Lord John Russell.

That the said Reports and letter, in respect of which the present as well as the former actions were brought, were printed by your petitioners under the authority and by direction of your Honourable House.

Your petitioners therefore humbly pray the instructions of your Honourable House on the matter of this their petition, and on the course they should pursue with respect to the said notice and writ of inquiry.

To be taken into consideration tomorrow, and to be printed.

INLAND WAREHOUSING BILL.

Petition of the East and West India Dock Company (presented 21st February), referred to the Select Committee on Inland Warehousing.

COMMERCIAL LEAGUE WITH PRUSSIA. — BANKING ESTABLISHMENTS.

Mr. WODEHOUSE. — Sir, as considerable surprise has been created in the commercial world at the non-production of Dr. Bowring's Report on the Prussian Commercial League, and as great anxiety prevails to know the reason why it is not produced, I beg leave to give notice that, unless it be presented in the course of the present week, I shall feel it my duty to move that it be produced forthwith; but I hope the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs will not think that, by so doing, I wish to create any unnecessary embarrassment in his department. I also give notice, that it is my intention, on the nomination of the Select Committee on Banking, to put a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer respecting the exclusion, from the consideration of the Committee, of bills of exchange, which form so large an element of the circulation in the great manufacturing districts of the kingdom; and also another question respecting an inquiry relative to the continuance of one pound notes in Scotland and Ireland.

CHURCH RATES.

Mr. EASTHOPE. — I give notice, Sir, that, immediately after Easter, I shall move for leave to bring in a Bill to relieve Dissenters from the payment of church rates.

KING OF HANOVER. — WEST INDIA MAILS.

Mr. HUME. — I give notice that, on this day fortnight, I shall move for leave to bring in a Bill to suspend the yearly allowance of 21,000*l*. to the Duke of Cumberland, as long as he shall remain King of Hanover. I shall take this opportunity of withdrawing a motion, of which I have given notice, for a Select Committee to inquire as to the best mode of opening a steam communication for the mails to the West Indies and other places in North and South America, as I understand arrangements are making, or to be made, which will render that Committee unnecessary. My motion relative to the production of correspondence on Turkish affairs I now postpone to this day fortnight.

PRINTED PAPERS.

Mr. SPEAKER acquainted the House, that the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House had a communication to make to the House.

Whereupon, the Sergeant was called to the bar, and he informed the House that a writ in an action of trespass had been issued against certain officers of the House employed by him in the execution of the orders of this House, at the suit of Thomas Burton Howard, which had been served on some of them; — and then he delivered in the said writ, which was read at the table, as follows: —

Victoria, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith: — To Ralph Allen Gossett, Charles Stein, William Bellamy, John Mitchell, and John Lead, of the House of Commons, Palace Yard, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, greeting. We command you, that within eight days after the service of this writ on you, inclusive of the day of such service, you do cause an appearance to be entered for you in our Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster, in an action of trespass at the suit of Thomas Burton Howard; and take notice that, in default of your so doing, the said Thomas Burton Howard may cause an appearance to be entered for you, and proceed therein to judgment and execution. Witness, Thomas Lord Denman, at Westminster, the fourteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and forty.

(Indorsed.)

This writ was issued in person by the plaintiff within named, who resides at No. 7, Norfolk

Street, Strand, in the parish of Saint Clement Danes, in the county of Middlesex.

Matter to be considered to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS,

That they have agreed to Winchester Cemetery Bill; and Brighton Small Debts Bill, without amendment.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, 'An Act to dissolve the Marriage of James Perry, Esquire, with Elizabeth Margaret, his Wife, and to enable him to narry again, and for other Purposes."

CANADA CLERGY RESERVES.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — I wish to ask he Noble Lord whether the Canada Clergy Reserves Bill has been received t the Colonial Office, and whether it will e laid upon the table of the House with he sanction and approval of the Governnent?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — The Bill ıas been received; but it did not arrive ıntil the night before last, and I did not ee it until yesterday. I think it will be aid on the table of the House in the ourse of a few days.

WAR WITH CHINA.

Mr. MACKINNON. — I wish to ask he Noble Lord whether there is any ruth in a report which is very generally elieved, that war has been declared gainst China?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — No ofcial intelligence has been received mounting to a declaration of war against hina. Instructions were given to the overnor General of India to make cerain preparations; and, although no inelligence of the nature alluded to has een received, I presume that some diections given, or some act done, by the overnor General, has given rise to the eport of a declaration of war having been ıade.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — Supposing ıat, in consequence of the instructions iven by Her Majesty's Government to ıe Governor General of India, a delaration of war has been made, or some ublic document issued by the Governor eneral of India tantamount to a declaraon of war, I wish to ask the Noble Lord two questions; — first, whether that war, if proclaimed, will be carried on upon the supreme authority of this country, and at the expense of the United Kingdom; and secondly, whether or not Her Majesty's Government will bring down a message to Parliament, announcing that they have resorted to hostilities?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I apprehend, with regard to the first question, that any communication which may take place with the Government of China will be carried on in the name of the Queen of this country; and that whatever assistance shall be afforded by the Governor General of India to any operations which may be carried on in China, will be assistance lent to this country, under the responsibility of the Government of this country. With regard to the other question, it is not, at present, the intention of Her Majesty's Government to send down any message upon the subject to this House. We have already laid papers on the table which show the state of our relations with China.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — I am only supposing it to be the case that war has been proclaimed, on account of our present position with regard to China, which is very different from that in which we stood previously to the renewal of the charter of the East India Company. My question is, whether, in the event of hostilities being resolved on, any formal message will be sent down to the House?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — Any communications which may take place between this country and China will be carried on in the name of the Queen of Great Britain, and not in the name of the Governor General of India.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — That is the very reason why I put the question. In the case of an Indian war, I can quite understand why no message would be sent down to Parliament; because that course is prescribed by ordinary usage. But in this case, the Noble Lord has stated that hostilities are to be carried on at the charge of the country, and in the name of Her Majesty. I presume, therefore, that some formal communication will be made to Parliament on so important a measure as that of war, if a recourse to it be found necessary.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I used the word "communications," not "hostilities."

Mr. GEORGE PALMER. — Will the Noble Lord state whether there have been any instructions given to the superintendent at China, beyond those in the printed papers which have been laid before the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — The instructions given to the superintendent, up to a certain period, are contained in the papers before the House. Those which have since been given, I cannot be expected to make public.

CHINA — OPIUM COMPENSATION.

Mr. HERRIES. — I wish to know whether the Noble Lord can communicate to the House anything further relative to the parties claiming compensation for opium destroyed? No communication is to be found in the papers already produced of a later date than the 13th of June, 1839, from the superintendent at Canton. Are those all the papers that the Noble Lord means to lay before Parliament?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.—Every paper has been laid on the table of the House which has been moved for, or which it appears to be expedient to lay before the House, in order to afford full information on the subject.

REFORM IN THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I should be glad to learn when Her Majesty's Government intend to bring forward the long-promised measure of reform in the Court of Chancery?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I can hardly give an answer to the question, without anticipating the statement of the Lord Chancellor, in another place.

HILL COOLIES.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM. — I have reason to believe that the Commission which was appointed by the Governor General of India in council, in 1838, and which was to sit at Calcutta, has made a Report respecting the alleged abuses attending the emigration of Hill Coolies. Is the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies cognisant of any such document?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I am quite aware of the appointment of the Commission; but I have not received—neither has my Right Honourable Friend the President of the Board of Control—the Report of that Commission.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM.—I wish to know whether, in the absence of such a document, it is intended to proceed to a reversal of the decision prohibiting the emigration of Hill Coolies, which was adopted simultaneously with the Commission; or whether it is intended to suspend any further proceedings in reference to the subject, until the next Session of Parliament?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I should be very glad to produce that document if I possessed it, provided I had any reason to think, as the Right Honourable Baronet seems to think, that it bore upon the proposed question. I conceive that it does not bear upon the actual fact of the emigration of the Hill Coolies, previous to the prohibition; or that the general question is at all affected by it.

DEMERARA.

LORD STANLEY. — I understand that an Act, passed by the Legislature of Demerara, to encourage immigration into that colony, has been sent to this country, and disallowed; and, at the same time, that an Order in Council has been sent out, which the Legislature there was requested to pass, embodying the recommendations of Her Majesty's Government. If this information be correct, will the Noble Lord have any objection to lay the papers on the table?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — The Noble Lord is quite correct in his first assumption. The ordinance of the Demerara Legislature was sent to this country, and disallowed; and I believe the papers relating to it have been laid on the table. No Order in Council, however, has passed upon the subject; but a despatch has been written to the Governor of British Guiana, giving a sketch of an ordinance which, if passed by the Court of Policy there, will be satisfactory to the Government. It has been sent so lately, that it would be unusual, before the decision upon it has been received, to lay it on the table; although on no other ground should I object to its production.

LORD STANLEY. — Does that do-spatch assign the reasons for which the previous ordinance was disallowed?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — It does.

LIGHTING OF THE HOUSE.

LORD ELIOT. — Sir, in moving the resolution of which I have given notice, for completing the experiments of lighting the House by means of the Bude light, I shall trespass for a very short time only on the attention of Honourable Members. Almost all the scientific men who have been consulted on the subject of lighting the House, — at least, Professor Farraday, Sir D. Brewster, Dr. Ure, and Dr. Arnott, are of opinion that the present plan, that of wax candles, is objectionable; and have declared themselves in favour of the Bude light. The only exception is Mr. Brande; and he has not delivered a decisive opinion upon the subject. Scientific men are likewise agreed in this, that the difficulties of affording due ventilation, here, are excessive, owing to the frequent variations in the number of persons present; to the influx of air being sometimes too great, and sometimes quite insufficient; and that the Bude light will afford considerable facilities for remedying this evil. Some Honourable Members object to the Bude light as being too strong, and say that it affects their eyes; while others think it not strong enough, and say that they cannot read by it. Now, as I am informed, Mr. Gurney is prepared, if the House will agree upon the quantity of light which it is desirable to have, to give that precise quantity. With regard to the expense, — although the Bude light has cost, since the commencement of the Session, up to the day of its disuse, about 700*l.*,—it must be remembered that the apparatus is sufficient for lighting both Houses of Parliament. Besides, Mr. Gurney says that he can, by an improved process, diminish the expense to one fourth that of the wax candles. Those chandeliers alone have cost 520*l.*, exclusively of the ornamental work; which seems to have been intended by my Honourable and Gallant Friend (Sir F. Trench) exclusively for the benefit of gentlemen who sit in the galleries, as it is completely lost to those who occupy the body of the House. The expense of wax candles amounts to 6*l.* 2*s.* a-night; so that the Bude light, even in its recent, imperfect, and therefore, more costly, condition, is less expensive than the wax candles. There is another circumstance which, as it may be attended with accident, ought not to be overlooked. Each of the lustres at present in use, including the shade, weighs 6 cwt., and it appears to me that the chains by which they hang are composed of links hardly strong enough for such a purpose. On the other hand, it is said that there is a liability to explosion, from the Bude light, which might be attended with still more serious consequences. Now, that is an opinion which I feel perfectly assured no man of science entertains; and as to the disagreeable odour imputed to it, I am enabled to inform the House, on the authority of the Honourable Member for Lambeth, that there is no foundation for that statement. For these reasons, I think the House is bound to go fully and fairly into the experiment recommended by the Committee. Let Honourable Members bear in mind that Mr. Gurney has no interest in the new plan of lighting the House, beyond that which he feels as a man of science. I therefore move, Sir, "That the preparations for lighting the House by means of the Bude light, not having been completed when the experiment was made, the merits of the plan have not been fairly tested:

That these preparations be completed during the ensuing Easter recess; and that a further trial of this mode of lighting the House be immediately afterwards made."

MR. JAMES. — I have great pleasure, Sir, in seconding the motion. I do not believe there is any Member in the House who suffers more from defective sight than I do; and I must confess, that I experienced the greatest possible relief when the unseemly chandeliers were taken away, and the Bude light substituted, which I hope very soon again to see restored.

SIR FREDERICK TRENCH. — The only object I have in view is that Honourable Members should have that light which is most agreeable to them. I will not say one word in favour or against either mode of lighting the House, as Honourable Members are competent, from the experiments that have been made, to form their own opinions upon that point. There is one circumstance, however, which I cannot omit noticing, in consequence of what has fallen from the Noble Lord. I have recently, Sir, taken the trouble to ascertain the weight of the lustres in various public buildings; which enables me to state that the lustre in the chief room in Almacks weighs 6 cwt.; that in the National Gallery, 17 cwt.; in the pit of the Opera House, 14 cwt.; in Covent Garden Theatre, 18 cwt.; in Drury Lane Theatre, 7 cwt.; and in some public show-room, 15 cwt. The lustres of the House, with shades and chains, amounted to 6 cwt. only. The shades, too, can be formed of lighter material, so as to render them less cumbrous. With respect to the expense of candles, there is an error in the calculation made by the Noble Lord; because the 6*l*., which he has stated to be the expense of each night, does not extend to the candles used in the House merely, but to lights consumed in the coffee-room, reading-room, and other apartments, besides; so that the real expense for the House is not more than 3*l*. per night. The experiments on the Bude light, which have cost the country already 750*l*., have, in my opinion, been fairly tested, and found insufficient.

SIR CHARLES LEMON. — I shall support the motion, Sir, because I consider that the experiments which we are called on to make will not only be of advantage to this House, but afford a safe guide to the lighting of the future Houses of Parliament, which are in the course of construction. At the commencement of this Session, I was struck with the appearance of the interior of the House, owing to the adoption of the Bude light; but since the introduction of these domestic lights, the wax candles, with the overhanging opaque bodies, flanked on one side with a petticoat, and on the other with an apron, the whole architectural beauty of the House has been destroyed.

Mr. GOULBURN. — For my part, Sir, I must say that I prefer the continuance of the wax lights. But under any circumstances, I protest against the principle of the Honourable Member opposite, that I am to be made a corpus vile for a series of experiments!

SIR THOMAS ACLAND. — The half-perfected Bude light is, in my opinion, superior to the wax lights; and I shall, therefore, support the motion. At all events, after expending 700*l*. in an experiment, we cannot, consistently, refuse 50*l*. or 100*l*., in order to complete it.

The House divided: — Ayes 136, Noes 86; Majority 50.

Resolutions agreed to.

HEALTH OF TOWNS.

On the motion of Mr. Slaney, Seect Committee appointed, to inquire into he circumstances affecting the health f the inhabitants of large towns and opulous districts, with a view to improved anatory regulations for their benefit.

FIRST FRUITS AND TENTHS.

Resolutions reported: —

1. That it is expedient to make provision for he abolition of first fruits and tenths of the lergy, as at present enforced in England and Wales, after the next avoidance; and in lieu hereof to levy an annual assessment of one tenth art of the clear annual value upon all archishoprics and bishoprics, and upon all dignities, enefices, and other spiritual promotions above he clear yearly value of 300*l.*, to be applied, in the first instance, to the augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy, and afterwards to the building and rebuilding of churches, and such other purposes as may conduce to the interests of religion.

2. That the chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill pursuant to the said resolution.

First resolution read a second time; motion made, and question put, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said resolution."

Mr. GOULBURN. — Sir, after the discussion which took place a few evenings ago, upon this subject, I shall not again enter upon it; but I feel so strong an objection to this resolution, in principle, that I cannot refrain from calling on the House to negative it.

Mr. BAINES. — Having, on the occasion alluded to, explained my views on this subject, at considerable length, I shall at present merely add, that, in the Bill I propose to introduce, I do not wish, rigidly, to adhere to the assessment of rates mentioned in the Report, though, I conceive that that will generally be considered very moderate. I shall, however, leave it to the House, in the progress of the Bill, to regulate the amount of payment to be made out of the higher livings, for the augmentation of the lower; and to award to the labouring clergy such proportion of the real annual income of all livings above 300*l.* a-year, as they may think necessary to maintain the station of the labouring clergy, and to secure to them and their families a competent support.

The House divided: — Ayes 46, Noes 54; — Majority against the resolution 9.

VACCINATION EXTENSION BILL.

On the motion of Lord Ellenborough, read a second time (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, I have to present to your Lordships a Bill to facilitate the better administration of justice, which I trust your Lordships will permit to be now read a first time. I shall postpone the second reading until my Noble Friend the Chief Baron of the Exchequer shall have arrived in town; as he may wish to examine its provisions.

Bill read a first time, and to be printed.

COPYHOLD ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

LORD REDESDALE. — My Lords, I have to move that your Lordships will permit to be read a first time the Bill which I hold in my hand. It is a Bill for the commutation of certain manorial rights in respect of lands of copyhold and customary tenure, and of other lands subject to such rights, and for facilitating the enfranchisement of such lands. I will, in a few words, explain to your Lordships my reasons for introducing it. Many objections have been made to the Copyholds Enfranchisement Bill, which is now before a Select Committee of your Lordships' House, and which, it is feared, if carried into effect, will, in some instances, be subversive of the rights of property. As it is not possible that its defects can be remedied in the Committee, I have thought it better to introduce a new Bill, which, I trust, will obviate the difficulties and evils complained of. I shall move, therefore, that the Bill be now read a first time; and I shall fix the day for the second reading after my Noble Friend (Lord Brougham) shall have returned from the Continent.

Bill read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

CRIME IN IRELAND.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — My Lords, I wish, for a moment, to recur to the case of the convict Lyman, and to inquire whether the Noble Marquess opposite has any objection to lay before your Lordships any memorial that may have been presented to the Government for the commutation of that sentence?

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— I cannot answer the question of the Noble Marquess until I have communicated with my Noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. —In ordinary times, we might accept such a formal excuse; but, after what has occurred before your Lordships, I think that the well-conditioned part of the Irish community have a right to expect something better than the practice which appears lately to have prevailed, in granting pardons. I think, my Lords, that when —so far as they know, and so far as any information they have received extends — the sentence of a very great offender has been commuted without any communication having been had with the learned judge who tried the case, they have a right to know why so irregular a proceeding has been adopted. The Noble Marquess has not informed the House whether such a communication has or has not taken place.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. —I declined to answer the question, because I could not do so without entering into a discussion of the whole subject. If the Noble Marquess makes a motion on the subject, he can then make a speech; and I shall be prepared to answer it.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. —When I was interrupted by the Noble Marquess, I had not any intention of making a speech. I was merely about to observe that, in ordinary times, I should have been perfectly satisfied with the answer of the Noble Marquess. But, looking to the peculiar state of the present times, it is not at all satisfactory. I am quite sure that the Sovereign, in this country, would not venture to commute the punishment of death without communicating, in the first place, with the judge who had tried the case. When I ask the Noble Marquess whether, in this instance, such a communication took place, he refuses to answer "ay" or "no;" but he states that, if a motion should be made on the subject, he will meet it. I cannot collect from that, that what I understand to have taken place may not be repeated. A few days ago, an Honourable Member of the House of Commons brought in a Bill to abolish the punishment of death in cases of murder. That proposition was negatived; and the necessity for resorting to the punishment of death in atrocious cases was thus affirmed. Shall, then, the people of Ireland alone be deprived of the protection afforded by this punishment. Are we to suppose that any person who happens to be placed at the head of the Irish Government can take on himself, at his pleasure, to dispense with the sentences passed on offenders of the worst description? Your Lordships, I conceive, are not fairly treated when the Noble Marquess refuses to answer whether, in this instance, the sentence has been commuted after communication with the judge who tried the criminal, or without any such communication. The person to whom mercy has been thus extended was, it should be observed, the principal — the planner — of the murder which was committed in the metropolis of Ireland, and on account of which several persons were executed.

The EARL of CHARLEVILLE.— My Lords, after what has fallen from my Noble Friend, I submit that the Noble Marquess is bound to give some direct answer to his question. He ought to state whether the Noble Viscount (Lord Ebrington) has commuted the punishment of this convict, after sentence of death had been passed on him in the most solemn way, without having first communicated with the judge before whom his trial took place, that convict being the principal in the murder for which others had suffered. In the last Session, your Lordships agreed to this resolution: — "That it is the duty of the executive Government, when considering any case of conviction had before any of the King's judges, with a view to remitting or commuting the sentence, to apply for information to the judge or judges who tried the case, and to afford such judge or judges an opportunity of giving their opinion on such case, unless circumstances should exist which render any such application impossible, or only possible with an inconvenient delay; but that it is not necessary that the executive Government should be bound to follow the advice, if any, tendered by such judge or judges." Now, after the passing of that resolution, which clearly recognised the propriety of a communication by the Government with the judge before whom a criminal was tried, prior to extending mercy to such criminal, it appears to me that the Noble Marquess is bound to give the information demanded by my Noble Friend. If he should persist in declining, I trust that my Noble Friend will give notice of a motion to compel the Noble Marquess to disclose the fact; and to declare whether, contrary to usage and to the resolution on your Lordships' table, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has commuted the sentence of this criminal without any reference to the judge by whom he had been tried.

CROWN LANDS IN CANADA.

The DUKE of ARGYLL. — May I inquire of the Noble Viscount whether Government has received any address from the House of Assembly in Canada, with respect to the disposal of the Crown lands in that province?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — Some papers have arrived, but I cannot say whether any of them refer to that subject. I will, however, inquire.

PAPERS, &c.

On the motion of the Earl of Glengall, Return of all Reports made by stipendiary magistrates and officers of the police to the Inspector General of the Constabulary, of outrages which have been committed within the several counties of Ireland, from the 1st of January, 1839, to the 31st of December, 1839.

Copies of correspondence between John Bagwell, Esquire, and the Commissioners of Poor Laws in Ireland, respecting the appointment of a returning officer for the Clonmel union, in the year 1839; also, copies of correspondence between R. P. Vowell, Esquire, and the above Commissioners, with a copy of a protest forwarded by him on behalf of certain rate-payers of the Kilronau electoral division, in the union of Clonmel, respecting the conduct of the messengers employed by the returning officer of that division, dated in the year 1839.

Ordered to be laid before the House.

Copy of the several warrants of the Poor Law Commissioners constituting the union of Kells, in the county of Meath; the union of Old Castle, in the county of Meath; and the union of Mullingar, in the county of Westmeath. — Delivered (pursuant to order of the 2d instant), and to be printed.

First Report of the General Board of Directors of Prisons in Scotland. — Delivered (by command), and ordered to lie on the table.

Copy of warrant granting compensation to the Right Honourable William Dundas, as keeper of Her Majesty's signet for Scotland: And, also,

Copy of warrant granting compensation to Colin Galbraith, clerk to the keeper of the minute book of the Court of Session (Scotland), Delivered (pursuant to Acts), and ordered to lie on the table.

Adjourned.

Taff Vale Railway Bill. — Petitions against, — from the Marquess of Bute; William Thompson and Thomas Seaton Forman; and Richard Hill. — Referred o the Committee on the Bill; counsel ordered.

Petitions from owners and occupiers of lands, mines, &c. lying near the Taff Vale Railway (three petitions); owners and occupiers of estates lying near the said Railway; owners and occupiers of estates within and inhabitants of Newbridge; Cardiff; and tradesmen and inhabitants of Merthyr Tydvil (presented 10th of March). — Referred to the Committee on the Bill.

Staines Bridge.—Petition from Staines, for throwing the same open to the public free of toll. — To lie on the table.

Glasgow Poor Rate Bill. — Petition of elders and managers of the Relief Church, John Street, Glasgow, against. — To lie on the table.

London and Greenwich Railway Bill. — Petitions against, — from the commissioners of highways of St. Mary Magdalen, Bermondsey; churchwardens and overseers, and governors and directors of St. John, Southwark; London and Brighton Railway Company; and commissioners for paving the borough of Southwark. — Referred to the Committee on the Bill; counsel ordered.

CAPTAIN ALSAGER. — I have now, Sir, to present a petition from the president, treasurer, and grand committee of governors of St. Thomas's Hospital, praying that the Committee on the London and Greenwich Railway Bill may be postponed; and, agreeably to the notice I gave yesterday on the subject, I beg leave to move that the Committee on the Bill, which now stands for Tuesday, the 17th of the present month, may be postponed till Wednesday, the 1st of April.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

Question put, — "That the Committee on the London and Greenwich Railway Bill be deferred till Wednesday, the 1st day of April."

MR. W. ATTWOOD. — It is important that, in the proceedings relating to private Bills, we should adhere as closely as possible to the established practice. I believe this motion has not been made with the consent of the Committee generally; and as the object of the proposition is a departure from the usual course, I think the House ought not to sanction it.

LORD G. SOMERSET. — I confess that I can see no reason why the House should refuse its assent to my Honourable and Gallant Friend's motion. The proposition is not to break in upon any of the essential Standing Orders relating to Private Bills, but merely that the Committee may be postponed, in order that the two Bills may be before them at one time.

Mr. W. ATTWOOD. — I think the motion is a most unprecedented one; and if it be pressed, I shall certainly divide the House against it.

The House then divided: — Ayes 30, Noes 5; Majority 25.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Fourteenth Report brought up, and read. — To lie on the table, and to be printed.

ANSWER TO ADDRESS.

(March 10th), Reported.

OPIUM TRADE.

Mr. CRAWFORD. — I will avail myself of the present opportunity to give notice, that, on Monday next, I intend to present a petition from certain individuals interested in the opium which has been delivered up by the superintendent at Canton for the use of Her Majesty's Government.

[Laughter.]

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I wish, also, to give notice, that, on Thursday, the 26th of March, I will call the attention of the House to the circumstances under which opium grown in India is imported into China.

DR. BOWRING'S REPORT.

Mr. WODEHOUSE. — Understanding that my former notice of a motion for the production of Dr. Bowring's Report upon the subject of the Russian commercial league is irregular in point of form, I beg now to give notice, that, on Tuesday next, I propose to move for an Address to Her Majesty, praying that she will be pleased to direct the said Report to be forthwith laid before the House.

CONSTABULARY.

The EARL of LINCOLN. — I wish to ask when the Constabulary Bill, which the Under Secretary for the Home Department has obtained leave to bring in, will be produced?

Mr. FOX MAULE. — The Bill to which the Noble Lord refers has been delayed, in consequence of the various communications and suggestions which it was desired to embody in the Bill; but to prevent further delay from the same cause, I will bring forward the Bill at once.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I observe that despatches have been received from New South Wales recently; perhaps, therefore, the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies will allow me to repeat a question which I asked the other night, respecting the proceedings of the Legislative Council of that colony. The question is, whether the proposition that has been made by the Governor in council, that schools should be established for Roman Catholics, in which the tenets of the Roman Catholic church were to be taught to the scholars, and that other schools should be provided for Members of the Church of England, in which the doctrines of the Church of England were not to be taught, has been made under the instructions of Her Majesty's Government?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I have not yet received any despatch on that subject, when I do, I will take care that the Right Honourable Gentleman shall be made acquainted with it.

WAR WITH CHINA.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — I wish to repeat another question, which I put to the Noble Lord on a former evening. On that occasion, I asked the Noble Lord whether Her Majesty's Government had received any official information of an action which had taken place in the waters of Canton, between two of Her Majesty's frigates and some war vessels of China? The Noble Lord, in reply, stated, that he had received no official information upon the subject, but that a private letter, which had been addressed by Captain Smith to the late Admiral Maitland, giving an account of such an action, had been received. I wish, now, to ask the Noble Lord, whether he has yet received any official information on the subject, and whether any satisfactory statement can be made as to the amount of loss that was sustained on either side in the action?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — No official information has yet been received by the Government on the subject. The Right Honourable Gentleman asked me, the other day, whether the details, as stated in the private letter to which allusion has been made, could be laid before the House. I have since looked at that letter, and I do not think it is a communication of that nature which could properly be laid before the House.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — But the purport of it?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — The only material statement in the letter is, that the order to cease firing was not given by the commissioner, but by the British officer commanding the force.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — Was there no communication by the last mail?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — None.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — Will the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs allow me to ask him whether no intelligence has been received at the Foreign Office from Captain Elliot, up to a later period than the date of the action?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — No accounts whatever have been received of a later date than those which have been laid on the table of the House.

CULTIVATION OF TEA IN INDIA.

Mr. EWART. — I wish to ask the Right Honourable the President of the Board of Control whether he is able to give the House any further information regarding the growth of tea in India? and also, whether he has any communication make respecting the letting of free ls in that country?

SIR J. HOBHOUSE. — I shall be happy to lay before the House all the information I am in possession of upon both points.

ADMISSION OF TEA.

Mr. HERRIES. — Will the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, the President of the Board, be good enough to state whether there is any objection to the production of the communication to the Board of Customs for the admission of tea, water-borne, at Canton, by American craft, and afterwards shipped in British vessels? The reason why I ask whether there will be any objection to the production of the papers, is, that in one despatch of Captain Elliot, he particularly recommends to the Government at home that such tea should not be admitted.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I think it would be most inexpedient for me to depart from the almost invariable practice of not making public those confidential communications which take place between the Treasury or the Board of Trade and the Board of Customs. I may, however, state, with regard to the point to which the Right Honourable Gentleman refers, that I have no hesitation in saying, that Her Majesty's Government have not thought it expedient to act upon the suggestion of Captain Elliot. They have not thought it expedient to prevent the admission of tea brought into this country in British vessels, where the voyage has been bona fide performed from the seas of China, in British vessels; and, in so acting, they believe they are adhering to the letter and the spirit of the Navigation Act. We have not thought it expedient to act on the suggestion of Captain Elliot, or that the trade between China and Great Britain should be stopped, even under the existing circumstances.

Mr. HERRIES. — The Right Honourable Gentleman appears to have misunderstood me. I did not ask for any confidential communications, but for an order which I am informed has been made to the Board of Customs, to admit tea brought to this country in British bottoms, after having been transferred from American ships. That, surely, cannot be considered a confidential communication. But it is an order which everybody should be made acquainted with; and certainly it ought not to be refused to the House of Commons. I have no intention to offer any opinion with regard to the propriety of making such an order.

MR. LABOUCHERE. — I will make inquiries; and, if any such order has been issued, I apprehend there will be no objection to its production. The question being one of great importance, it has been thought necessary to enter into communication with the Board of Customs upon the whole matter. I thought the Right Honourable Gentleman's question referred to those communications, which he must be aware are of a confidential character.

PRIVILEGES.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — As I presume the House will be desirous to go at once into the Committee on the Printed Papers Bill, I do not propose to move the consideration of the privilege question that stands for this evening.

PRINTED PAPERS BILL.

On the motion of LORD J. RUSSELL, the Order of the Day for Committee resumed.

Upon the question being put, that " Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair," —

SIR E. SUGDEN said: — I think it will probably facilitate the passing of the Bill through Committee if I state, at the outset, as briefly as I can, the object of the Bill, and the nature of the amendment I mean to propose. After the preamble, section 1. provides, without asserting the right of the House to interfere against a court of law, that persons civilly or criminally proceeded against for any publication made by the authority of this House are to obtain a certificate from the Speaker of the House, and the action is to be put an end to. The second section applies to a totally different matter, — namely, the actions that have been brought by Mr. Howard against the messengers of this House for an alleged trespass, in the execution of the Speaker's warrant. The two sections stand upon totally distinct grounds; and then there is a concluding proviso, that nothing contained in the Act shall affect the privileges of this House. It has been erroneously supposed, out of the House, that I have objected to the ex post facto nature of the Bill; but I have done no such thing. What I propose to do is, in Committee, to introduce certain words into the first clause, giving to persons not the original publishers of the publications of the House the same remedy, with respect to what has already been published, as the Bill proposes to give to what may be published in future by the House. I further propose to extend the protection of the measure to Members of this House. As the law at present stands, there is no protection for a Member who, receiving printed papers, forwarded by order of the House, publishes those papers by giving copies of them to other parties. Now, when the Bill goes into Committee, I purpose proposing such a provision as shall be a sufficient protection to Members of this House, and not be unjust towards the rest of the community. That will make the first clause perfect, as far as it goes, in that respect. In another part of the Bill, I intend to propose the insertion of the word " papers; " the language already contained in the Bill not being, in my opinion, sufficiently comprehensive; for the words " Votes, Reports, and proceedings," I apprehend are not sufficient to cover every species of paper which the House may have occasion to publish. There is another point to which I wish to direct the attention of Honourable Members, — namely, that the privileges of this House remain untouched by the present measure. The powers of the House will, after this Bill shall have passed, be as great as they have ever been. Suppose, then, any man in society, conceiving himself aggrieved, shall think proper to bring an action against the printer of this House; suppose that, by the powers granted under the present Bill, that action is stopped, there still will be nothing to prevent a House of Commons sending the person who brings the action to prison; and, as its privileges remain untouched, it may, for a long time, keep in confinement the offending party. Any man who so brings an action may, for breach of privilege, be sent to Newgate, or to the Tower, or committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, according to the pleasure of the House. Paying, then, due regard to the liberty of the subject, I must be permitted to say that I think a measure of this kind ought to contain a clause to restrain the House from such an exercise of its authority. I propose to meet the injustice which the Bill, in its present form, will occasion, by a proviso, declaring that if the plaintiff in an action, or his attorney, be committed by either House of Parliament, and that the action brought has been stopped under and by authority of the present Bill, such parties shall forthwith be discharged by the House which has committed them. I propose to follow this up, in accordance with the principle of the last section in the Bill, which declares that nothing in the Act shall affect the privileges of the House, by declaring that nothing shall extend the privileges of the House. I need hardly add, that I make this proposition with the fullest wish to render the measure as efficient as possible, and, at the same time, ancillary to the power of the House. Another proposition which I intend to submit to the Committee is, to omit the second clause. I do not object to the first clause; because it is necessary to stop vexatious actions; but I do to the second clause; because no one can contend à priori that the action is vexatious. That clause depends on this state of things. A warrant is issued, and committed to the servants of the House to be executed. However the power of the House may be undenied and undeniable in the issuing of the warrant, yet it has been clearly laid down; and, indeed, it is of the essence of justice, as well as being law, that if the officer of the House commits an excess in the execution of the warrant, the person against whom it is directed may recover, not for the due execution of the warrant, but for the excess committed in the supposed execution of it. If the warrant is unduly executed, your officer must suffer, and has no right to protection from this House. Indeed, I think the Noble Lord, himself, who did not originally introduce this clause into the Bill, will, upon consideration, be inclined to strike it out.

Mr. PEMBERTON. — I think, Sir, before the Bill goes into Committee, we should have some further explanation of its object. I am willing to make a sacrifice of my individual opinion, if it will lead to any satisfactory result; but I think we ought to be told to what extent the Bill is intended to go, and whom and what it is intended to protect? I presume it is intended to protect all persons against whom actions are brought for libellous matter contained in publications of the House of Commons, and that it is not intended to go further. But, as it stands at present, no action can be brought on account of the publication of any Reports, Votes, or proceedings of the House of Commons; and the Bill goes, in fact, to the extent of preventing a man from bringing an action for the wages of his labour in printing those publications. I wish, also, to know, whether the Bill is intended to protect violations of copyright? The House once published, in an Appendix, a work, of which the copyright was valuable, a pamphlet of Mr. Croker's, and complaint was made of the violation of the copyright. The consequence was, that Mr. Hansard paid 100*l*., as compensation for that violation, which, of course, was repaid to him by the Treasury. I ask, then, whether the Bill is intended to prevent such violation of copyright; and if so, whether the protection is to be general. Or do you mean that any publisher, who buys, upon an allowance of 25 per cent., which is made in order to encourage the sale, shall be exempted from that protection, and liable to the consequences of publication? Or, if a person reprint and republish any of your publications without your authority, am I to understand that he will also be exempted from protection? Do you mean that extracts from your privileged publications, — extracts, too, which may be garbled for the purpose of injuring particular individuals, — do you mean that those extracts should be privileged, or not? Until you answer me these questions, I know not how you expect to come to a settlement of the general question in Committee. Recollect, that when once papers are issued by order of the House, you can exercise no control over the booksellers who may purchase from your printer? I say, then, that a Bill so loose ought not to be put upon the table of the House; — a Bill the extent of which no one can positively determine. I should be glad to hear from my Honourable and Learned Friend opposite (the Solicitor General), who takes such an anxious interest in the success of the measure, although his name is no longer on the back of it, how far it is really intended to go. I confess I wish to see the provisions of the Bill more clearly and exactly set forth than they are at present. I am quite ready to stop all actions, nay to do more than this Bill proposes with respect to all actions in future. If a proper mode for stopping them be pointed out, I shall have no objection to make the party bringing the action liable to the costs of such action.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — On moving for leave to bring in the Bill, I stated generally, what the object of it was; and as to the precise words which it may be advisable to introduce for carrying out that object, I do not think they ought to be discussed at this stage of the measure. It is certainly the intention of the Bill to give protection to the publishers acting under the authority of the House. Upon going over the Bill, a doubt arose in my mind as to whether persons who re-sold should be likewise protected. This, I think, is a very important question, and very proper for the consideration of the Committee. Respecting the words of the Bill, the Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite is, I readily admit, a much better authority than I can be; at the same time, I doubt, very much, if they will bear some of the interpretations which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has put upon them. I have received suggestions upon the propriety of various alterations in the Bill, which only show me how extremely difficult it is to draw clauses, in such a Bill, the words of which will not be open to very great objections. But I will not, as I have said, enter, at present, into the questions suggested by the Right Honourable Member for Ripon, as they will be much better discussed in Committee.

The House then went into committee.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — Sir, I cannot consent to adopt the first clause of this Bill, unaltered. The Noble Lord stated the object of the clause to be, to prevent vexatious actions; but I should like to know upon what authority is it to be decided that the actions, already begun, are vexatious? In the case of Stockdale, we have the authority of more than one jury, that the action was not a vexatious action. It is too much to say that, after a verdict actually obtained, all pending actions for the like cause are groundless and vexatious. I agree with my Right Honourable Friend (Sir E. Sugden) that, by this clause, protection should be extended not merely to the printers of the House, but to persons who may reprint any of our publications. I wish to see protection afforded in such a case as that, for instance, in which an action was brought against the Times newspaper, for publishing a Report made to the other House of Parliament. My object in rising at this moment, however, is, to suggest to the Committee the omission of the words in the first clause, that give to the Bill a retrospective effect.

Mr. BERNAL. — The Honourable Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford is not quite in order, as the clause has not been read.

First clause read. ("Proceedings, criminal or civil, against persons for publication of papers printed by order of Parliament, to be stayed, upon delivery of a certificate and affidavit to the effect that such publication is by order of either House of Parliament.")

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN. — I have an amendment to propose, which comes into this clause before that of my Honourable Friend. The object of it I have already explained to the House. After the word "defendants," in the twentieth line, I wish, by way of amendment, to add words which will enable any defendants, whether actual publishers under the authority of either House of Parliament or not, and whether Members of this House or not, to plead the defence given by this Act.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — The alteration proposed by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman I must object to; as it goes very much beyond the object of the Bill, as stated by the Noble Lord on moving for leave to bring it in. The Bill has been framed to meet a particular evil, — the evil of inconvenience and expense which the officers of the House may be put to by these actions being brought against them during the recess; and to answer that purpose the machinery of the Bill, in its present state, is quite sufficient. With regard to the officers of the House, there can be no malicious object in their publications; but if the House goes beyond that, it will be undertaking to protect persons for publications under circumstances of which it is quite ignorant. I therefore submit to my Right Honourable Friend that it is not expedient to make such an alteration in this Bill.

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN. — I am aware that if my amendment were agreed to, the Bill would require other machinery; I shall not, therefore, press it. The object I have in view is, to assert the principle; and, without asking the House to divide, I shall merely require the question to be put from the Chair. I hope, however, that the Noble Lord will take into consideration the propriety of framing a separate Bill to effect the object of my amendment, containing machinery better adapted to effect it than the machinery of this Bill, which, I candidly admit, is not framed for that purpose.

Amendment put, and negatived.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — The object of my amendment, I have already said, is, to take away the retrospective effect of this clause. I therefore move that the words "heretofore, now, or," in page 1. line 20., be omitted.

Mr. HUME. — No objection was made by the Honourable Baronet to the Horse-racing Bill, although it, like this Bill, has a retrospective effect.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS.—Because the actions which that Bill provides against are not actions in which the party has damage done to his character. That was the reason I gave a silent assent to that Bill.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 179, Noes 9; Majority 170.

SIR WILLIAM FOLLETT.—As the clause now stands, it is doubtful who are the persons entitled to protection under it; for they are described merely as defendants who are sued or prosecuted on account or in respect of the publication of any Reports, Votes, or Proceedings by or under the authority of either House of Parliament. If it be intended to confine the protection to those who have the authority of the House to publish its proceedings, it would be better that the meaning should be expressly so declared.

LORD STANLEY.—The present wording of the clause certainly appears to protect every person publishing or selling a work authorised by the House to be published.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL.—The

Sir, in order to remove that ambiguity, I shall move that, after the word "publication," the words "by such defendant or defendants, or their servants," be added.

Agreed to.

Mr. GISBORNE. — I stated, on a former occasion, that I should not object to this Bill, if it came down from the House of Lords. I now, Sir, must object to it as interfering with the privileges of that House. The words of the clause are, "by or under the authority of either House of Parliament." I think the House of Lords ought to be allowed to protect itself, and that this Bill should be confined exclusively to the privileges of this House. The Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for Tamworth said, on the occasion I have alluded to, that the Bill ought not to originate with the Lords, lest it should seem to be an interference, by them, with the privileges of the Commons. I should like to know, then, how that Right Honourable Gentleman can now support a set of words by which this House will be guilty of the very same interference with the privileges of the Lords? Why do to the Lords what you will not brook that the Lords should do to you? The Lords require no such aid as this Bill; for they have not been foiled in attempts to vindicate their privileges or proceedings. I therefore move that, instead of the words "either House of Parliament," there be substituted the words "the House of Commons."

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — I certainly did state that this Bill ought not to originate in the House of Lords; because I thought it would be a very unusual course, on the part of that House, to interfere, without any previous communication on the subject from the House of Commons; and that that could scarcely take place, in this instance, owing to the difficulty of asking for a free conference. On the other hand, I think it is quite right to include the House of Lords in this Bill; because the judgment of the Queen's Bench has shaken their privileges as much as ours. Though the House of Lords do not sell their papers, they publish them in a way which, in the eye of the law, as laid down by the Queen's Bench, subjects their servants to actions, as much as if they were sold. In Polack's case, for instance, the subject of the action arose in a Committee of the House of Lords. There is one ground which renders the provisions of the Bill even more necessary in the case of the House of Lords than in that of the House of Commons; for we have in our favour the argument, that communications between us and our constituents are privileged and necessary.

Mr. VERNON HARCOURT. — It seems to me doubtful whether the Bill, as at present framed, will protect the communications of Honourable Members with their constituents. I should, therefore, be glad to see words introduced for the purpose of giving efficient protection to such communications.

Mr. DARBY. — It appears to me, that giving away is as much publication as selling.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — It is quite evident that Members of Parliament ought to have the privilege of giving copies of printed papers to their constituents; as they may often feel it necessary to justify themselves before their constituency for the line of conduct they may think fit to pursue in Parliament. I have the strongest conviction that this is a privileged publication, and indispensably necessary to the discharge of our duties as a legislative assembly; that is, provided the publication be a fair one, and not a selection of any particular portion, made with any invidious purpose. However, the decision has been, not that a Member may have such a communication as that with his constituents, but that he may forward the papers, "provided they contain nothing criminatory of any individual," which certainly would entirely change the effect of that privilege.

The paragraph was agreed to.

Upon the next paragraph being put, —

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN said: — I move that the word "papers" be inserted after the word "Reports;" for, in the technical sense of the word, as used in the House, "Reports" do not include papers; but "papers" include "Reports."

Amendment agreed to.

LORD STANLEY. — I move that this be the form of the certificate: "That the Report, Papers, Votes, or Proceedings, as the case may be, in respect whereof the suit or prosecution had been instituted, had been published by the defendants in the suit or prosecution, under the authority of the Houses of Lords or Commons, as the case may be."

Motion agreed to.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I move "that there be an affidavit verifying the said certificate, and that a notice of these be served on the plaintiff, or at his residence; from and after which all proceedings, civil or criminal, shall be stayed."

SIR F. POLLOCK. — I do not approve of the mode in which the action is to be stayed. The usual mode would be for the affidavit to be made before the judge, that the publication was under the authority of the House, and the judge could then stay the action. Suppose that the Messrs. Hansard published some matter for which an action were taken: — who would be the fit person to decide whether it was a publication under this authority of the House? You make the Speaker of the House the judge of that, under this Bill. It would be, in my opinion, far better to allow the defendant to make the application by affidavit, and, with the production of the certificate in the ordinary manner, before the court, to have the action stayed. I cannot think that allowing the Speaker alone to decide is the correct mode of doing it. In any case, this will not evade the authority of the court; for the proceedings can be effectually stayed only by the authority of the court.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — The application to the court has been omitted, after deliberate consideration; and there are numerous Acts of Parliament which give power to stay proceedings without an application to the court to do it. For my part, I think it is of importance that the court should not be called on to act; for it would, doubtless, give rise to cases where a cause of conflict might occur between the court and this House. My Honourable and Learned Friend has supposed a case where a publication might not be strictly by the order of the House; but I must say, that it would be the duty of the House — and nothing would be more easy than — to ascertain if such publication was really of that description which came within the terms? We are now seeking for a means of settling the question by a summary power, and why should we not make that power depend on ourselves? I think any interference on the part of the court would injure the effect of the Bill. In Acts of Indemnity, proceedings are stayed without the interference of the court, and what might be just claims are withheld, through a consideration for the public good. I do not think that we could do anything more offensive to the courts, than to require their interference to stop proceedings; and I hope the House will be content to rest on its own authority in this matter.

SIR F. POLLOCK. — I merely suggested a difficulty which I thought might be likely to arise; but if we pass this Bill, of course its provisions will be carried into effect by the court. I have expressed my opinion with respect to making the Speaker judge in the matter; but if the House should think fit to adopt this provision, I shall make no further observation.

The clause was then agreed to, with the amendments.

Clause 2. was then read, as follows: — "And whereas, during the present Session of Parliament, certain warrants have been granted by the Speaker of the House of Commons, under the authority of said House, in relation to the matter aforesaid, and a certain action, or actions, have been or may be brought for certain alleged trespasses in the execution of the said warrants, and it is expedient that such action or actions should be put an end to, and finally determined, discharged, and made void by virtue of this Act; be it enacted, that all and every action hereafter brought or prosecuted by any person or persons for or in respect of any alleged trespass or trespasses, under or in execution of any warrant or warrants granted by the Speaker of the House of Commons, by the authority of the said House, since the commencement of the present Session of Parliament, shall be put an end to and finally determined, discharged, and made void by virtue of this Act."

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN. — I am opposed to the admission of this clause. I agreed to ex post facto legislation, which would take away the right of Stockdale to proceed with actions against our printer, because I thought the actions which he took were founded upon frivolous grounds. I cannot, however, agree to the same principle as regards this clause. I think the warrant of the Speaker of this House a perfectly valid warrant; but, though the warrant be valid, the execution of it might be rendered illegal by the conduct of our officer, as in the case of "Jay v. Popham." Suppose, then, that our officer used unnecessary violence, will any one say that the party against whom it should be used ought not to have a right to proceed for compensation? If an officer misconduct himself in the execution of our legal warrant, the party who suffered injury by that misconduct ought to have a right to recover compensation for such injury. In the case of "Jay v. Popham," the officer pleaded, in bar, that he had acted under the authority of the Convention Parliament; but the judges overruled the plea, as he had conducted himself with unnecessary violence; and though the House of Commons refused to admit their jurisdiction, yet every lawyer of eminence, since, has admitted that the judges were right and the Parliament wrong. If the officer had misconducted himself, it was right that he should pay damages to the party who suffered from his misconduct. I cannot, therefore, give my assent to the proposition that this clause should stand part of the Bill: it would damage the Bill in the eyes of the country; and therefore I will divide the Committee on the question.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—The action to which this clause would apply is an action closely connected with and arising out of the proceedings of Stockdale against the servants of this House; and I must say that I think it is a matter of expediency to put an end to all those actions, now that we have commenced. If we leave this clause out of the Bill, it will be easy to institute frivolous actions against our officer. If any grievance have been sustained by Howard, let him state it in a petition to the House; but the fact is, that, so far as Stockdale and that set of people are concerned, there is no grievance; and the proceedings are no more than a scheme to get money and notoriety. There was no real damage of character sustained by those people; but they are anxious to turn to account some doctrines delivered in a court of law, in order to embarrass the House of Commons.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — I have very great doubts as to whether this clause ought to be retained, or not; and I shall be very much guided in my opinion by the view which the House shall take, and by he observations which may be made upon t. There is, doubtless, a great advantage o be gained by putting an end to all the roceedings; and I must say that no inustice can be inflicted by stopping the ctions in this matter. I see the greatest ossible advantage in terminating, during he present Session, all the proceedings n the case of "Stockdale v. Hansard;" ut I have strong doubts as to whether we should not prejudice the privileges of he House by the enactment of this clause. The first clause provides a permanent protection against actions similar to those of Stockdale; whereas this clause, giving protection to the Sergeant-at-Arms, is not perpetual,—it is only a special clause to protect the Sergeant-at-Arms against actions during the present Session. If we pass this clause, what guarantee for protection shall the Sergeant-at-Arms have in future Sessions of Parliament? Suppose the case of a witness refusing to attend; the same description of action might arise, in any future year, out of the execution of the Speaker's warrant. I fear that this special protection for a limited period would injure our privileges; and, at all events, I should like to have sufficient time afforded us to give the subject more mature consideration.

SIR E. SUGDEN.—I have no objection that the consideration of the clause should be postponed; and I shall withdraw my motion for its omission for the present.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL.—The introduction of this Bill is not a matter of secrecy. Mr. Howard must be well aware that it is before the House; and if he have any grievance to complain of, it is competent for him to lay it before the Parliament. It is not, by any means, an unfrequent occurrence for this House to stop actions for acts done in obedience to the orders of this House. The Court of Chancery would also estop an action, in case its officer acted in obedience to its authority, and would allow of that officer's conduct to be judged only by itself. In the case of illegal misconduct of a revenue officer, in the discharge of his duty, the Court of Exchequer would direct the action to be brought before it, as it would allow no other tribunal to judge of the conduct of its officer; and why shall not this House possess a similar authority? If the Bill pass without this clause, you will have done nothing. I hope a long period will elapse before such another conflict will be witnessed; but if the House do not show a determination to stop such proceedings, it will be hard to predict what consequences may arise from that want of determination. I have the concurrence of Mr. Howard in this matter; for he commenced those actions, anticipating that the House would not plead; and if we allow our sense of public duty to be less than our feelings of humanity, we shall be obliged to submit to another tribunal. Let us refuse to act with determination, and we place ourselves at the mercy of the House of Lords and the courts of justice. Our legislation will, in my opinion, be useless, if we omit this clause. It is not unusual for courts of justice to estop actions against their officers; and I hope the Committee will agree to this clause, without which our legislation will be idle.

SIR CHARLES GREY. — I feel that it is imperatively necessary to check completely all the vexatious proceedings connected with this question, by a comprehensive clause. I beg to suggest to the Noble Lord whether it would not be better to say, at once, that, when any of our officers are sued for acting under the warrant of the Speaker, they shall be enabled, for their own protection, to file a certificate and an affidavit, if it be thought necessary, to the effect that the alleged transgressions had only been committed in execution of that warrant. Then, I certainly agree that any alleged excess of authority would much more properly be inquired into before this House than before a court of law; and that, I think, will answer the objection of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I wish to remove any impression which the Honourable and Learned Solicitor General may have made by the parallel which he has attempted to draw between the proceedings of the Court of Chancery and of this House. It is very true, that the Court of Chancery does not permit persons to bring actions against its officers for anything which they may do in executing the orders of the court; but it is equally true, that if the officers misconduct themselves, the court interferes, and refers it to the master to grant compensation for the injury which any party may appear to him to have sustained. This House, however, never had any such jurisdiction; and I hope I shall never live to see the day when this House shall take upon itself to assess damages in such a case. The House has no money properly applicable to such a purpose: it possesses no officers, no tribunal fit to discharge such a duty. Then, again, if the principle upon which we are going be right, we are bound to make it perpetual. These difficulties will not end with this Session; for every Session will afford fresh ones: but it seems only to be desired, on the part of the advisers of the Crown, to have some indemnity for the present, in case of being obliged to plead in a court of law. In these questions of compensation, it is impossible for the House to ascertain whether any and what damages any individual may have sustained. What is the use of asking a man whom we have already committed to Newgate to come forward and tell us what his complaint against us is? It is most desirable that, as far as may be possible, our privileges should be considered as a part of the law of the land; and, without printing those privileges at all, any question as to the excess of authority on the part of our officers might be settled by a court of law. I am willing, however, to allow the consideration of this clause to be deferred till a future stage.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I am glad that the Right Honourable Gentleman has consented to postpone the omission of this clause, and to reserve its consideration; and it is, therefore, sufficient for me to say that I am the more satisfied with that course, because my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General is absent from the House, being employed by the Government on the circuit, and he will, in all probability, be present upon the third reading. The Learned Solicitor General, it is well known, has a strong opinion that this clause ought to form part of the Bill; and I shall be glad to hear the reasons upon which my Learned Friend would contend that it ought to be maintained.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3. ("The Act not to affect the privileges of Parliament") was also agreed to.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I now rise, Sir, to propose a clause which I hope will be favourably received by the Committee. I think it extremely necessary that the power which we now propose to assume should be accompanied with some guards and limitations; because we must be aware that, by this Bill, the House will have a power which no other House of Commons has ever possessed. Whatever may have been the extent of our privileges, this Bill confers upon us one that is entirely new, when it enables us, by the certificate of the Speaker, to stop at once any action brought against any parties concerned, by its order, in the publication of the papers of this House. This is a very great power, and one which renders it highly necessary to guard against any careless introduction into our Reports of matters calculated to be injurious to individual character. Now, it appears to me, also, that we ought to guard that power by the introduction of a clause which shall prevent us from having in custody the person who brings the action, and at the same exercising the power of putting an end to the action; because I apprehend the only use of committing persons is to get rid of the action. If it be thought desirable to keep the prison cells of this House full, that is one thing; but if we think it desirable not to excite the public mind, as it has been excited by the recent committals, the introduction of this clause is calculated to advance that object. The clause, Sir, which I wish to bring up, provides "that, where any civil or criminal process shall be superseded by this Act, and any person or persons shall have been committed by either House of Parliament for bringing such process, or causing the same to be brought, he or they shall be discharged out of custody by the House that committed him or them, and no person shall hereafter be committed for bringing any such action; provided always, that nothing contained in the above cause shall be held, directly or indirectly, to increase any of the privileges of Parliament whatsoever."

Question put, "That the clause be brought up."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I object, Sir, to the bringing up of this clause. I believe that when there is any objection to the principle of a clause, as being totally irreconcilable with the principle of the Bill to which it refers, the proper course is to object to its being brought up. This clause seems to me to be a direct limitation of the privileges of this House; and besides that, it is an interference with particular acts of the House upon questions of privilege. I think, therefore, that neither this nor the other House of Parliament could properly entertain this clause. The Committee has already agreed to the proposition that the privileges of this House shall not be affected by the Bill; but the Honourable Gentleman now proposes to bring up a clause which directly interferes with them, and to which I decidedly shall object.

SIR E. SUGDEN.—I think it scarcely courteous in the Noble Lord to make a formal objection to the clause being brought up, and cannot help saying that such a course savours a little of special pleading. The clause, if the Noble Lord pleases, may be brought up and negatived, as I am anxious that it should be placed on the Journals of the House. But, if not, I shall take another opportunity of moving it, when I shall certainly press it to a division.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I object to the clause being now brought up; and the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman may take what course he pleases upon the subject.

Question, "That the clause be brought up," put, and negatived.

Mr. JOHN JONES.—I have also, Sir, a clause to propose. This House, it is to be remembered, has no power of taking evidence upon oath. Evidence, here, is all mere assertion; and, in consequence of this, the same person has been known to give very different testimony before this House and its Committees, from that which he has given before the House of Lords; and, when called upon to explain the discrepancy, has said that it was because he was on his oath in one place, and not in the other. There are cases, too, in which Members of this House are called upon to give evidence, at great length, before Committees. That evidence is not unfrequently given back to them to supervise; and it is almost always returned in a very different state from that in which it appeared before. The object of my clause is to render false evidence given before this House liable to the same punishment as if it were given on oath. I therefore move, Sir, the following clause: "That any person or persons who shall be proved to have given false evidence before any Committee of the House of Commons shall be liable to the pains and penalties of perjury, though such evidence be not given on oath."

The CHAIRMAN. — I think that this clause does not come within the scope of the title of the Bill, which is "a Bill for the summary protection of persons employed in printing papers authorised by this House."

Mr. JONES. — With great submission, I beg to differ from the Honourable Chairman. I think any clause admissible which may give to our publications a more serious character.

The CHAIRMAN. — If that is the general feeling of the Committee, I shall not oppose it; but it does not concur with my own impression, as to the nature of this Bill.

Mr. JONES. — I am not prepared to say whether the clause is strictly conformable to the rules of the House, or not; but I hope the Committee will, at all events, permit me to proceed with my motion; because, if it should be, ultimately, its opinion that the clause could not be inserted in this Bill, perhaps some Honourable Member might suggest a better remedy for the abuse which it is my object to correct. The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin said, the other day, very broadly, that those who opposed the privileges of this House were either Chartists or Ultra Tories. Now, I am neither a Chartist nor an Ultra Tory, and I might just as well say, that because there are Members of this House who are disposed to strain its privileges much beyond the necessity of the case, those privileges ought therefore to be abolished altogether. It is just as easy to impute motives to Honourable Members on one side of the House as to those on the other; but that course has not been pursued by the opponents of the opinions of the Honourable and Learned Member on these privilege questions; and I hope he will give us credit for the honesty of our views and intentions. I propose that the clause be brought up.

Mr. MATTHIAS ATTWOOD. — I have much pleasure in seconding the motion of the Honourable Gentleman, as I ever shall have in supporting any motion having for its object the protection of the public against the enormous encroachment of power to which this House appears to be now aspiring; and I hope that those who oppose this clause will meet it upon its merits rather than upon any mere question of form or technicality. My conviction is, that the whole of these coercive measures which the House is adopting will, in the end, lead to the restriction of the publications of Parliament, and to their contraction within such limited bounds as to render them next to useless. The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, in the course of these discussions, has referred to the case of Polack, and seemed to draw from it a further justification of the course adopted by the House of Commons on the privilege question, because it was in an examination before a Committee of the House of Lords that the libel, in that case, arose. And so, no doubt, it was: but I am far from believing that the House of Lords would have permitted that inquiry to have been conducted with such latitude, if it had been known at the time that it would have come before the public in the manner in which it did. In that case, Polack gave a great deal of information with regard to the state of New Zealand; but when the Committee of their Lordships wished to know something about Polack himself, in order to judge of the value and credit to be attached to his evidence, they called another witness, who told them that he was a man whom he would not believe on his oath; and I cannot think that the House of Lords ever intended that that evidence should be made known in the way it was. And yet this House is about to give to a Committee, composed of some half dozen of its Members, the power of publishing whatever may seem to them to be necessary and useful. I think that the preamble of the Bill ought to state, not only that we shall publish what the House thinks necessary, but what its Committees think necessary also. A Committee is not the House of Commons; and is a body, composed of so small a number of Members as a Committee is, to continue to have the power of publishing any slander it pleases? But the very witnesses who give evidence before our Committees are, as the law seems to be at present, empowered to publish libels by the very evidence they utter. It has been established, in debate in this House, that in one case three fourths of the evidence, as published by Hansard, consisted of matter scarcely any of which was ever uttered before the Committee. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin has said, that, by the instrumentality of a Committee of this House, the foulest aspersions may be cast, with perfect impunity, upon the character of men of the most unimpeachable integrity. The party libelled has no means of redress. A case occurred, in which the Honourable Member for Bridport, having been examined before a Committee of this House, and having received from Mr. Gurney a copy of his evidence, for the purpose of revision, made additions to it which nearly doubled its length, and very considerably altered the original; so that there was the greatest difference between it, as it appeared in Gurney's book, and as it was published elsewhere. And yet, notwithstanding facts such as these, the House is going to throw the protection of an Act of Parliament round this description of publications, let them contain what they will. Are we to be the judges of the law? And is there to be no redress, when the House legislates in so loose a manner? If such is to be the case, I can only say, that I shall give my warmest support to any proposition which, like the present, is calculated to place a check on the looseness of examination, as well as of publication, which is frequently carried on under the sanction of this ouse. When the Right Honourable d Learned Member for Ripon proposed, a former occasion, the appointment of Committee to inquire into the way in ich our publications are carried on, I ink his proposal ought to have been at ce acceded to, and that it was a step ich certainly ought to have preceded e introduction of this measure. I think ought to have examined into the man- r in which those publications have been nducted, with a view to ascertain how r this privilege of publication ought to abandoned, and how far it might be aintained, without injury to the com- unity. I am convinced, that if we had ne this before we had recourse to these easures of coercion, we should have aced the House in a higher position together, and have very much facilitated e object it has in view.

Question put, " That the clause be ought up."

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I ust feel it my duty to oppose the bring- g up of this clause; first, because I ink it inadmissible within the terms of e preamble of the Bill; and secondly, ecause it is objectionable in itself. Has e Honourable Gentleman fully consi- ered what might be the effect of his own lause? I, for my own part, apprehend it ould have a much more extensive effect han it might at first sight appear to have. ersons very seldom attend Committees o give evidence voluntarily: their attend- nce before Committees of this House is enerally compulsory. And what is the ature of the evidence they are often called pon to give? Not such as is given on a egal trial, before a jury, where the wit- esses are only required to speak upon ome definite point in issue; but before a Committee, they are called upon to give nformation upon subjects very much at large; and are often very little apprised, when they come before it, what is the nature of the questions that are about to be put to them. Again, they are examined by Gentlemen who know nothing of the rules of evidence; nor are the questions confined to the personal and legal knowledge of the parties examined, but frequently extend to mere matters of hearsay and conjecture, upon a vast variety of subjects. If the witnesses had an option of declining to attend before Committees, then some ground might be shown why they should be made responsible for the evidence given by them; but if they are made to attend upon compulsion, what have they to do with the matter, if that evidence be improperly circulated? They have nothing to do with it but to lament it. If the House compels persons to come from all parts of the world to give it information, to what extent does it expect that information will be given, if the parties giving it are to be made liable for its subsequent publication by the House itself? In thus looking at the clause of the Honourable Gentleman, I think its adoption would have the effect of most materially impeding inquiries by this House. This, however, is quite a distinct question from the matter which the Honourable Member for Whitehaven has complained of. It does not follow, that everything which the House may think proper to collect in the way of information, upon any subject, ought to be published; though I certainly think the House ought to have the right of publication, if it should choose to publish any testimony it may have obtained. Why, the very object of instituting inquiries into abuses is to get at what may almost be called defamatory matter. We might wish, for instance, to know what had been the misdeeds of persons holding public offices abroad. The interest of the country at large demands that the House should have the power to institute such inquiries. We have heard much of the examination and evidence of a person of the name of Polack, before the House of Lords; in which case another witness came forward, and gave him a most unsatisfactory character; but would you call such a witness before you, and then tell him, after he had given his evidence, that he would be liable to an indictment for perjury, and compel him to send to New Zealand for another witness to prove the truth of what he says? I know it from experience,—and whoever has had to defend prisoners against charges of perjury knows the same thing,—that the charge of perjury is frequently itself founded in perjury. Will you, then, as the grand inquest of the nation, do that which is involved in the principle of this clause, and expose any man to such an alternative as I have just described, whom, for public purposes, you may have compelled to come before you? What the Honourable Member for Whitehaven has said is most important, with reference to our publications; because it may be often very essential that matters involving information of a defamatory character should be got at. You wish to investigate the misdeeds of persons in office, perhaps, and unless you publish the circumstances, you do not publish that on which your legislation, in consequence, is founded. It would, therefore, often become a doubt with you as to whether you should publish criminatory matter; and as to what species of evidence you would have to support the assertions contained in your publications, if you did.

When the Honourable Member for Whitehaven speaks of protecting the rights of the people against the inquisitorial powers of the House of Commons, I would ask what part of the people it is whose rights the Honourable Gentleman is pleading for? Is it the great bulk of the people, who know what are the rights which Parliament ought to possess, and who have the greatest interest in the maintenance of those rights? No; it is not of them that the Honourable Member speaks; it is on behalf of the few that he makes his appeal, who might be liable to imputations, and on whom the testimony given before a Committee might reflect unfavourably. But has the House of Commons the right to resign its privileges? The people of England know well what the privileges of this House are, and how important to the public interest it is that those privileges should be preserved: and do the Members of this House come here to betray their trust to the public, by resigning them? On the contrary, is it not their duty to exercise those powers for the public benefit? They are the trustees of every privilege that the House possesses, and they will be traitors to their trust, whenever they consent to resign them. They will be unfaithful stewards if they resign privileges, which no one can foretel at what period they may be called upon to exercise, in support of the best interests of the country. The same principles which apply to a court of justice apply, with tenfold force, here; and it is a solemn duty for this House to maintain and vindicate its powers and its efficiency. No doubt this it to be done with care and with caution; but then, I maintain, that these are arguments which lead to care and caution, and which ought not to lead to the introduction of such a clause as the one now proposed. We cannot possibly pass such a clause without inflicting the greatest injustice on persons giving their evidence before this House and its Committees; and its result would inevitably be, the withholding from us great masses of information upon general matters, on which we are called upon to legislate. I submit, therefore, Sir, that this clause ought not now to be received, as it is not, in the first place, of such a nature as to be comprehended in the title of the Bill; and as, in the next place, it requires a great deal more consideration, before a principle can possibly be assented to, which will so far tend to weaken the privileges of this House.

Mr. JONES. — I must say that I do not think the objection raised by the Chairman, on the ground of informality, has been sustained by the Honourable and Learned Solicitor General. The objection is, that this clause does not come within the title of the Bill. The title of the Bill is this: — "A Bill to give summary Protection to Persons employed in the Publication of Parliamentary Papers." Now, what is it that the second clause of the Bill provides for? It is to stop all actions that may have been brought against the subordinate officers of the House for carrying the Speaker's warrant into effect. What, I should like to know, has such a clause to do with the publication of papers? With respect to the other argument of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, that this clause would weaken the powers of the House, I should say, its tendency would be to strengthen them. I think there is no danger on that head, and I hope the House will permit the clause to be brought up.

Mr. HALFORD. — I hope the House will allow those who, like myself, are anxious to support this clause, an opportunity of doing so, by permitting it to be brought up; for the private character of individuals unquestionably ought not to be left at the mercy of Committees of this House.

Mr. M. ATTWOOD. — The Honourable and Learned Gentleman says that I support this clause, on account of protection I am anxious to afford to but a small proportion of the people; but I can tell the Honourable and Learned Gentleman that his arguments, as to the clause, and the power it gives, are no better than they would be in giving this House power over the lives of the people. The arguments he has used are those of high prerogative, and despotic power, and when I see the privileges of the House of Commons supported in this arbitrary manner, I confess I am led to look with still greater suspicion on its power of intrusting the character of individuals to the care of its Committees.

The CHAIRMAN. — The question is, "That this clause be now brought up."

Question put "That the preamble of the Bill be agreed to."

Mr. MACKINNON.—I beg to suggest the alteration of the words "essential to," to "expedient for," in the preamble.

Amendment agreed to; Bill to be reported on Monday next.

The House resumed.

PRINTED PAPERS—BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I now beg, Sir, to move that the Order of the Day be read for the consideration of the petition of Messrs. Hansard (presented 12th March), relative to the last action brought by Mr. Stockdale against them, for a fresh publication of the same matter as was the subject of the former actions.

Order of the Day read.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I propose to take the same course in this as in the last action,—namely, to declare that the bringing the action was a breach of the privilege of the House; and I will therefore move, at once, the resolution agreed to on the 17th February, with the alteration only of certain words, in order to meet the circumstances, as stated in the present petition. I therefore beg to move, "That John Joseph Stockdale, by commencing and prosecuting the action now depending, at his suit, against James Hansard, Luke Graves Hansard, and Luke James Hansard, and in which a notice of action was served on the 9th day of this instant March, such action being brought for acts done by the defendants as the officers and servants of this House, and under and pursuant to the authority of the orders and resolutions of this House, made in exercise of the privileges of Parliament, has been guilty of a contempt of this House, and a violation of the privileges thereof; and that all sheriffs, under sheriffs, agents, bailiffs, officers, clerks, and others, who shall act, aid, or assist in the continuing, furthering, and prosecuting the said action, will also be guilty of a contempt and violation of the privileges of this House, and subject themselves to the severe censure and displeasure of this House."

Question put.

SIR R. INGLIS. — Although, Sir, there might have been some plausibility in the resolution when it passed on the last occasion, there is, at all events, none on the present; for we have just been considering a Bill, declaring the bringing of these actions to be not unwarranted, and which provides a defence against such actions when brought.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

When we talk of the officers of this House, who are they? The Sergeant-at-Arms? He is appointed by the Crown. The chief Clerk at the table is appointed by the Crown; and even for the choice of a Speaker, we require the sanction of the Crown. Having, then, no officer, we cannot justify any person acting as such; and besides, we ought only to protect a man who prints any paper specially ordered to be printed by the House. After the preamble of the Bill, however, it is a waste of time to pass this resolution; and I shall certainly divide the House against it.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — This is the fifth action brought against Messrs. Hansard for publishing the Report of the Inspectors of Prisons; and I do not see why we should now alter the course we took upon the former occasions, and for which the majority of the House thought that we had the power. It is an extraordinary assumption of the Honourable Baronet, that we are altering or abandoning any privilege by the Bill we are now passing. The Bill proposes to give a more speedy remedy for the protection of officers publishing under the authority of the House, and does not abandon any remedy the House already possesses. For my own part, I can see no other course that the House can take than to pass this resolution. It gives a more speedy remedy to the officers of the House in actions brought against them for publications by order of the House, but it leaves all our privileges in full force.

Mr. LAW. — If the Honourable Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford intends to divide the House, I shall certainly vote with him. I regret that the Noble Lord should have thought it his duty again to bring the subject forward, because it is exceedingly detrimental to the public interests, and cannot tend to raise the House in the estimation of the country. The Noble Lord says, that when the military were last called upon, it was in opposition to the democratic party. However, they were called upon to support the House of Commons. If the resistance of the people should, at any time, become formidable, you might, by calling on the Crown to support the House of Commons against the law of the land, be engaged in a struggle of a very different description: and if that support should be declined, how powerless would the House become! I really do think the House ought not to follow the course of proceeding now recommended. I shall never concur in committing either the sheriff, the plaintiff, or his attorney, and therefore I consider it better to resist the resolution in limine.

Mr. DARBY. — I shall join with my Honourable Friend the Member for Oxford in opposing the resolution proposed by the Noble Lord.

The House divided: — Ayes 98, Noes 33; Majority 65.

Resolved, That John Joseph Stockdale, y commencing and prosecuting the acion now depending at his suit, against ames Hansard, Luke Graves Hansard, nd Luke James Hansard, and in which notice of action was served on the 9th lay of this instant March, such action eing brought for acts done by the deendants as the officers and servants of his House, and under and pursuant to he authority of the orders and resoluions of this House, made in exercise of he privileges of Parliament, has been uilty of a contempt of this House, and violation of the privileges thereof; and hat all sheriffs, under sheriffs, agents, ailiffs, officers, clerks, and others who hall act, aid, or assist in the continuing, urthering, and prosecuting the said acion, will also be guilty of a contempt nd violation of the privileges of this House, and subject themselves to the evere censure and displeasure of this House.

Ordered, That a copy of the above resolution be served by the Sergeant-at-Arms upon the sheriff of the county of Hertford, and the under sheriffs thereof, and at the office of the said sheriff.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I intend to postpone the Order of the Day for the consideration of the statement of the Sergeant-at-Arms until Friday next. I propose to bring up the Report on this Bill on Monday, in order that it may be printed, and read a third time on Friday next.

CHINA.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I beg to move, "That the Order of the Day be read for the House resolving itself into a Committee of Supply."

Question put.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.—I wish to inform the House that, since I answered the question of the Right Honourable Baronet opposite, with regard to China, I have received despatches referring to transactions which had occurred there. I intend to have them printed, and will present them to the House on Monday.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM.—Perhaps the Noble Lord will state to what the despatches particularly allude; and whether they contain any account of the action which has taken place, or of the commencement of hostilities.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.—There are two despatches. One of them, dated in October, states, that an arrangement had been made between Captain Elliot and the Chinese Commissioners, by which it was agreed that the trade should be recommenced and re-opened, the merchant ships remaining outside the port, and not being obliged to subscribe the bond. The other, dated the 3d of November, states that, in consequence of the commander of the Thomas Coutts having gone in and signed the bond, disturbances took place, which led to the action, an account of which has already appeared in the papers. These are the two despatches; and one of them contains inclosures.

Motion agreed to; the House went into committee.

SUPPLY.—ARMY ESTIMATES.

"That a sum, not exceeding 3,511,870*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of Her Majesty's land forces for service in the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and on stations abroad (excepting the regiments employed in the territorial possessions of the East India Company), from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive."

On the vote being put, —

Mr. HUME said:—I consider the army expenditure very extravagant, and that great reductions ought to be made in it. It has been stated that the non-effective list has been greatly decreased. Now, I do not believe that to be the case; because the Returns which I hold in my hand prove that the dead weight is nearly the same in amount as it was in 1822. The charge, in 1834, was 2,701,000*l.*; in 1835, 2,749,000*l.*; in 1836, 2,625,000*l.*; in 1837, 2,702,000*l.* We are called upon to vote about 6,000,000*l.* for the service of the country, nearly 3,000,000*l.* of which are dead weight, or half pay. I wish to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman, what has been done with respect to the rule laid down by his predecessor as to the carriage of baggage; because, in the course of last autumn, an individual was fined for not conveying baggage to Windsor; although he pleaded that he was not liable, as he had not a waggon and six horses? I think, in time of peace, that the Government ought to enter into a contract with some person in the metropolis for the performance of this duty. With regard to the depôt system, I observe a charge of 10,000*l.* That question has been very much agitated; and, as the opinions on the subject are very contradictory, I trust the Right Honourable Gentleman will give it his best attention.

Mr. MACAULAY. — I really do not think the charge of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, with respect to the dead weight, is well founded, when we come down with an estimate making a reduction in it of 70,000*l.* in one year. The Honourable Member may have been misled by the circumstance that, in 1833, a considerable number of pensioners were transferred to the War Office; which transfer must, of necessity, have tended to swell the non-effective charge for a considerable time. Another subject alluded to by the Honourable Member, is the carriage of baggage, which is settled under the Mutiny Act. I perfectly agree with the Honourable Member, that no burden ought to be laid on any subject of the realm which is unfair; and I have no hesitation in saying that, if a person is required to assist the troops, in consequence of having a particular description of property, he ought to be recompensed for the loss which he may sustain. If the Mutiny Act does not provide for such cases, I shall be quite ready to join the Honourable Member in amending it; and I can assure him, that any case which may be brought before me shall receive my best attention. No complaint, however, on this subject has been brought under my notice. I will not, now, go into the very extensive and important question to which the Honourable Member alluded,—I mean the depôt system. I will confine myself simply to the financial part of the subject, and I must say, that the proposition made by the late Secretary at War, to enable the Government to put an end to that system, would have been more expensive to the public than the system now adopted. After being only five months in office, it would be presumptuous in me to propose to abolish that system which the Duke of Wellington considers necessary.

Mr. HUME. — I really cannot understand from what documents the Right Honourable Gentleman draws his statements; for the Returns to which I have alluded show an actual increase, during four years, of 1000*l.* But I object to the half pay system altogether. I would recommend the Right Honourable Gentleman to examine the evidence taken before the Military Commissioners; particularly that part of it which relates to the rule laid down in the French army, that no person shall be entitled to half pay until he has been thirty years in the service. We ought not to allow a pension without some years' service; but the practice in England is, for a person to purchase a commission, and shortly afterwards to retire on half pay. I hope the Government will turn their attention to the subject. I wish to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman, what is the meaning of giving credit for 24,000*l.*, as a contribution from Ceylon, in aid of the military expenditure?

Mr. MACAULAY. — It is the contribution of the colonists.

Mr. HUME. — Is it the whole of the surplus revenue, or only a portion of it? On what principle is the amount calculated?

Mr. MACAULAY. — It is paid by arrangement; and has been done so for the last twelve years.

Mr. HUME. — In my opinion, Ceylon ought to defray the whole of its military expenses; and I have no doubt that it would be able to do so, if its ci tablishments were placed on a proper oting.

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 164,740*l.*, granted to Her Majesty, for defraying e charge of general staff officers of the spitals, serving with Her Majesty's rces in the united kingdom of Great ritain and Ireland, and on foreign staons (excepting India), and of Her Masty's garrison of the Tower of London, om the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 1st day of March, 1841, both days inlusive."

On the vote being put,—

Mr. HUME said:—I must complain of he great expense of this portion of our ilitary establishment. We have, now, ore staff officers than we had during the ar; and I think that highly improper. I onsider the system adopted at the Horse uards to be very injurious to the army. n the navy, there is a routine of duty; ut, at the Horse Guards, the same individuals have been kept for 25 or 30 years. think this is anything but politic, and hat it does not give other officers a fair hance. I must also repeat my objection to the retention of Lord Hill by the Government; and, in making this remark, I cannot forget that, in May last, the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite would not undertake the duty of forming an Administration unless he had the power of making a complete change. I do not say that any individual placed in a similar situation could have given less offence; but I believe the patronage of the army to be applied to the purpose of opposing the liberal Government of the day; and it was a great disgrace to the Government of Earl Grey to allow such a state of things to continue; and the present Government are still more to blame on this point. I observe, in the list before me, "six aides-de-camp to the Queen." Now, I think it would be much more reasonable to charge for six ladies' maids. Can any one deny that these are merely sinecure offices? I think not. I have mentioned this circumstance, in order to direct the Right Honourable Gentleman's attention to the manner in which the staff is kept up. I now beg to ask a question with respect to the recent appointment of the Lieutenant of the Tower. I wish to know whether the office is still to be continued as a sinecure? In the year 1834, it was not disturbed, out of deference to the Duke of Wellington; but I desire to know, whether the successor of the person who then held the office is to hold it on the same terms?

Mr. MACAULAY.—The situation to which the Honourable Member for Kilkenny refers is not that of Lieutenant, but Deputy Lieutenant, of the Tower. The Honourable Member cannot be more desirous than I am that sinecure offices should be abolished; and my own feelings on this subject were so strong, that, on the death of the late deputy lieutenant, I wrote to the Duke of Wellington to ascertain whether it was requisite to continue the office? His Grace stated that he had filled up the situation, conceiving himself authorised so to do; and he gave very cogent reasons for the course he had taken. His opinion was, that the valuable stores deposited in the Tower might be in very considerable danger, unless an efficient and constant superintendence should be kept up; for, if the necessary vigilance should be relaxed, a very small body of conspirators, having money at their command, might make themselves masters of it. After the expression of such an opinion, I, of course, could not take upon myself to recommend the abolition of the office.

SIR A. DALRYMPLE.—The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has remarked that this is not the first occasion on which he has referred to the Commander-in-chief, and I bear him out in that assertion, for I recollect the attacks made by him eight or nine years ago. I am glad, however, to find that experience has softened down the hostility of the Honourable Member; for he now admits that Lord Hill has conducted the affairs of the army as well as they could be conducted by any person professing the opinions of that Nobleman. The profession do not consider Lord Hill to be guided, in the distribution of patronage, by his political opinions, or that he allows those opinions to interfere with the execution of his duty. If there be any bias, it is in favour of the sons of those who have served in the army; and perhaps such a feeling is very natural for a person in his Lordship's situation. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has alluded to what he calls the absurdity of "six aides-de-camp to the Queen." But the Honourable Member ought to recollect that they form part of the general staff of the army; and I believe he will find, on examining the list, that they are amongst those officers who have seen the most active service.

Mr. HUME.—I should have no objection to these officers, if they had any employment. In the Civil List there are eighteen grooms and lords and ladies, and what their duties are it is almost impossible to ascertain. I wish to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman if the officer who has recently been appointed to the Tower is to reside there?

Mr. MACAULAY.—I understand that he is to be a resident and efficient deputy lieutenant.

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 60,146*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of the allowances to the principal officers of the several public military departments in Great Britain, their deputies, clerks, and contingent expenses, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive."

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 16,701*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of the Royal Military Asylum and of the Hibernian Military School, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive."

On the vote being put,—

Mr. HUME said:—I find a charge of 2846*l.* for maintaining the branch establishment at Southampton; and I think an instance of greater extravagance cannot be mentioned. The House will, perhaps, be surprised to hear that there is a governor, a chaplain, a surgeon, a clerk, and five sergeants to keep 70 little girls in order. The average annual expense of maintaining each of these girls is not less than 41*l.* I think the establishment ought to be disposed of altogether, and that the land ought to be sold.

Mr. MACAULAY.—I believe some inconvenience arose, under the former system, and that it was thought expedient to place the boys at one establishment and the girls at another. I certainly must own, that it appears to me that the expense, not merely at Southampton, but of the asylum generally, is very considerable, and that it is deserving of serious consideration. More than that I am not prepared to say.

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 92,900*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of volunteer corps, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive."

"That a sum, not exceeding 15,815*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of allowances, as rewards for distinguished services, and of allowances to officers of Her Majesty's garrisons, holding their appointments as rewards for military service, in the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and on foreign stations, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive."

"That a sum, not exceeding 92,000*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of the pay of general officers in Her Majesty's forces, not being colonels of regiments, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive."

"That a sum, not exceeding 53,500*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of full pay for reduced and retired officers of Her Majesty's forces, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive."

"That a sum, not exceeding 505,900*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of half pay and military allowances to reduced and retired officers of Her Majesty's land forces, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive."

"That a sum, not exceeding 63,606*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of half pay and reduced allowances to officers of disbanded foreign corps, of pensions to wounded foreign officers, and of allowances to the widows and children of deceased foreign officers, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive."

"That a sum, not exceeding 142,984*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of pensions to be paid to widows of officers of the land forces, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive."

"That a sum, not exceeding 127,900*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of allowances on the compassionate list, of allowances as of Her Majesty's royal bounty, and of pensions gratuities, and allowances to officers for wounds, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive."

Votes severally put, and agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 1,274.689*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals; of the in-pensioners of those establishments; of the out-pensioners of Chelsea Hospital; of pensions granted to discharged negro soldiers; and of pensioners from Hanoverian corps which served with the British army in 1793, 1794, and 1795, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive."

On the vote being put,—

CAPTAIN PECHELL said:—I wish to draw the attention of the Right Honourable Gentleman to the difference in salary and station between the Lieutenant Governors of Chelsea and Greenwich Hospitals. The Lieutenant Governor of Chelsea Hospital, who is a gallant and distinguished officer, and well worthy of the situation which he holds, enjoys his pay as the colonel of a regiment, and other emoluments, and he may be made a field marshal; the Lieutenant Governor of Greenwich Hospital, on the contrary, is stationary as a rear admiral, and is not allowed to receive his half pay. I cannot see why these distinctions should exist.

Mr. GISBORNE.—I wish to suggest to the Right Honourable Gentleman whether some means might not be adopted to render the personation of the pensioners more difficult. Cases have occurred of widows receiving pensions seven years after the death of their husbands. The loose way in which affidavits are taken before magistrates affords great facilities for abuse; and I think more care might be taken in identifying the parties.

Mr. MACAULAY.—I fully agree with the Honourable Gentleman that a great deal of imposture is practised under the present system, and I hope to be able to apply a suitable remedy. With respect to the observation of the Gallant Officer, his objection appears to be, not that the Lieutenant Governor of Chelsea Hospital is overpaid, but that the Lieutenant Governor of Greenwich Hospital is not sufficiently remunerated. That subject is not in my department, and of course I can offer no opinion on the subject.

Mr. HUME.—I trust the Gallant Officer will postpone his remarks to another opportunity, which will be afforded him when I bring in a Bill to reduce the expenses of Greenwich Hospital, which I believe can be done to a considerable extent. I am glad to hear that the Right Honourable Gentleman has turned his attention to the mode in which the payments are made to the pensioners; for I am satisfied that gross abuses have prevailed for a great number of years.

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 42,000*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of allowances, compensations, and emoluments, in the nature of superannuation or retired allowances, to persons formerly belonging to the several military public departments in the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive."

Vote agreed to.

DESIGNS COPYRIGHT BILL.

Mr. E. TENNENT. — I wish to call the attention of the House to a point of form in connection with the Designs Copyright Bill, in order that, if the correct course have not been taken, the Bill may be withdrawn and commenced de novo. On the 25th of January, I brought in a Bill to amend the law of copyright of designs, which now stands referred to a Select Committee; and a doubt has arisen whether the Bill ought to have originated in a resolution of the whole House, in conformity with the Standing Orders; inasmuch as it affects trade. During the present Session, the attention of the House has been called to two Bills, which have been withdrawn under similar circumstances, and afterwards introduced, in compliance with the Standing Order. In this case, however, the Bill does not affect to touch the duties; and I am of opinion that, strictly speaking, it cannot be called a Bill relative to trade. But, as it is a matter of considerable doubt, I am anxious, Sir, to ascertain your opinion on the subject.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — I cannot consider this to be a Bill affecting the trade of the country, within the meaning of the Standing Order. Its object is simply to extend the copyright of designs from three to twelve months.

Mr. M. PHILIPS. — I think the Bill does not affect the revenue of the country; for there is nothing in the shape of a tax to be collected. It is merely to enact an extension of time, and involves no new principle whatever; and so far as I am able to come to a conclusion, I do not consider that there is any occasion to go into a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL. — I cannot see any distinction, in point of principle, between the present Bill and that for the extension of copyright introduced by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Reading.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I think it would be more satisfactory to the House to ascertain your opinion, Sir, than to enter into any discussion on the subject. Questions of this kind ought to be left to your decision.

Mr. P. HOWARD. — I believe the Bill does not at all affect the financial regulations of the country; and if the Bill for the extension of copyright did not come within the order, I think this Bill cannot.

The SPEAKER. — The question is, not whether the Bill affects the revenue, but whether it comes within the Standing Order, that Bills relating to trade shall commence in a Committee of the whole House. Since the question was raised upon the Bill, I have given a good deal of attention to the subject. The original Standing Order was made in 1703, when the proposition for any Bill relating to trade was ordered to be first examined in the Grand Committee for Trade, then appointed at the commencement of every Session. In 1772, the present Standing Order was made, by which a Committee of the whole House was substituted for the Grand Committee for Trade; and this order remains in force to the present day. Of late years the practice has been to construe the order as applying merely to Bills relating to the import and export trade; but the practice is not uniform. I have looked into all the Acts between 1800 and 1815, and I find, that though a great majority of the Bills relating to trade have been brought in by order of the House, still a certain number have originated in Committee. If the Standing Order is found to work inconveniently, it ought to be amended; but so long as it remains on the Journals, I think the House ought to adhere to it literally. The difficulty here is, whether the present Bill does so far relate to trade as to come within the Standing Order. I had no doubt, in the case of the Copyright Bill, that it did not, because it affected trade only indirectly; and the former Copyright Bill was brought in by order of the House, without any previous Committee. But as some Bills, strongly resembling the present, have originated in a Committee of the whole House, I think the safer course would be, to refer the Report of the Committee up-stairs, to a Committee of the whole House, when the Bill may be ordered to be brought in in the usual manner.

Mr. E. TENNENT. — Sir, I now move, "That you leave the chair, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House."

Mr. WARBURTON. — I apprehend hat the first step will be, to withdraw the Bill. The Honourable Member may then nove for leave to bring in a new Bill.

Mr. HUME. — When a Bill is referred o a Committee, it is usual for that Comnittee to report.

The SPEAKER. — The proper course vill be, to discharge the order, and then vithdraw the Bill. The Honourable Member may then move to bring in another.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — I would recommend the Honourable Member to postpone any further proceedings until he Committee have reported.

Mr. E. TENNENT. — Sir, the position n which I now stand is this. The Bill vas read a second time, and ordered to e referred to a Committee. All I ask is, o place the new Bill in the same position, in order that it may be referred, s soon as the old Committee have reported.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I think the better course would be, to take the evidence before it assumes the form of a Bill; and I would therefore suggest to the Honourable Member to withdraw the Bill, and proceed to the Select Committee which has already been appointed.

The SPEAKER. — The ordinary course s, when any subject has been referred to Select Committee, to refer the Report f that Committee to a Committee of the whole House, and for the Committee of he whole House to order the Bill to be rought in.

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL. — Sir, the Bill has already been read a second time, nd the House has assented to its principle. I think it would only be fair to llow the Bill to be in the same state as if o doubt had arisen with respect to the Standing Order.

Mr. M. PHILIPS. — I cannot agree with the Honourable Gentleman, that he House, by agreeing to the second reading of the Bill, assented to its principle. I did not object to the second reading, because, in the absence of information which I was desirous of obtaining, I considered that I might be doing an injury to trade; but I have since ascertained that many of the manufacturers are opposed to the extension. I wish to ask the Honourable Member whether the Bill which he now intends to introduce will be in the same terms as the original Bill?

Mr. E. TENNENT. — It will, with merely verbal alterations. In obedience, Sir, to your suggestion, I will withdraw the Bill, then wait the issue of the Report of the Committee, and refer it to a Committee of the whole House.

Order (5th February) for committing the Bill to a Select Committee, read, and discharged; Bill withdrawn.

PAPERS, &c.

Petition of, for a Bill, read, and referred to two English judges.

SUPPLY OF WATER TO THE METROPOLIS.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER. — My Lords, I have to present to your Lordships a petition from the vestrymen of the parish of Saint Marylebone, in the county of Middlesex, complaining of the unwholesome state of the water usually supplied to the metropolis, as also the exorbitant expense annually defrayed by persons compelled to avail themselves of the present supply; and praying for the appointment of a board of appeal (unconnected with any water company) to decide all matters of complaint. Your Lordships are aware that a Committee of this House has been appointed to consider this most important subject; and I trust that they will not separate without having come to some satisfactory resolution. I do not know whether Government have taken any steps in the matter; but I think it is sufficiently important to command their serious attention. For my part, I can only say that I should be happy if some new company were formed to break up the present monopoly; and I would willingly subscribe 1000*l.* towards its formation.

Petition read, and referred to the Select Committee on the Supply of Water to the Metropolis.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The EARL of HADDINGTON.—My Lords, I have to present a petition on the subject of non-intrusion, somewhat different in its prayer from most of those which have been laid on your Lordships' table. It is from the parishioners of Kenneff; and the petitioners state that they regret the difference which exists between the civil and ecclesiastical courts in Scotland, because they conceive it to be injurious to the interests of religion, and destructive of those good feelings which are so necessary for the well-being of society. They beg for the interposition of Parliament to settle the matter in dispute; and they pray, on the one hand, that no minister shall be rejected by the arbitrary decision of the people, and, on the other, that no minister shall be inducted, if just cause of exception to his induction be shown.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — My Lords, I have to present petitions from the inhabitants of Monymusk; Cluny; Arbroath; Acharacle; St. James, Glasgow; Kettle; Barr; Alford; and Oathlaw, in favour of the non-intrusion principle. While on this subject, I wish to observe that I have received various communications from different parts of the country, in consequence of some words which I addressed to your Lordships on this subject, strongly remonstrating with me for advising delay in the settlement of this question. Now, to charge me with counselling delay is certainly a mistake. I never advised that any delay should take place: on the contrary, I blamed the Government for not coming to a decision on the subject. I did, however, say, that I considered precipitation to be worse than hesitation. There was no inconsistency in that. It is proper that such a question should receive due and serious consideration; but it does not follow that those who desire it to receive that due consideration are favourable to unnecessary delay; yet, from all parts of the country, I have received communications, blaming me for having advocated delay. When the Noble Viscount was questioned on the subject, he only said that Government had not, at that time, made up their minds whether they would, or would not, introduce a measure on the subject. We have now arrived at about the middle of March, and I should like to know what decision, if any, the Government has come to. I hope that the Noble Viscount will not convert the "ides of March" into the "Greek kalends," with respect to this question; but will speedily inform your Lordships what the intentions of the Government are.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — My Lords, I cannot state that Government are, at this moment, prepared with any measure on the subject. At the same time, I admit the right of the Noble Earl, and of other Noble Lords who are interested in this question, to learn the determination of the Government with respect to it at the earliest moment, in order that, if Government do not take it up, others who have considered the subject may do so. I shall therefore take care that your Lordships, at the earliest period, shall receive the necessary information.

CORN LAWS.

LORD BEXLEY and the DUKE of WELLINGTON presented petitions against the repeal of, — from freeholders, agriculturists, and others of East Budleigh; of owners and occupiers of land in the parish of Bisham; and of agriculturists of the county of Southampton. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The MARQUESS of BUTE and LORD STRAFFORD presented petitions in favour of the principle of non-intrusion, — from the presbytery of Haddington: from the minister, elders, and others of St. David's, Kirkintilloch: from the minister, session, and others of the Presbyterian Church of Aghadowey, in connection with the synod of Ulster: from the minister, elders, and others of Avendale and town of Strathaven: from minister, session, and others of the Presbyterian Church of Ringsend, in connection with the synod of Ulster: and from inhabitants of Garioch; Premnay; East Kilpatrick; Chalmers parish, Glasgow; Newmachar; and Lumphannen. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY presented a petition in favour of,—from inhabitants of the borough of Liverpool, in public meeting assembled. — Read, and ordered to be received as the petition of Joshua Walmisley (the mayor), who, only, has signed it.

AFFAIRS OF SPAIN.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — My Lords, I wish to ask the Noble Viscount opposite for some further information relative to the affairs of Spain. I believe it was in 1824, in Mr. Canning's Administration, that a considerable sum of money was voted for the relief of the Spanish refugees. I believe that the parties who benefited by the grant were the Mendizabals, the Constitutionalists, the Liberals, who now govern that country; but who refuse to pay the British soldiers who have supported their cause in the field. As I wish to know how that fund has been appropriated, I shall move for "a Return of all moneys paid by the British Government since 1824, in each year, for the support of Spanish exiles in this country: Also,

Return of the Spanish pensioners still in this country receiving pensions, and the amount thereof: And, also,

Return of all moneys and supplies furnished to Spain since the last Returns up to the present period."

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I beg to inform the Noble Marquess, that I have no objection to the production of those Returns.

Address for Returns agreed to.

VACCINATION EXTENSION BILL.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — My Lords, in moving that the House now go into committee on this Bill, I have to inform your Lordships, that, since it was last before your Lordships, I have seen the Poor Law Commissioners on the subject. I have agreed to certain suggestions made by them, and they have acceded to my views on other points. I wish, therefore, that the Bill may now go through the Committee, and that it may then be printed, with the amendments.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I should be glad to hear from the Noble Lord whether he has inserted any clause relative to Ireland? I am of opinion, that Ireland should, for the present, be excluded from the operation of the Bill, as the New Poor Law has been so recently brought into operation there, and no opportunity has been given for consulting those whose opinions on this subject ought to be respected.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I thought it better to include Ireland in the Bill, because, if Ireland were omitted, it might be said, when the Bill reached the other House, that we had passed a measure which was beneficial to this country, but that we had neglected to extend that benefit to Ireland. I have no objection, however, to adopt the suggestion of the Noble Marquess.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I trust that any Bill which would treat Ireland equally well as England, would be as well received here as elsewhere; but I have another subject to allude to. I think that a clause ought to be introduced to prevent, by a penalty, the inoculation for small-pox. Some of the heads of the medical profession have told me, that if such a penal clause be not introduced, the Noble Lord will not effect half his object.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — My principle is rather to lead men to do that which is proper, by showing them the benefits that are likely to accrue from such a line of conduct, than to compel them, by penalties, to pursue it. If, however, such a clause as the Noble Marquess recommends be introduced, I shall not oppose it, although I am adverse to the principle.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — My Lords, I can positively state, that it is the opinion of some of the most eminent medical men that some provision should be made to prevent the numerous and daily mischiefs which arise in consequence of ignorant persons inoculating with the small-pox virus. It is not enough that men should be induced by persuasion to pursue a course that tends to their own good; it is necessary, also, that ignorant people should be prevented, by legal enactments, from doing evil to others.

The BISHOP of LONDON. — I can fully corroborate what the Noble Marquess has said. I know that the clergy are of opinion that much evil is created amongst the poor by persons practising as medical men, who are not qualified to perform the most trifling operation, and who are ever ready to inoculate. To prevent that evil, I conceive that a penal clause would be advisable. In the agricultural districts, although there is no difficulty in procuring the vaccine matter, the people have a great reluctance to use it; but if a medical man were properly authorised to vaccinate, their objection would be removed, and the object of the Noble Lord would be fully effected.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I believe that my Noble Friend opposite has prepared a clause which will answer the object of the Right Reverend Prelate.

LORD ASHBURTON. — My Lords, I am strongly of opinion that something should be done to check inoculating with the small-pox virus. I would not go the length of absolute prohibition; but I would propose, that the practice should be confined to medical men; and that they should be obliged to furnish a return of the number of cases in which they had so inoculated.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. —I will now propose a clause imposing a penalty on any non-professional man who shall inoculate any patient.

House in committee (according to order); amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended.

LIVERPOOL PETITION.

The EARL of CHARLEVILLE.— My Lords, I wish to call your Lordships' attention to a petition which has been presented this evening. I have examined the petition from the borough of Liverpool in favour of the Municipal Corporation Bill for Ireland, presented by the Noble Marquess, and I find that it comes from Joshua Walmisley, the mayor; and not from the inhabitants of that borough.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I stated that the petition was from the inhabitants, and signed by Mr. Walmisley, on their behalf, which the Noble Earl would have known, if he had attended to me.

The EARL of CHARLEVILLE. — Then I have to inform the Noble Marquess that I have attended to him, and that the mayor cannot sign a petition to this House, in his corporate capacity. It is, in fact, the petition of Joshua Walmisley.

LORD HOLLAND.—The Noble Earl is quite wrong as to the point of form. It is quite usual to receive petitions signed by chairmen on the behalf of meetings over which they have presided.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I stated that it did not come from the mayor, in his corporate capacity, but that it was signed by Mr. Walmisley.

The EARL of CHARLEVILLE. — And the consequence is, that it cannot be the petition of the inhabitants; it must be taken as the petition of the individual.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — I have, myself, not unfrequently, presented petitions from county meetings, signed by the sheriffs. I know one case in which the sheriff, although differing in opinion from the meeting, signed for it.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — I congratulate your Lordships on receiving a petition presented by the Noble Marquess, desiring that municipal corporations may be extended to the intelligence, moral worth, and property of Ireland. I expect that when the Bill comes before your Lordships, the Noble Marquess will adhere to the principle laid down in the petition; and I can assure the Noble Marquess, that if he will show that is the use and object and purpose of the Bill, I will give it my cordial support.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I am willing to leave the Noble Marquess to settle the standard of intelligence and moral worth with his country. The Noble Marquess will surely not deny the existence of property, or intelligence, or moral worth amongst the Roman Catholic population there.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — I certainly think that the intelligence, moral worth, or property of Ireland is not confined to the back lanes and back streets of the town in that country.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The EARL of GALLOWAY. — My Lords, I hold in my hand petitions in support of the non-intrusion principle, from the inhabitants of Kirkpatrick, Luss, Crossmichael, and Mid Calder. I will take this opportunity, not having been so fortunate as to be in the House during the conversation which took place on non-intrusion yesterday, to trouble your Lordships with a few observations. I have learnt, from the ordinary channels of information (I hope, correctly), that a Noble Earl (Earl of Aberdeen) stated that he had received letters of remonstrance from various parts of Scotland for having advised the Government to delay the settlement of the Church question; and he explained that, so far from having advised, he had rather blamed, the Government for the delay which had taken place; but that he had urged on Her Majesty's Ministers, if they had thus far postponed he consideration of the subject, not to be nduced to come to a rash and precipitate ecision at last, which, instead of being ccessory, might be prejudicial, to the nal and proper settlement of the quesion. Now, it so happens that these obervations fell from the Noble Earl the ame day that I thought it my duty, in onsequence of the representations which had received from Scotland, to urge on ie Government not to allow another ionth to pass without an endeavour to ffect some satisfactory settlement. I do ot say that the Noble Earl was induced, y what fell from me, to make the observtions attributed to him; but it so fell ut, that the Noble Earl's recommendtion of delay followed, in point of time, nmediately upon my request for expediion. Wherefore, in my own defence, I rish to state some of the reasons which nduced me to urge the subject on the ttention of Ministers. First, I rememered that the Government had had six nonths for consideration, — that time nd more having elapsed since the colision between the Church and the civil ourts; next, I remembered the conduct f the Government on the subject of hurch extension in Scotland; I rememered the professions made by Her Maesty's Ministers, the appointment of the Commission of Inquiry, the Reports which vere prepared, and how, after all, the matter vas staved off from month to month, and rom year to year, until, finally, having erved its purpose, — the purpose of the Government, but not of the people, — it vas abandoned. Then I remembered that he settlement of this question was the rayer of the bulk of the petitions which ave been laid on your Lordships' table, nany of which I have myself had the onour of presenting; and, lastly, I was f opinion that if this question was to be iscussed in Parliament, it was very deirable that the discussion should take place efore the House should separate for the Easter recess. These reasons form my xcuse for having urged the Government o take the subject in hand. Nevertheess, my respect for the superior informtion and experience of the Noble Earl Earl of Aberdeen), — my respect for his alents, his judgment, and his general osition in this House, — looking to him, while the Government neglects its duty, s the leader on this important Scotch uestion, induced me to hold my peace, nd silently and respectfully to acquiesce n his views. But now another month as passed, and the Government are unrepared to say, not only what they will do, but whether they will do anything at all. Meanwhile, there are in Scotland, "wars and rumours of wars;" the country is rent by dissensions from end to end; and, I regret to add, that some of the clergy, apparently forgetting their sacred office, have taken a leaf from the book of the Roman Catholic priesthood of Ireland; and agitation is going on in a form and spirit unworthy of the sacred calling of those who are engaged in it. I do not say this of all the clergy; my respect is too great for that enlightened body; and I know many of them, even of the anti-intrusionists, who, although disapproving of the decisions of the civil courts, still deplore the conduct of those brethren in the ministry to whom I have alluded. But the peace of parishes has been disturbed; the feelings of amiable and excellent individuals have been wounded and lacerated; and dissension has been fomented between pastors and their flocks. I have been repeatedly requested again to urge the Government to endeavour to pacify the country; but I have abstained from doing so, partly because I believed my efforts would be useless, and partly because I did not feel myself competent to the task, which more properly belongs to Noble Lords near me. I will therefore sit down with the simple expression of my own conviction, that the longer this question remains unsettled, the more difficult it will become of solution and adjustment.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. My Lords, I cannot let the observations — of the Noble Earl, or what might be implied from the language used by another Noble Earl, to go forth, without stating that neither the Noble Earl who has just addressed your Lordships, nor the other Noble Earl to whom allusion has been made, is justified in supposing that, because the Government have delayed to bring forward a measure on this important subject, there has been any delay whatever in its consideration. So far from it, the fact is, that consideration was given to it at a very early period; and it is only the great importance of the question, and the very circumstances which the Noble Earl has stated, as to its difficulty, that have prevented the Government from bringing a measure forward. Your Lordships must feel that the circumstances stated by the Noble Earl himself, in his short speech, are, of themselves, enough to make us dread precipitation. And, I must add, that I would much rather incur, on the part of the Government, the reproach, according to the expression of the Noble Earl (Lord Aberdeen), of delay, than that of launching precipitately upon the question, without an opportunity of making ourselves previously acquainted with all the opinions, feelings, and views that prevail in Scotland with respect to it. I am convinced that, if we took such a course, so far from allaying, it would materially aggravate those asperities of feeling on this subject which now unfortunately prevail in Scotland. My Lords, having stated thus much, it is not my intention to offer any opinion on the subject; nor would I advert to the assertion of the Noble Earl that the Scotch clergy have followed up the principle and practice of the Roman Catholic Church on this occasion; because I could not do so without entering into a discussion that could produce no benefit, and which had, therefore, be better deferred till the whole question shall come formally before your Lordships. I can repeat for my Noble Friend what he has stated for himself, that he will immediately give notice when the Government are prepared to introduce a measure adapted to remedy the evils and inconveniences which the Noble Earl has described; and he will give that notice in a manner so distinct, as to make the country fully aware of the intentions of Government, and to enable your Lordships carefully to consider the measure itself; or, if you disapprove of it, the arrangement, in point of time, will allow you to substitute another. Standing on that ground, I shall abstain from remarking further on the observations of the Noble Earl.

The EARL of GALLOWAY. — My Lords, I am much pleased that what I have said has elicited a more explicit declaration of the intentions of Government than has heretofore been given. I am, however, anxious to prevent a mistake going abroad with respect to what I said relative to the Scotch clergy, and which has been misunderstood by the Noble Marquess. I was far from charging against the clergy of the Church of Scotland that which the Noble Marquess appears to suppose that I did. On the contrary, I specially stated that I had the greatest respect for them, generally; but, I added, that I know, of my own knowledge, that some members of that Church have resorted to practices, in the course of this dispute, which were very much like those adopted by the Roman Catholic priesthood.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — The statement of the Noble Marquess is so far satisfactory; because it appears, from it, that Government will introduce a measure.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE — I did not say that.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — Well, then, I suppose I am mistaken. But, at any rate, I would suggest, that, in taking ample time to consider any measure, — if a measure is to be proposed, — it will be right to keep in view a very important event, with reference to the fate of such a measure — I allude to the meeting, early in the month of May, of the General Assembly. It is of essential importance, if a measure on this subject be introduced, that it should be considered by Parliament before that meeting; and if the Noble Viscount delay his measure until after Easter, the interval between that and the May meeting will hardly allow of full consideration. I throw out this suggestion only to remind the Noble Marquess that great inconvenience will be experienced, if Government introduce a measure into Parliament, and then leave it suspended until after that meeting shall have taken place.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE — I did not state that Government had decided that any measure would be introduced by them; but that, if they should decide to introduce one, ample notice would be given on the subject; and, if not, that full opportunity would be given for the introduction of a measure by others.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT ACT.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The MARQUESS of BUTE and the EARL of HADDINGTON presented petitions in favour of the principle of non-intrusion, from the minister, elders, and deacons of the Scots Church at London Wall, in the City of London; from the presbytery of Kelso; from the Presbyterian Church at Saintfield. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

The EARL of GALLOWAY and Lord

ITZGERALD and VESCI presented petitions gainst,—from inhabitants of Eardisland; ngham; and Llanfechain; and a petition rom the mayor, sheriffs, burgesses, and thers of the town and county of the own of Drogheda, praying that their ights, privileges, and immunities may be rotected. — Read, and ordered to lie on he table.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

The EARL of GALLOWAY presented pe-itions against any further grant of money or the support of, — of inhabitants of ngham; Eardisland; Ipplepen; and lanfechain.

LORD REDESDALE presented a petition or the appointment of a Committee to nquire into the studies and discipline of he college,—from Protestant inhabitants f Norfolk and Norwich.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CORN LAWS.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER and LORD REDESDALE presented petitions gainst the repeal of, — from owners and ccupiers of lands in the parishes of White Waltham and Shottesbrook; and undred of Bampton; from landowners, armers, and others, of Modbury; Black-wton; Stokenham; and Marlborough; nd from the agriculturists and others f Newton St. Cyres. — Read, and rdered to lie on the table.

PROTESTANT EMIGRATION.

The DUKE of ARGYLL.—My Lords, have to present to your Lordships a etition from the members of the Glasgow Protestant Emigration Society, stating heir want of employment, and praying to e enabled to proceed to Upper Canada, where they may be allowed a grant of and. I will take this opportunity to in-uire whether Government has received ny information of recent proceedings of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada, with respect to Crown lands?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — An Address of the Legislative Assembly has been received, one paragraph of which adverts to the propriety of appropriating part of the Crown lands to the encouragement of emigration. The Address will be laid on the table with other papers.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FOREIGN FLOUR.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — My Lords, a petition has been forwarded to me, of a very important nature; and I am sure that when I state to your Lordships that it comes from the high sheriff and grand jury of the county of Down, a body of men not surpassed by any similar body in the empire for property and intelligence, it will be considered by your Lordships to be worthy of the most grave attention. The petitioners allude to a measure now passing through another place, for the importation of foreign flour into Ireland; which measure they state to be fraught with ruin to the agricultural interests of Ireland. It is true that, according to the forms of the House, I cannot properly present the petition at the present moment; but having received it to-day, I considered myself justified in introducing it at once to your Lordships' notice. With these observations, I will, with your Lordships' permission, withdraw the petition, and present it when the Bill to which it refers comes regularly before the House.

Petition withdrawn.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

LORD FITZGERALD AND VESCI. — My Lords, I give notice that I will, on Thursday next, present a petition from the inhabitants of the town of Galway, praying that Galway may be excluded from Schedule A of the Irish Municipal Corporations Bill. I give this notice because a counter statement, as to the sentiments of the inhabitants, has gone forth; and I wish to afford to those who have made it, an opportunity for verifying it, if it be in their power.

EXCHEQUER RECORDS.

LORD MONTEAGLE. — My Lords, I beg to call the attention of the House to the papers which will this day be presented to your Lordships. Your Lordships will find that none of the Exchequer records which have been destroyed by order of the late Comptroller of the Exchequer were of the least importance. They were all examined before they were destroyed; and those that were condemned were, I believe, utterly worthless. The main records of that department have, for a long time, been in a state of great dilapidation, and were kept in a building adjoining your Lordships' House, where they remained until certain alterations rendered their removal necessary. They have been examined, and many of them have been placed before the public in a printed shape. Those that have been destroyed were of a class that had been used as temporary records, and had formerly been sold as waste paper. That practice has been put an end to; and it was considered preferable to destroy the documents, when they were no longer useful.

LORD REDESDALE. — I must still express my sorrow that the papers were destroyed; because, although they might be of little value to the Comptroller of the Exchequer, many persons of an antiquarian turn would be desirous of possessing them at a higher price than that of waste paper. I conceive that there is a very proper and just ground for inquiry, when documents have been destroyed, which might be connected with questions of property.

LORD MONTEAGLE. — I repeat that, before any one single paper was destroyed, a due examination was made by persons considered to be most competent to judge of their worth and value. Of those persons, one has been in the public service for forty-two years, and others ten or twelve years. No papers were destroyed except under their authority; and it was deemed proper that they should be destroyed, lest they might fall into the hands of improper persons.

PAPERS, &c.

Ordered, on the motion of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, That the Registrar General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages do make a Return of the number of persons reported to him to have died of the small-pox, in the year 1839.

Copies of all communications between the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Exchequer, on the subject of certain papers and documents removed from the vaults at Somerset House to the office at Whitehall Yard. — Delivered (pursuant to Address of yesterday), and to be printed.

The LORD CHANCELLOR informed the House, that the clerk assistant had prepared (pursuant to order of the 20th of January last) an account of the number of judgments given in the High Court of Chancery by the Lord Chancellor, during the four years ending 22d November, 1834, which were appealed to the House of Lords; showing the date of presentation of the said appeals, and distinguishing those judgments affirmed from those reversed.

The same was ordered to be printed.

VACCINATION EXTENSION BILL.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—My Lords, I beg to say that, in compliance with the suggestion of my Noble Friend (Lord Ashburton), I have prepared a clause to be added to this Bill in its next stage, compelling medical persons to make an annual Return of the number of persons they may inoculate with the small-pox virus.

CHESTER AND CREWE AND GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAYS CONSOLIDATION BILL.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I beg to call attention to the case of the Chester and Crewe Grand Junction Railway Bill. The Report was to have been considered this day ; but, according to the Standing Orders, it is necessary that a breviate should be laid on the table of the House the day before the consideration of the Report. Now, in point of fact, the breviate, in this case, was ready yesterday ; but, as the House did not sit, it could not be laid on the table. As the railway is only one of second rate importance, — being merely to unite two railways, — I hope, under the circumstances, the Standing Orders will be so far dispensed with as to allow the consideration of the Report to be taken to-morrow. If not, a week must elapse before the Bill can pass that stage.

Ordered, That the Report be taken into further consideration to-morrow, at five o'clock.

By Mr. Lascelles, — from Wakefield, in favour.

Referred to the Select Committee on Inland Warehousing.

PRINTED PAPERS BILL.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — I have to present to the House a petition signed by 757 attorneys and solicitors of the courts of law and equity. They state that they have seen with alarm the proceedings of this House with reference to the cause of

"Stockdale v. Hansard." They respectfully submit, that it is the undoubted right of all Her Majesty's subjects, who consider themselves aggrieved by the act of any person whomsoever, to seek for redress in Her Majesty's courts. That all suitors in Her Majesty's courts are entitled to the assistance of their attorney to conduct their cases; and that it is essential to the enjoyment of that right that the attorney should be protected in the lawful discharge of his professional duty. They state, further, that the law has pointed out the proper remedy for an erroneous judgment of the courts, and the constitution has vested in the Legislature the power of altering the law, as may be necessary. But they most respectfully but firmly submit, that the constitution of this country does not recognise in any person or body in the state, not even in this Honourable House, the right to supersede the administration of the law in Her Majesty's courts. They also state that they have heard with deep regret, that an attorney has incurred the displeasure of this Honourable House, and been committed to prison, because he has acted as attorney of a party in an action in which it was supposed that a privilege claimed by the House might be called in question. The petitioners, without expressing an opinion on any privilege claimed by this Honourable House, or on the conduct of any of the parties who have incurred its displeasure, beg leave respectfully to submit, that the imprisonment of an attorney, for acting in his professional capacity, in accordance with the decision of Her Majesty's courts of law, is most dangerous to the rights and independence of their — the petitioners' — profession, and to the due administration of justice. The petitioners conclude with these words: — "They humbly pray your Honourable House, that, while taking such measures for securing the privileges which the constitution has given you for the benefit of the people, as in your wisdom you may think right, will not sanction any act which may be injurious to the rights of your petitioners, or interfere with the independence and dignity of the law, and the free administration of justice."

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

SIR R. H. INGLIS. — I have, Sir, to call the attention of the House to a petition from the printers and publishers of the Times and Morning Post newspapers, in which they take notice of the Bill now before the House for giving protection to servants of the House for printing and publishing its Reports of Committees and other documents. The petition is as follows: —

TO THE HONOURABLE THE COMMONS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED.

The humble petition of John Joseph Lawson, of No. 26. Newington Crescent, in the parish of St. Mary, Newington, in the county of Surrey, printer, and Thomas Payne, of No. 23. Pembroke Square, Kensington, in the county of Middlesex, printer, Showeth, — That your petitioners are printers and publishers of certain newspapers published daily in London, and severally entitled the Times and the Morning Post, and are responsible for the contents of those papers.

That, to the conducting, in an adequate and efficient manner, the business in which your petitioners are engaged, and which consists in diffusing as widely as possible throughout the United Kingdom and its dependencies the fullest and most accurate information they can procure in relation to all affairs of public interest, it is indispensably necessary, upon occasions of frequent recurrence, that your petitioners should reprint and republish in their respective newspapers the whole or selected portions of Reports and other documents previously printed and published by order of your Honourable House.

That the utility of such Reports and documents depends, in a great degree, on their receiving publication through the medium of the public press.

That your petitioners are liable to prosecution by indictment or information, as well as to actions at law, for the recovery of damages, so often as anything contained in the Reports or other documents first printed and published by order of your Honourable House, and subsequently reprinted and republished by them, may be deemed by any individual whatever to reflect in any manner upon his character, or to be in any degree injurious to his private interests.

That your petitioners are apprehensive, if legislative protection against such prosecutions or actions at law be given exclusively to the original printers and publishers of parliamentary Reports or other documents connected with parliamentary proceedings, that prosecutions or actions at law against your petitioners, who are often compelled, in the regular and ordinary course of their business, to reprint and republish the same, may thereby be rendered more frequent, vexatious, and oppressive.

Your petitioners therefore humbly pray your Honourable House that you will not pass any Act having for its object or effect to prevent prosecutions or actions at law against the original printers or publishers of parliamentary Reports or other documents, unless such Act shall contain a clause or clauses to prevent, in like manner, prosecutions or actions against your petitioners, and the registered proprietors of the said newspapers, for reprinting and republishing the same in whole or in part.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

I do not intend to move to have the petition printed with the Votes, but I will give notice that if no other Member should take the matter up, I will, in a future stage of the Bill, move the addition of clauses to the effect prayed for in the petition.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

CHINA.— OPIUM TRADE.

Mr. LOWTHER and other Honourable Members presented petitions for suppression of the opium trade,—from Sunderand; York; and Stockton upon Tees.—To lie on the table.

Mr. W. CRAWFORD.—I have also o present a petition from merchants and other persons interested in the trade with China. The petitioners describe the state of the opium trade with China, and particularise the circumstances attending he surrender to the British superinendent, to be delivered to the Government of China, of all opium belonging to he British merchants at Canton. They pray that the House will cause an inquiry o be instituted into the statements of the petition, which they are prepared to subtantiate by evidence, either at the bar or before a Committee. I beg to move, hat the petition be printed, and circulated with the Votes, as I propose, on a future ccasion, to found a motion upon it.

The petition was ordered to lie on the able, and to be printed.

NEW WRIT.

For Inverness-shire, on the motion of Sir T. Fremantle, in the room of Francis William Grant, Esquire, deceased.

"Stockdale v. Hansard." They respectfully submit, that it is the undoubted right of all Her Majesty's subjects, who consider themselves aggrieved by the act of any person whomsoever, to seek for redress in Her Majesty's courts. That all suitors in Her Majesty's courts are entitled to the assistance of their attorney to conduct their cases; and that it is essential to the enjoyment of that right that the attorney should be protected in the lawful discharge of his professional duty. They state, further, that the law has pointed out the proper remedy for an erroneous judgment of the courts, and the constitution has vested in the Legislature the power of altering the law, as may be necessary. But they most respectfully but firmly submit, that the constitution of this country does not recognise in any person or body in the state, not even in this Honourable House, the right to supersede the administration of the law in Her Majesty's courts. They also state that they have heard with deep regret, that an attorney has incurred the displeasure of this Honourable House, and been committed to prison, because he has acted as attorney of a party in an action in which it was supposed that a privilege claimed by the House might be called in question. The petitioners, without expressing an opinion on any privilege claimed by this Honourable House, or on the conduct of any of the parties who have incurred its displeasure, beg leave respectfully to submit, that the imprisonment of an attorney, for acting in his professional capacity, in accordance with the decision of Her Majesty's courts of law, is most dangerous to the rights and independence of their — the petitioners' — profession, and to the due administration of justice. SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The EARL of GALLOWAY. — My Lords, I hold in my hand petitions in support of the non-intrusion principle, from the inhabitants of Kirkpatrick, Loss, Crossmichael, and Mid Calder. I will take this opportunity, not having been so fortunate as to be in the House during the conversation which took place on non-intrusion yesterday, to trouble your Lordships with a few observations. I have learnt, from the ordinary channels of information (I hope, correctly), that a Noble Earl (Earl of Aberdeen) stated that he had received letters of remonstrance from various parts of Scotland for having advised the Government to delay the settlement of the Church question; and he explained that, so far from having advised, he had rather blamed, the Government for the delay which had taken place; but that he had urged on Her Majesty's Ministers, if they had thus far postponed the consideration of the subject, not to be induced to come to a rash and precipitate decision at last, which, instead of being accessory, might be prejudicial, to the final and proper settlement of the question. Now, it so happens that these observations fell from the Noble Earl the same day that I thought it my duty, in consequence of the representations which I had received from Scotland, to urge on the Government not to allow another month to pass without an endeavour to effect some satisfactory settlement. I do not say that the Noble Earl was induced, by what fell from me, to make the observations attributed to him; but it so fell out, that the Noble Earl's recommendation of delay followed, in point of time, immediately upon my request for expedition. Wherefore, in my own defence, I wish to state some of the reasons which induced me to urge the subject on the attention of Ministers. First, I remembered that the Government had had six months for consideration, — that time and more having elapsed since the collision between the Church and the civil courts; next, I remembered the conduct of the Government on the subject of church extension in Scotland; I remembered the professions made by Her Majesty's Ministers, the appointment of the Commission of Inquiry, the Reports which were prepared, and how, after all, the matter was staved off from month to month, and from year to year, until, finally, having served its purpose, — the purpose of the Government, but not of the people, — it was abandoned. Then I remembered that the settlement of this question was the prayer of the bulk of the petitions which have been laid on your Lordships' table, many of which I have myself had the honour of presenting; and, lastly, I was of opinion that if this question was to be discussed in Parliament, it was very desirable that the discussion should take place before the House should separate for the Easter recess. These reasons form my excuse for having urged the Government to take the subject in hand. Nevertheless, my respect for the superior information and experience of the Noble Earl (Earl of Aberdeen),—my respect for his talents, his judgment, and his general position in this House, — looking to him, while the Government neglects its duty, as the leader on this important Scotch question, induced me to hold my peace, and silently and respectfully to acquiesce in his views. But now another month has passed, and the Government are unprepared to say, not only what they will do, but whether they will do anything at all. Meanwhile, there are in Scotland, "wars and rumours of wars;" the country is rent by dissensions from end to end; and, I regret to add, that some of the clergy, apparently forgetting their sacred office, have taken a leaf from the book of the Roman Catholic priesthood of Ireland; and agitation is going on in a form and spirit unworthy of the sacred calling of those who are engaged in it. I do not say this of all the clergy; my respect is too great for that enlightened body; and I know many of them, even of the anti-intrusionists, who, although disapproving of the decisions of the civil courts, still deplore the conduct of those brethren in the ministry to whom I have alluded. But the peace of parishes has been disturbed; the feelings of amiable and excellent individuals have been wounded and lacerated; and dissension has been fomented between pastors and their flocks. I have been repeatedly requested again to urge the Government to endeavour to pacify the country; but I have abstained from doing so, partly because I believed my efforts would be useless, and partly because I did not feel myself competent to the task, which more properly belongs to Noble Lords near me. I will therefore sit down with the simple expression of my own conviction, that the longer this question remains unsettled, the more difficult it will become of solution and adjustment.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. My Lords, I cannot let the observations — of the Noble Earl, or what might be implied from the language used by another Noble Earl, to go forth, without stating that neither the Noble Earl who has just addressed your Lordships, nor the other Noble Earl to whom allusion has been made, is justified in supposing that, because the Government have delayed to bring forward a measure on this important subject, there has been any delay whatever in its consideration. So far from it, the fact is, that consideration was given to it at a very early period; and it is only the great importance of the question, and the very circumstances which the Noble Earl has stated, as to its difficulty, that have prevented the Government from bringing a measure forward. Your Lordships must feel that the circumstances stated by the Noble Earl himself, in his short speech, are, of themselves, enough to make us dread precipitation. And, I must add, that I would much rather incur, on the part of the Government, the reproach, according to the expression of the Noble Earl (Lord Aberdeen), of delay, than that of launching precipitately upon the question, without an opportunity of making ourselves previously acquainted with all the opinions, feelings, and views that prevail in Scotland with respect to it. I am convinced that, if we took such a course, so far from allaying, it would materially aggravate those asperities of feeling on this subject which now unfortunately prevail in Scotland. My Lords, having stated thus much, it is not my intention to offer any opinion on the subject; nor would I advert to the assertion of the Noble Earl that the Scotch clergy have followed up the principle and practice of the Roman Catholic Church on this occasion; because I could not do so without entering into a discussion that could produce no benefit, and which had, therefore, be better deferred till the whole question shall come formally before your Lordships. I can repeat for my Noble Friend what he has stated for himself, that he will immediately give notice when the Government are prepared to introduce a measure adapted to remedy the evils and inconveniences which the Noble Earl has described; and he will give that notice in a manner so distinct, as to make the country fully aware of the intentions of Government, and to enable your Lordships carefully to consider the measure itself; or, if you disapprove of it, the arrangement, in point of time, will allow you to substitute another. Standing on that ground, I shall abstain from remarking further on the observations of the Noble Earl.

The EARL of GALLOWAY. — My Lords, I am much pleased that what I have said has elicited a more explicit declaration of the intentions of Government than has heretofore been given. I am, however, anxious to prevent a mistake going abroad with respect to what I said relative to the Scotch clergy, and which has been misunderstood by the Noble Marquess. I was far from charging against the clergy of the Church of Scotland that which the Noble Marquess appears to suppose that I did. On the contrary, I specially stated that I had the greatest respect for them, generally; but, I added, that I know, of my own knowledge, that some members of that Church have resorted to practices, in the course of this dispute, which were very much like those adopted by the Roman Catholic priesthood.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — The statement of the Noble Marquess is so far satisfactory; because it appears, from it, that Government will introduce a measure.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — I did not say that.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — Well, then, I suppose I am mistaken. But, at any rate, I would suggest, that, in taking ample time to consider any measure, — if a measure is to be proposed, — it will be right to keep in view a very important event, with reference to the fate of such a measure — I allude to the meeting, early in the month of May, of the General Assembly. It is of essential importance, if a measure on this subject be introduced, that it should be considered by Parliament before that meeting; and if the Noble Viscount delay his measure until after Easter, the interval between that and the May meeting will hardly allow of full consideration. I throw out this suggestion only to remind the Noble Marquess that great inconvenience will be experienced, if Government introduce a measure into Parliament, and then leave it suspended until after that meeting shall have taken place.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — I did not state that Government had decided that any measure would be introduced by them; but that, if they should decide to introduce one, ample notice would be given on the subject; and, if not, that full opportunity would be given for the introduction of a measure by others.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT ACT.

Petition for alteration of, as relates to the better attendance of medical men upon the poor, and suggesting various propositions the better to attain that object, — of the medical and surgical practitioners of the city of Gloucester. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The Marquess of Bute and the Earl of Haddington presented petitions in favour of the principle of non-intrusion from the minister, elders, and deacons of the Scots Church at London Wall, in the City of London; from the presbytery of Kelso; from the Presbyterian Church at Saintfield. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

The Earl of Galloway and Lord

itzgerald and Vesci presented petitions gainst,—from inhabitants of Eardisland; ngham; and Llanfechain; and a petition rom the mayor, sheriffs, burgesses, and thers of the town and county of the own of Drogheda, praying that their ights, privileges, and immunities may be rotected. — Read, and ordered to lie on he table.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

The Earl of Galloway presented petitions against any further grant of money or the support of, — of inhabitants of ngham; Eardisland; Ipplepen; and Llanfechain.

Lord Redesdale presented a petition or the appointment of a Committee to nquire into the studies and discipline of he college,—from Protestant inhabitants f Norfolk and Norwich.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CORN LAWS.

The Marquess of Westminster and Lord Redesdale presented petitions gainst the repeal of, — from owners and ccupiers of lands in the parishes of White Waltham and Shottesbrook; and hundred of Bampton; from landowners, farmers, and others, of Modbury; Blackawton; Stokenham; and Marlborough; and from the agriculturists and others of Newton St. Cyres. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PROTESTANT EMIGRATION.

The DUKE of ARGYLL.—My Lords, I have to present to your Lordships a petition from the members of the Glasgow Protestant Emigration Society, stating their want of employment, and praying to be enabled to proceed to Upper Canada, where they may be allowed a grant of land. I will take this opportunity to inquire whether Government has received any information of recent proceedings of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada, with respect to Crown lands?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — An Address of the Legislative Assembly has been received, one paragraph of which adverts to the propriety of appropriating part of the Crown lands to the encouragement of emigration. The Address will be laid on the table with other papers.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FOREIGN FLOUR.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — My Lords, a petition has been forwarded to me, of a very important nature; and I am sure that when I state to your Lordships that it comes from the high sheriff and grand jury of the county of Down, a body of men not surpassed by any similar body in the empire for property and intelligence, it will be considered by your Lordships to be worthy of the most grave attention. The petitioners allude to a measure now passing through another place, for the importation of foreign flour into Ireland; which measure they state to be fraught with ruin to the agricultural interests of Ireland. It is true that, according to the forms of the House, I cannot properly present the petition at the present moment; but having received it to-day, I considered myself justified in introducing it at once to your Lordships' notice. With these observations, I will, with your Lordships' permission, withdraw the petition, and present it when the Bill to which it refers comes regularly before the House.

Petition withdrawn.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

LORD FITZGERALD AND VESCI. — My Lords, I give notice that I will, on Thursday next, present a petition from the inhabitants of the town of Galway, praying that Galway may be excluded from Schedule A of the Irish Municipal Corporations Bill. I give this notice because a counter statement, as to the sentiments of the inhabitants, has gone forth; and I wish to afford to those who have made it, an opportunity for verifying it, if it be in their power.

EXCHEQUER RECORDS.

LORD MONTEAGLE. — My Lords, I beg to call the attention of the House to the papers which will this day be presented to your Lordships. Your Lordships will find that none of the Exchequer records which have been destroyed by order of the late Comptroller of the Exchequer were of the least importance. They were all examined before they were destroyed; and those that were condemned were, I believe, utterly worthless. The main records of that department have, for a long time, been in a state of great dilapidation, and were kept in a building adjoining your Lordships' House, where they remained until certain alterations rendered their removal necessary. They have been examined, and many of them have been placed before the public in a printed shape. Those that have been destroyed were of a class that had been used as temporary records, and had formerly been sold as waste paper. That practice has been put an end to; and it was considered preferable to destroy the documents, when they were no longer useful.

LORD REDESDALE.—I must still express my sorrow that the papers were destroyed; because, although they might be of little value to the Comptroller of the Exchequer, many persons of an antiquarian turn would be desirous of possessing them at a higher price than that of waste paper. I conceive that there is a very proper and just ground for inquiry, when documents have been destroyed, which might be connected with questions of property.

LORD MONTEAGLE. — I repeat that, before any one single paper was destroyed, a due examination was made by persons considered to be most competent to judge of their worth and value. Of those persons, one has been in the public service for forty-two years, and others ten or twelve years. No papers were destroyed except under their authority; and it was deemed proper that they should be destroyed, lest they might fall into the hands of improper persons.

PAPERS, &c.

Ordered, on the motion of Lord Ellenborough, That the Registrar General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages do make a Return of the number of persons reported to him to have died of the small-pox, in the year 1839.

Copies of all communications between the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Exchequer, on the subject of certain papers and documents removed from the vaults at Somerset House to the office at Whitehall Yard.—Delivered (pursuant to Address of yesterday), and to be printed.

The Lord Chancellor informed the House, that the clerk assistant had prepared (pursuant to order of the 20th of January last) an account of the number of judgments given in the High Court of Chancery by the Lord Chancellor, during the four years ending 22d November, 1834, which were appealed to the House of Lords; showing the date of presentation of the said appeals, and distinguishing those judgments affirmed from those reversed.

The same was ordered to be printed.

VACCINATION EXTENSION BILL.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—My Lords, I beg to say that, in compliance with the suggestion of my Noble Friend (Lord Ashburton), I have prepared a clause to be added to this Bill in its next stage, compelling medical persons to make an annual Return of the number of persons they may inoculate with the small-pox virus.

exchanging gold for copper. So disunited are the members of the Liberal Club, that their numbers give no real strength. With us, it is exactly the reverse.

The club, then, it appears, knew their real strength; and I think that, happily, they have but little to fear. Honourable Members opposite have a majority in the House, and they claim, therefore, I suppose, the privilege of putting down an association of this sort. Now, no one is a more strenuous supporter of privilege than I am; but I really cannot agree to extend privilege to this case. Seriously, however,—have Honourable Members opposite, before they put forward their bargain that the instant the Peel Club shall be abolished, the Liberal Club shall also be dissolved, — have they fully calculated their strength to enforce that bargain? How is it that they have not come down to inquire into the constitution of the Peel Club at its first formation, but, instead of that, have inrolled themselves of the Liberal Club? Far from this, it was not till they found that the Liberal Club was incapable of effecting their purposes, — it was not till they found that the principal men of the university were against them, and that they could do nothing against the Peel Club, that they said, "Let us get as great a majority on this question as we can, and so effect, by means of Parliament, what we cannot effect by our own strength." I ask, then, is it wise, — is it liberal — in the House, to descend to such measures? Where is it to end? Might not the next step be, to forbid clergymen interfering at elections? We find that, in Perthshire, one set of clergymen supported the Whig candidate, and another, who deprecated agitation, supported the Conservative; but, is it not one of the distinctive marks of a free country, to allow of the free expression of opinion, to take the advantages and the disadvantages of such a course together? It will be allowed that we must permit free discussion in this country; and nothing is more unwise, nothing more intolerant, than, for the purpose of controlling those who may be politically opposed to us, to interfere with freedom of discussion, whenever that freedom tends against our particular views. It is surely intolerance in those who are the advocates of free opinions, to say that, in the case of one university, freedom of discussion should not be permitted, and to choose to fix upon that university, because it contains a political body, having the right of electing its lord rector. For my own part, I feel very much flattered by this debate; because it calls to mind recollections of my own election as lord rector, — for that election I regard as one of the proudest events of my political life. It is true, that I avoided allusions to politics in my address to the university; but I did, while there, address some observations on political topics to one of the largest assemblies that I have ever been present at; and I never hear, without grateful recollections of the honours that were paid to me there, of the city of Glasgow; and I shall always hold the citizens of it in the highest respect. I wish for nothing more than to examine into the whole working of the Peel Club, and I can assure the Honourable Member that I have practised the greatest self-denial in refraining from seconding his motion. Most reluctantly, in consideration of my duties as a Member of Parliament, have I been withheld from seconding the Honourable Gentleman. If this inquiry should take place, in that part of it which will relate to the convivial meetings of the club, probably the character of the toasts usually given will be an object of interest. I may mention one. Everybody must feel that the character of a toast, at a public meeting, is partly dependent on the song which follows it. I find that the treasury of this club is very prosperous; and, on the occasion of the treasurer's health being drunk, the air was "Money in both pockets."

[Laughter.]

Perhaps the contrast between their treasury and that of their opponents has suggested an offensive interpretation to the toast. But why limit this inquiry to one university? Having acquiesced so long in the election of the lord rectors by the students, you must expect to find, in the university of Glasgow, as elsewhere, the usual concomitants of elections. Of course there must be political associations for the purpose of carrying those elections. If it be wrong for the university of Glasgow to have associations of this nature, is it not wrong for Eton to have them? Is it not wrong to have anything of the sort in the English universities? There is a Pitt Club and a Fox Club, I believe, at Cambridge; — will you tolerate them? But the Honourable Member says, he does not object to any but exclusive clubs. I would advise him to withdraw his objection altogether, because it is, in fact, nothing more nor less than an attempt to establish a censorship over the convivial meetings of the people. It is better to avoid these attempts, — it is better not to begin them. Are there not, in every election of Members to this House, some excesses; and do we not overlook these? Is it not the wiser part to be content to take the advantages and disadvantages of freedom together? Is it not by the free conflict of opinion,—by the waving of the blue flag here and the yellow flag there,—that, on the whole, political freedom is obtained? I trust the House will not be prevailed upon, after so long an acquiescence in this system, to turn round, now, because different politics from those which have hitherto prevailed are in the ascendant in the university; and to establish what, I believe, must give a fatal precedent of an inquisition into the convivial meetings, toasts, and sentiments of political bodies.

Mr. FOX MAULE.—My Honourable Friend will bear me witness that I have endeavoured to dissuade him from bringing on this motion; still, however, it is but justice to say, that the Honourable Member cannot have brought it on with any feelings of opposition; because the Liberal Club has not yet had an opportunity of showing its strength. I deprecate the inquiry, as inconsistent with the duties of the House; but, at the same time, I will not say that good may not arise from this discussion. Because, Honourable Members must bear in mind, that, after all, the University of Glasgow, consisting, as it does, of youth of very tender age, is but little removed from the character of an ordinary seminary in this country, though persons of more advanced years sometimes become students. I, for one, object to their having the right of electing their lord rector;—— but, with respect to this club, I wish to say, that, if the purpose of its institution had been merely to commemorate the election of the Right Honourable Baronet as lord rector, I, as a native of Scotland, should have looked on it with feelings of pride; because I am always glad to see my countrymen pay respect to eminent men, no matter what may be their politics; but, constituted as it is, I cannot approve of it. The Peel Club, on its establishment, was the first instance, I believe, in which the professors of the university mixed in the same club with the students; and I would ask whether great inconvenience and injury must not arise from this? Might not the professor's feelings of partiality be carried into his class-room? Might he not possibly feel more interest in advancing those students who belonged to his own club, and less interest in advancing others? It would be well for the professors to think of this. Deprecating, as I do, these political contests in schools, I think that they cannot well be helped in the University of Glasgow, at present; but I hope, at least, that the professors will retire from these clubs, and not be found keeping up among the students, by means of them, that excitement of political feelings, from week to week, which, before this establishment, was only a biennial inconvenience.

Mr. WALLACE.—The Right Honourable Baronets opposite have not shown, in their own speeches, much fear of wasting the time of the House; it is only when I attempt to speak, that they become so economical of it. The Right Honourable Member for Pembroke saved the time of the House in rather a singular way, by avoiding any allusion to the topics touched on in my speech. He never said one word about the professors, nor about the boys of eleven years old;—not one word about allowing children of such tender years to be present at the scenes usual at convivial meetings. Now, these two points formed the grounds of my complaint. We have now heard, from two lord rectors, that they approve of boys forming these clubs; and I have no doubt the admission will go far to teach parents the danger of sending their children to the university. I admit that I was told by the Honourable Under Secretary of State that he did not see how I could get this Return; but that was not any reason why I should not try. I know that this motion will be unsuccessful, but I will not relinquish my object. If any vote of money shall be brought forward in this House for Glasgow University, I shall feel it my duty to move, as an amendment, that it is highly discreditable in the professors of that university to allow political meetings to be held in the Greek and Logic class-rooms, and to join in the proceedings of such meetings. I beg leave, Sir, to withdraw the motion.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM.—Before the question is put, I beg to state that it is true, that the first meeting of the Peel Club was held in the Logic class-room; but that, from that time to the present, there has never been a political meeting held within the college walls.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE IONIAN ISLANDS.

LORD C. FITZROY. — Sir, I rise to nove for a "copy of the despatch to the ord High Commissioner of the Ionian slands, from the Colonial Office, conveyng an order for the dissolution of the egislative Assembly of those islands, in ctober last, on account of a difference etween that body and the Senate, relaive to the 8th article, 3d section, chap. ., of the constitution, under which the Legislative Assembly claimed a right, ndependent of the Senate." Article 8. ection 3. chapter 6. says that, —

> Whereas, in the preceding article, provision s made for establishing a temporary court of ustice, denominated the Supreme Council of Justice of the United States of the Ionian Islands, and for maintaining the same till such ime as new codes of civil and criminal law nd procedure can be framed and adopted; and which provision operates, for the time being, as reservation, to a future period, of the adjusting the final constitution in these states, as ar as regards the judicial authority within the ame; it is hereby declared, that whenever such ivil and criminal codes and procedure shall be ramed, or when the three years shall have expired for which the Supreme Council of Justice s established, the Legislative Assembly of these tates shall, on a message to be transmitted to hat effect by his Excellency the Lord High Commissioner, consider itself to be sitting for he immediate consideration of the said reserved natters of the constitution; and all the enactnents then made for the final adjustments of the lue courts of law, and of a fitting civil and crininal code and procedure, shall, in the first intance (as in the instance of the constitution tself), be submitted to His Majesty, the proecting sovereign; and, if ratified, they shall then e considered, to all intents and purposes, as orming an integral part of the constitution tself of these states.

My reason for troubling the House rith this motion is, that, a difference iaving arisen between the Legislature nd the Senate, respecting some criminal aws, the Legislative Assembly referred o the home Government, who promised hem an answer in a short time; and the nswer the Government has given, has een — to dissolve the Assembly. I am not oing to trouble the House by any lengthned explanation of the nature of the uarrel; but I certainly think the Goernment blameable for dissolving on so light a cause. I think that we should how greater care of the interests of those slands. Looking to their geographical osition, our possession of them is most mportant; and it would, therefore, be lesirable to encourage liberal opinions there, and to keep the people as free as possible from the influence of Russian intrigue.

SIR DE LACY EVANS. — I second the motion.

On the question being put, —

Mr. V. SMITH said: — Sir, considering that this is a question seldom agitated, and at the same time one of great interest; and looking at the present state of the House, I am not anxious to go into an elaborate discussion on the state of those islands. But I will advert shortly to the circumstances to which my Noble Friend's motion has reference. The question between the Legislative Assembly and the Senate is, whether all the forms of the constitution have been complied with, and whether a law, which passed through the Legislative Assembly, should pass through the Senate? The Legislative Assembly has refused to let the Senate know what was the case, on the ground that such a proceeding would be inconsistent with the original proceedings under the constitution. That objection, however, is not valid; as, at the first formation of the constitution, there was no Senate, and, consequently, there could be no communication with the Assembly. Since the Senate has been formed, it has become necessary that the laws should be approved of by the Senate. It was so, under Sir F. Maitland and Sir F. Adam; and, consequently, in the case to which my Noble Friend has alluded, — the Assembly having refused to allow the Senate any participation in the framing of laws, — Sir H. Douglas had no alternative but to dissolve the Assembly. However, I will not oppose the production of the paper, but will reserve any further observations I may have for a future occasion, if the Noble Lord shall feel it necessary to bring forward any resolution upon it.

Motion agreed to; Address ordered.

PAROCHIAL ASSESSMENTS.

Mr. P. SCROPE. — I beg to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Act 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 96. That Act was passed in 1836, and promised to give general satisfaction; but several defects have been discovered in the working, and I have been requested to endeavour to amend them. Amongst the rest, great difficulty has been found in levying, under the Act, the rates in boroughs at petty sessions. I propose to give the magistrates, in petty sessions, full powers for the purpose. I have also introduced a clause rendering the compulsory provision more efficient in compelling the officers to make a rate. I trust that these few observations will induce the House to permit the bringing in of the Bill, when Honourable Members will have full opportunities of examining more fully into it.

Leave given; Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Poulett Scrope and Mr. Hawes.

HEALTH OF TOWNS.

Committee nominated: — Mr. Slaney, Lord James Stuart, Lord Viscount Sandon, Mr. John Ponsonby, Mr. Cowper, Mr. Greene, Mr. Richard Walker, Mr. Wilson Patten, Sir Harry Verney, Mr. Baines, Mr. Oswald, Mr. Tuffnell, Mr. Brotherton, Mr. Ingham, and Mr. William Smith O'Brien. — Power to send for persons, papers, and records; five to be the quorum; power to report observations.

PRUSSIAN COMMERCIAL UNION.

Mr. WODEHOUSE. — I am happy to inform the House that neither my long motion on this subject, nor a long speech, will be necessary, inasmuch as Doctor Bowring's Report has been put into my hands this morning. I must, in justice to the learned doctor, say, that a more interesting document was never laid on the table of this House.

CORONERS' COURTS.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I beg to move for "a Select Committee, to inquire into any measures which have been adopted for carrying into effect, in the county of Middlesex, the provisions of the Act of 1 Victoria, c. 68.; and also, into any proceedings of the justices of the peace, in relation to the office of coroner in the said county, with power to send for persons, papers, and records, and to report thereon to the House." My reason for this motion is, that, an Act having been brought in by the Solicitor General, in 1837, for the purpose of remedying the defects in the law relating to the coroner's office, that Act worked well for some time; but lately, the magistrates of Middlesex have seen fit to interpret the power given them to alter and vary the coroner's schedules, as one to rescind them altogether. Under these circumstances I have conceived it to be my duty to move for a Select Committee, in order that the law may be settled in such a way as to be intelligible and conclusive.

SIR G. STRICKLAND. — I second the motion.

COLONEL T. WOOD. — I feel it my duty to oppose the motion. The motion is invidious, in respect to the justices of the county of Middlesex; and I cannot but think it unfair, looking to the station the Honourable Member for Finsbury fills, that he should endeavour to avail himself of the powers he possesses as a Member of this House, to ask for this inquiry into the conduct of gentlemen upon whom the Legislature has imposed the duty of correcting his accounts. If the inquiry is to be made at all, it should be general and have reference to every county in England.

Mr. HUME. — I certainly concur with the Honourable and Gallant Member for Middlesex, in thinking that the inquiry ought to be general; and therefore I trust that my Honourable Friend the Member for Finsbury will amend his motion, so as to make the inquiry general.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I shall be very glad to extend the inquiry.

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — I was prepared to object to the original motion, but my objections are still more strengthened by the proposition now made, to make the inquiry general. No grounds have been stated for any such inquiry, and I shall therefore oppose the motion, even in its amended form. In my opinion, the House would stultify itself by agreeing to such a motion. The Honourable Member states that the beadles are dissatisfied with the conduct of the magistrates, and that public attention is much drawn to the accounts; but even that does not convince me that there is any necessity for the step he now proposes. I would beg, also, to remind the Honourable Member, that the magistrates are, by the Act, expressly permitted to amend the schedules. Under these circumstances, I trust the House will reject the motion of the Honourable Member.

SIR M. WOOD. — I can state, having taken a part in auditing coroners' accounts in the county of Gloucester, that, in that county, there is no need for inquiry. I think, however, that as, under a late Act, several new places have been created, we should endeavour to establish some fixed mode of payment for the officers. It has been objected that the Honourable Member only refers to Middlesex in his motion; but then it should be recollected, that in that county only has there been any complaint. However, I think that the inquiry might as well be made general.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I think the Honourable Member for Finsbury has been rather hardly dealt with on this occasion. The Honourable Member consented to alter his motion to meet the views of one Honourable Member opposite, and, having done so, he is now opposed by the Honourable Baronet the Member for Buckingham. If there is to be any inquiry at all, I think it ought to be general.

COLONEL T. WOOD. — In my opinion, this motion is very unusual. I did not say that I would consent to the motion if it were made general. What I said was, that if special, it would be invidious; but if general, nothing could be more frivolous.

Mr. H. KEMBLE. — The justices have only performed the duties imposed upon them by the statute; and I am of opinion that no grounds have been laid for the present motion.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I do not think I have been treated fairly. I have been accused of making a motion without stating any sufficient grounds for it. Now, I ask, would it have been fair in me to make a statement which might inculpate persons who were not present to defend themselves? If this Committee shall be granted, I shall have very little influence over it. It will consist of fifteen Members, and it will be impossible for one individual to exercise any undue influence in it. It is quite clear that a Bill must be introduced to define the law in this matter; and therefore it is desirable that the House should possess that information, which can be elicited oply by a Select Committee. I beg to say that I do not move for this Committee from a motive hostile to any individuals. There are, to be sure, parties with whom I have to contend, but not in the House; and out of it, I am sure to defeat them. To show the necessity for my motion, I may mention that, in Middlesex, the magistrates have decided, first, that the duty of constable on coroners' inquests should not be performed by any but a salaried officer; and then they have refused to grant salary to any; so that now I do not know to whom to direct my warrant. Depend upon it, that if the House wish to encourage crime, the best step it can take for that purpose, is, to keep down the coroner's officer.

Mr. CRIPPS. — I shall have no objection to vote for the motion of the Honourable Member, if he will consent to make it general; but I think, that if there be a necessity for inquiry in Middlesex, the same necessity must exist in every other county.

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE. — My objection is to the motion altogether. If the coroner's office wants revision, let the Honourable Member bring in a Bill for that purpose.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, MERCURII, 18° DIE MARTII, 1840.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

GREAT LEVEL OF THE WASH INCLOSURE BILL.

Petition for Bill (presented 21st January) read.

LORD G. BENTINCK.—Sir, the parties interested in this Bill having found that it is insufficient for their purpose, and that it cannot be altered without a violation of the Standing Orders, I beg leave to withdraw the Bill, in order that a new and more perfect one may be prepared. There are clauses relating to navigation, and others giving a compulsory power to the promoters, which are unnecessary and inconsistent with the principles of the Bill. It is proposed to bring in a new Bill without these clauses, and simply for inclosure. I would remind the House that the Bill is one of great importance. It proposes to reclaim from the sea an area of 150,000 acres, a space equal to the county of Huntingdon; and, in the process of reclaiming, the necessary consequence will be, that the drainage of upwards of a million of acres must be greatly improved. It will also improve the navigation of four great rivers, without increasing the tolls one farthing. I apprehend that there never was a Bill calculated to confer so much public benefit without subjecting any party to new taxation, and without a single compulsory enactment. I therefore think that it presents a strong case for the indulgence of the House. There are several precedents for it: — that of the Boston Harbour Bill, on 18th of March, 1814; the Milford Haven Bill, 7th of June, 1814; and the Dublin Improvement Bill. In all these cases, leave was granted to bring in new Bills. In this case, not a single individual can be injured, while thousands must be benefited. I trust, therefore, that the House will accede to the prayer of the petition.

On the question being put, "That the Bill be withdrawn,"—

LORD G. SOMERSET said: — Before this question is disposed of, I wish to express my opinion as to the course which ought to be adopted. I think it would be much better to retain the Bill, striking out the objectionable clauses, than to bring in a new Bill, provided that course would not be attended with great inconvenience.

Mr. WILSON PATTEN. — I would remind the House that this question has been before the Standing Orders Committee, and that they have decided on making parties answerable for their errors. I think, therefore, that the House should exercise great caution in permitting the introduction of a Bill, in violation of the Standing Orders.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I think that the House would not be deprived of its remedy by granting the prayer of the petition. The Bill could be referred to the Standing Orders Committee, where the whole matter could be investigated.

The SPEAKER. — It is quite true, as the Noble Lord has stated, that there have been cases in which parties were allowed to bring in new Bills; but those were cases in which the Standing Orders had been complied with. I think it would be establishing a dangerous precedent to allow parties to strike out objectionable passages in order to induce the House to grant leave for a new Bill.

Notice taken, that the Bill was not prepared in conformity to the petition for the same; order for second reading discharged; Bill withdrawn.

On the question being put, "That leave be given to bring in a new Bill for inclosing and reclaiming from the sea certain tracts of land, forming the great estuary called 'the Wash,' between the coasts of Norfolk and Lincolnshire," —

Mr. GREENE said: — I rise for the purpose of opposing this Bill altogether. We cannot allow parties to come to this House to petition for a Bill contemplating extensive improvements, which are promised to insure the consent of parties whose properties may be interfered with, and then to bring it down to dimensions suited to their own purposes. For this reason, I trust the House will not accede to the motion of the Noble Lord.

LORD G. BENTINCK. — Sir, as I perceive the feeling of the House is against me, I will not press my motion, but will adopt some other mode of proceeding.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BIRMINGHAM AND WARWICK JUNCTION (BORDESLEY) CANAL BILL.

Petition of the company of proprietors of the Warwick and Birmingham Canal Navigation (presented 17th of March), read.

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS. — I beg leave to move that this petition be referred to the Committee on the Bill.

On the question being put, —

Mr. GREENE said: — I regret to say that I shall feel it my duty to oppose the prayer of this petition, because, in granting it, I feel that we should be establishing a very inconvenient precedent. The petition is not, in point of fact, directed against any part of the Bill now before the House, but against clauses which the parties fear will be added in Committee, on the petition of other parties. I think, however, that the petitioners should have an opportunity of being heard, if the other parties come before the Committee. For this reason, I have framed a proposition, which I think will give them everything they can fairly require, without infringing on the Standing Orders. I shall move, by way of amendment, "That it be an instruction to the said Committee to receive and entertain the said petition, but only to hear the petitioners, their counsel, or agents, against such clauses, provisions, or amendments in the said Bill, as may be sought to be introduced by the company of proprietors of the Birmingham Canal Navigation, by the company of proprietors of the Stratford upon Avon Canal Navigation, by the company of proprietors of the Coventry Canal Navigation, and by Charles Woodcock, whose petitions were, on Friday last, severally referred to the said Committee."

SIR GEORGE GREY. — I apprehend that, under the Standing Orders, the petitioners have a right, should hostile clauses be proposed by other petitioners, to ask that they should be expunged. That being the case, I think the amendment proposed by the Honourable Member for Lancaster will save a great deal of unnecessary trouble.

Question, "That these words be there added," put, and agreed to. — Main question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

CHESTER AND CREWE AND GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAYS' CONSOLIDATION BILL.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I move that the Speaker do now leave the chair. My object for having the Bill reconsidered in Committee is, to add three clauses providing penalties against those who may cause obstructions on the line of road.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — Sir, I cannot help thinking that some time should be allowed for consideration, in cases like this. In my opinion, these additional clauses are often added to Private Bills without the House having had an opportunity of considering whether or not they are likely to interfere with the interests of the public. The House should not precipitately consent to any clause imposing penalties on the public traveling on railways.

LORD SANDON. — I think I shall be able to satisfy the House that, in proposing these clauses, I am consulting the interests of the public, not of the proprietors. The penalties I propose are against those who would create obstructions on the line of railway, and thus endanger the lives of the passengers. I think that the House must see, not only that the clauses are innocent, but that they are called for by considerations of public safety.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — While I agree with the Right Honourable Member for Ripon, that all clauses of this kind should be carefully investigated; I think that, in this case, my Noble Friend has given sufficient reasons why the House should assent to the clause he proposes.

House in committee.

Report further considered (prints having been delivered on Friday, 18th March); amendments agreed to; three clauses added; other amendments made; Bill to be ingrossed.

Birmingham and Derby Junction Railway and Tamworth Approach Bill. — Reported; Report to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Bolton Small Debts Bill. — Reported; to be ingrossed.

Weston super Mare Road Bill. — Read a third time, and passed.

Warminster Road Bill. — Read a third time; amendments made; Bill passed.

Lloyd's Divorce Bill. — Read a first time; to be read a second time.

Thames Tunnel. — Petition for Bill reported; Report referred to the Select Committee on Standing Orders.

Glasgow, Paisley, and Greenock Railway Bill, — By Mr. Loch, — from the provost, baillies, and town council of Renfrew, against. — Referred to the Committee on the Bill; counsel ordered.

Kingston upon Hull Docks Bill, — By Mr. Hutt, — from inhabitants of Kingston upon Hull, in favour. — To lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS,

That they have agreed to Edinburgh Gas Bill, with an amendment:

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to dissolve the Marriage of George Lloyd, Esquire, with Athalie Pulcherie Clotilde, his now Wife, and to enable him to marry again; and for other Purposes therein mentioned:"

That they do communicate to this House the depositions transmitted from India, relating to the Bill intituled, "An Act to dissolve the Marriage of James Perry, Esquire, with Elizabeth Margaret, his Wife, and to enable him to marry again, and for other Purposes," as desired by this House; and request that the said depositions may be returned to them.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

STADE DUTIES.

Mr. HUTT. — Sir, I hold in my hand two petitions from Kingston upon Hull, complaining of the duties, fines, and charges levied by the Hanoverian authorities at Stade on British ships and cargoes passing up the Elbe to Hamburg. As Honourable Members are very little acquainted with the facts of the case to which they refer, I beg to move that they be printed with the Votes.

The SPEAKER. — I must remind the Honourable Member that it is against the Standing Orders to print a petition on a subject not before the House.

Mr. GREENE. — I object to the printing of the petition, as a violation of the Standing Orders. The rule is, that petitions relating to matters which are to be subjects of discussion shall not be printed with the Votes; and if this rule were lightly dispensed with, it would be establishing a precedent which might be found inconvenient, as every Member would think that the petition from his constituents was of sufficient importance to be printed with the Votes.

Mr. HUTT. — I must remind the Honourable Member that the subject is but little understood, though of much importance, as relating to a portion of our commerce. When it was brought on last year, many Members left the House; and even of those who remained, some inquired whether the question did not relate to the "starch duties?"

Mr. WAKLEY. — I must say that the House will certainly bring itself into bad odour with the people, if it interpose such obstacles to their petitions. In the other House of Parliament, no such difficulties are interposed, — the petitions are printed, and full means afforded of bringing each under the consideration of the House; but, in this House, Members are obliged to beg and pray, implore and entreat, in order to have the petitions of their constituents printed. I repeat, that such obstacles to petitioning will tend to bring the House into something worse than contempt with the country. If the regulation now insisted on be a rule of the House, it ought to be relaxed; and the sooner the better.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I do not concur with the Honourable Member who spoke last, that this House places any undue restrictions as to petitions. I will not go into any comparisons as to the rules of the two Houses, but I believe the Honourable Member is not correct in saying that petitions presented to the House of Lords are printed in all cases. I approve of the rule referred to by the Honourable Member as a general rule; but I think the present is a case in which it ought to be relaxed.

LORD G. SOMERSET. — As a general rule, I perfectly concur with the Honourable Member for Lancaster; but I think that there are cases which ought to be made exceptions. As the case is so little understood, I think it would be well to relax the rule in this instance.

Mr. L. HODGES. — I would ask the Honourable Member whether there are any other petitions on the same subject?

Mr. HUTT. — In reply to the Honourable Member, I beg to say that it is not the only petition. It is probable that many others will be presented to-morrow; but the present is the only one which will require to be printed.

Mr. GREENE. — Under these circumstances, and seeing that the feeling of the House is in favour of having the petition printed, I will not press my objection.

Petition ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

POOR LAWS.

SIR J. Y. BULLER. — Sir, I have to present a petition from the guardians of the Honiton Poor Law union, on the subject of the poor laws. They state that, before the formation of this union, the poor rates were comparatively low, and the poor were contented; but that now, after an experience of three years, they find the rates increasing, and the poor dissatisfied. They therefore pray that the Honiton union may be dissolved.

Ordered to lie on the table.

EJECTMENT AND REPLEVIN (IRELAND) BILL.

On the motion of Mr. E. Tennent, second reading deferred till Wednesday, 1st of April.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Mr. HODGES. — I give notice that I shall, on the 24th of this month, move for leave to bring in a Bill to render efficient the ancient constabulary system of England and Wales.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — I give notice that I shall, when the Ordnance Estimates come under the consideration of the House, call the attention of the Master General to the state of discipline in the military college at Woolwich.

Mr. PIGOT. — I give notice that I shall, to-morrow, move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Irish Tithe Act.

SIR J. GRAHAM.—Sir, I gave notice that I intended, on this day, to put a question to the Noble Viscount the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, which I cannot now do, seeing that the Noble Lord is not in his place. I hope that I shall be more fortunate to-morrow, to which day I postpone my question.

PRINTED PAPERS COMMITTEE.

Power to report observations and minutes of evidence from time to time.

First Report brought up, and read; to lie on the table, and to be printed.

RAILWAY COMMUNICATION BETWEEN LONDON AND DUBLIN.

Mr. SHAW. — Sir, in reference to the commissions — one naval, the other composed of civil engineers—which have been appointed to inquire into the communication between London and Dublin, I wish to know, from the Noble Lord opposite, why it is that the naval Report, understood to have been already made upon this subject, has not yet been laid upon the table of the House? and I further wish to know how soon we may expect to have it?

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I beg to inform the Right Honourable Member that Reports of that description are always made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but I will make inquiries on the subject.

SETTLED ESTATES DRAINAGE BILL.

Mr. PUSEY. — I beg to move "That this Bill be now read a second time."

On the question being put, —

SIR E. SUGDEN said: — I wish to draw the attention of the House to the importance of the measure now presented to its notice. It is one giving to the tenant for life power to charge a settled estate with all the expenses of drainage. No one is more desirous than I am that drainage should be facilitated; but, here, the question is, whether the House is prepared to break in on the integrity of settlements, and to give a power to tenants for life to charge the estate with any expense they may choose to incur. Whatever necessity there may be in Scotland for such an enactment, there is none as regards England or Ireland; because, by the present mode of settlement, every necessary power is given. I object to it, as the first step towards interfering with the will of the donor of the estate against the interests of infants or others, who have no means of defending their rights. Besides, if we consent, in this case, to allow the tenant for life to charge the estate with his expenses for drainage, the next step will be to ask for the expenses of planting, and then building. Let the Honourable Member modify his measure ever so much, there will be great room for abuse under it. Under all the circumstances, I think it my duty to warn the House to proceed very cautiously with this measure. I will not object to going into a Select Committee on the Bill; but I fear that no modification will reconcile me to the principle of the Bill.

Mr. LYNCH. — I shall support the Bill, on the ground that society ought not to be deprived of the advantages which such a Bill is calculated to produce; nor ought the family of the life tenant to lose its share of these advantages for the sake of a rigid adherence to the will of a donor. The House has to determine whether, during the tenant's life,— during a period perhaps of sixty or seventy years, — the land is to remain in an unimproved state; or whether, on the other hand, the tenant for life is to improve it for the benefit of the inheritance. In the one case, it would be highly detrimental to the land, and, in the other, grossly unjust to the tenant for life. I think the measure will be of the greatest service to tenants for life, particularly in Ireland; and the only thing I see that the House has to do, if it sanction the principle, is to guard against fraud.

SIR G. STRICKLAND. — I am certainly opposed to this Bill; and mainly because it gives to the tenant for life too great a power over the heir of entail, whose property may be frittered away by his acts, if unrestrained. Now, in the cases of building or planting, the return to the tenant for life is far more distant than in the case of draining. There is no man, who knows anything of farming, who must not admit that the most certain and immediate return for money expended in the way of improvement, is from draining waste lands. There have been many instances where, in one single year, the value of the land has been doubled by draining. Now, that cannot be done by planting for a great number of years, if, indeed, at all. It therefore appears to me that the power given by this Bill is nothing more nor less than a power to the tenant for life to commit a fraud; and I sincerely hope it may be opposed, not only in its present, but in every future stage, in which it may be permitted to come before the House.

SIR S. CROMPTON. — Notwithstanding what has fallen from the Honourable Baronet, I shall support this Bill; because I know, from my own experience, that great injustice is suffered by the owners of settled estates, in consequence of the tenants for life not being able to improve them.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — Sir, in private Bills, the Legislature has frequently considered it advisable that the remainder-man should bear a part of the expense. But, putting out of question both the remainder-man and the tenant for life, there seems to me to be another interest in question here, which the House should not disregard,—I mean the interest of the public. In my humble opinion, the public interest requires that all bars to the improvement of the land, and the encouragement of agriculture, should be removed; and as this Bill will tend to such effects, to a certain extent, I trust it will be allowed to pass into a law. No person will assert that, in affording a facility to drain waste lands, you are not, at the same time, giving an encouragement to agriculture. But you cannot expect that a tenant for life, with a large family to support, and who has only the prospect of a very short interest in the land, will pay money out of his own pocket for improvements, for which there is no certainty of a return during his life.

Mr. GOULBURN.—I entirely concur, Sir, in what has been suggested by my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Ripon. Honourable Gentlemen who support this Bill seem to think that, from the drainage of waste lands, no benefit accrues to the individual in possession. The argument of the Honourable Member for Galway makes directly against his own case, and in favour of the line we advocate. He says that sixty years may elapse before the estate passes into the possession of another individual. That being the case, the person in possession cannot but have an interest sufficient to induce him to improve the land; if not entirely at his own expense, at least principally. I think, therefore, if we are to make a change, that the person in possession should bear a portion of the expenses of improving the estate; and not, as is proposed by this Bill, allow them to be thrown entirely on the person who may succeed him. The Honourable Baronet opposite tells you that the advantage derived from the drainage of waste lands is very considerable, and that a return of money is sooner had from draining than from any other species of improvement. Surely, then, it would not be just to throw the burden of so profitable an investment entirely upon the remainder-man.

Mr. FRESHFIELD.—I support this Bill, Sir, with great pleasure; although I admit it ought not to pass in its present shape. The question, then, is how, and to what extent, shall it be modified? In what proportion, and under what circumstances, shall the reversional interest be affected by it; and to what extent shall the property be charged with the improvements made? These are questions for the consideration of the Committee. I think it would be unjust to charge the reversion with the whole expense; and I hold that a proportion of that expense, as well as the interest of the money, should fall upon the tenant for life. As the property will be continually increasing, in consequence of those improvements, a proportion, only, of the expense ought to fall upon the reversion. I hope the Bill may, ultimately, pass into a law.

The Bill was then read a second time, and committed to a Select Committe.

SUPPLY.

Rosolutions reported:—

1. That a sum, not exceeding 3,511,870*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of Her Majesty's land forces, for service in the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and on stations abroad (excepting the regiments employed in the territorial possessions of the East India Company), from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive.

2. 6. That a sum, not exceeding 15,815*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of allowances as rewards for distinguished services, and of allowances to officers of Her Majesty's garrisons, holding their appointments as rewards for military service, in the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and on foreign stations, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive.

7. That a sum, not exceeding 92,000*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of the pay of general officers in Her Majesty's forces, not being colonels of regiments, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive.

8. That a sum, not exceeding 53,500*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of full pay for reduced and retired officers of Her Majesty's forces, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive.

9. That a sum, not exceeding 505,500*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of half pay and military allowances to reduced and retired officers of Her Majesty's land forces, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive.

10. That a sum, not exceeding 63,608*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of half pay and reduced allowances to officers of disbanded foreign corps, of pensions to wounded foreign officers, and of allowances to the widows and children of deceased foreign officers, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive.

11. That a sum, not exceeding 142984*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of pensions to be paid to widows of officers of the land forces, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive.

12. That a sum, not exceeding 127,300*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of allowances on the Compassionate List, of allowances as of Her Majesty's Royal bounty, and of pensions, gratuities, and allowances to officers for wounds, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive.

13. That a sum, not exceeding 1,274,639*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals, of the in-pensioners of those establishments, of the out-pensioners of Chelsea Hospital, of pensions granted to discharged negro soldiers, and of pensions from Hanoverian corps which served with the British army in 1793, 1794, and 1795, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive.

14. That a sum, not exceeding 42,000*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of allowances, compensations, and emoluments, in the nature of superannuation or retired allowances, to persons formerly belonging to the several military public departments in the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, from the 1st day of April, 1840, to the 31st day of March, 1841, both days inclusive.

Resolutions agreed to; Committee deferred till Friday.

MUTINY BILL. — MARINE MUTINY BILL.

Reported; to be read a third time to-morrow.

UNION WORKHOUSES BILL.

The Order of the Day for going into Committee on the Bill having been read, —

MR. BURROUGHES said: — Sir, I wish to take this opportunity of stating that I do not concur in the principle of this Bill. I think it is not a proper measure to bring before the House, and that it would be much better to propose the provisions it contains in the shape of a clause in the amended Poor Law Act, in a Committee of the whole House upon that subject. If the amendment of the Honourable and Gallant Member for Brighton should be acceded to, a part of the objection I have to this Bill will be removed, because it will make the Bill more general, and therefore more beneficial. I cannot see why union workhouses are to be exempted from the payment of poor rates, if other houses of a far more charitable description are not. Besides, I believe that the Parochial Assessments Act has already prevented the possibility of any further assessments upon workhouses. Unless some alteration be made in this Bill in Committee, or that I hear some good reason alleged for going on with it, I shall certainly oppose it at a future stage.

MR. FOX MAULE. — I can only say, Sir, that I brought this measure forward because it was considered to be most desirable that all new workhouses built since the passing of the Poor Law Act, should be exempted from poor rates. I have amended the Bill since it was introduced, in order that all union workhouses may be exempted from both parochial and parliamentary assessments.

Bill considered, and agreed to in Committee.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — So far, Sir, I consider this Bill a good one; but I think it ought to be extended further; and, in the hope that it would be, I gave notice of a clause which I now rise to move for leave to bring up, including hospitals in its provisions.

MR. BERNAL (Chairman). — I do not think the Honourable Member can move such a clause, as it differs in its object from the preamble of the Bill.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I consulted the Solicitor General as to that point, and he said he did not think the clause could be objected to upon that ground. That was a sincere opinion, for he gave it without a fee.

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Oh! if he gave it without a fee, it is not worth anything.

[Laughter.]

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I should like to hear the opinion of some legal gentleman on the subject; but it does appear to me that the clause of the Honourable Member does not come within the scope of the title of the Bill. Otherwise, I should be happy to give every facility to the Honourable Member to proceed with it.

Mr. GOULBURN. — In the absence of better authority, I must say that I have no doubt that, in a Bill respecting workhouses, you cannot introduce a clause respecting hospitals.

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — I have been requested by the Honourable Colleague of the Honourable and Gallant Member for Brighton to express his regret at not being able to be present to support the clause of the Honourable and Gallant Member.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — Perhaps the Honourable Member the under Secretary for the Home Department will pledge himself to bring forward a measure to effect the object I have in view.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I cannot pledge myself to do so, without first taking the subject into consideration.

Mr. GORING. — If the Honourable Gentleman should take the subject into consideration, I hope he will also consider the propriety of including lunatic asylums.

Bill to be reported to-morrow.

PRISONS BILL.

Considered in Committee, and reported; further consideration of Report on Monday next; Bill, as amended, to be printed.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Committee deferred till Friday.

TITHE COMMUTATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Reported; to be read a third time on Friday.

LORD HOLLAND. — My Lords, a Noble Friend of mine (the Marquess of Breadalbane), who is now absent in Scotland, has requested me to present petitions, above 200 in number, in favour of the principle of non-intrusion. I trust that my infirmities will be my excuse for not presenting them in the usual form. I have taken care to examine them, and have ascertained that they contain nothing irregular or disrespectful to your Lordships' House. Some of them, while they pray for the abolition of patronage, suggest, also, that compensation should be made for the loss of such patronage. Though I feel honoured by being intrusted with the presentation of those petitions, still I will not venture to express any opinion on the merits of the question. The petitions are from the ministers, elders, and other inhabitants of Fearn; Tillicoultry; Killearnan; Watten; Rescobie; East Kilbride; Rothiemay; Kilcalmonell; Kilmalie; Culross; Castledawson; and Edinburgh: of the moderator and members of the Associate Session of Renton: of the Kirk Session of the National Scotch Church, Regent Square: of heritors, ministers, and others of Resolis; and Marnoch: of magistrates and town council of Brechin: of the presbytery of Perth; Newcastle upon Tyne; Dingwall; Lorn; Caithness; Dunbar; Turriff; Dumfries; and Aberdeen: of members of the Kirk Session of Kelso; Dunfermline; Cowan Street, Kirkaldy; and Saint Peter's, Dundee: of members of the Presbyterian Church, Townsend Street, Belfast; Ballymacanett; and Strabane: and of inhabitants of Sprouston; Fearn; New Spynie; Oban; Contin; Kilsyth; Tain; Portnahaven; Glenisla; Bothkennar; Prestonpans; Cleish; Kilcherran and Dalavich; Urray; Darsie; Strontian; Stanley; Kilmuir; Leuchars; Dundee; and Lochbroom: and of inha- Lunan; Dalton; Forgandenny; Killin; Stow; Bernedale; Torphichen; Anworth; Birnie; Moneydie; Thurso; Linbrathen. Dron; Girthen; Collace; Tinwald; Brydekirk; Kinclaven; Campbeltown; Heriot; Cupar Angus; Dunipace; Tarbat; Duthil; Perth; Meigle; Elgin; Lethendy and Kinloch; Ruthwell; Larbert; Anstruther Wester; Troqueer and Maxwelltown; Strathkinniss; Barry; Gartmore; Eastwood; Brechin; Rayne; Forteviot; Trinity Gask; Ardnamurchan, Rhynd; Chapelshade; Prestonkirk; Roxburghshire; Balquhidder; Glenlyon; of the mission of Lawers Breadalbane; Ferglen; Moffat; Legerwood; Fraserburgh; Hawick; Tarland; Dunbarny Bridge of Earn; Kinfauns; Kilbrandon; Banton; Torryburn; Kirkhill; Fintry; Dryfesdale; Newton Stewart; Lybster; Logie Easter; Belfast; Edinburgh; Selkirk. Leslie; Old Monkland; Troon; Annan; Abercorn; Stevenston; Dalkeith; Keir; Sanquhar; Skim; Mordington; Scoonie. Speymouth; Kirkpatrick Irongray; Tundergarth; Portree; North Knapdale; Bruan; Kilmalie; Nenthorn; Clunie; Fodderty; Kingoldrum; Kirkmichael; Kirkpatrick; Fleming; Inverkeillor; Durinish; Newtyle; Keiss; Burntisland; Logie; Banff; Crieff; Dumfries; Saint Andrew's; Bendochy; South Uist; Kilmuir Easter; Eassey and Nevay; Kirkcaldy; Rattray; Denny; Tenandry; Cockburnspath; Milnathort; Kemback; Innerwick; Belnahuay; Cumbernauld; Invertiel; Abernyte; St. Mungo; Craig. Kilspindie; Gask; Strathfillan; Glenelg. Knock; Kilchoman; Alloa; Cockenzie. Bower; South Knapdale; Bernera; Dunkeld and Dowally; Caputh; Duntocher; Ardeonaig; Logiealmond; Blairgowrie; Stirling; Kinross; Airth; Wick; Kirtle; Aberdalgie; Lochee; Kilmuir Wester and Suddy; Lochgilphead; Half Morton; Campsie; Plockton; Glassary; Glendovan; Milton of Balgowie; Greenlaw. Tobermory; Cargill; Monimail; Glenorchy and Inisheil; Melrose; Olrig, Pittenweem; and Stornoway.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — I wish to make one observation respecting the description given of these petitions by the Noble Lord. I rather think, that though all these 200 petitions are favourable to non-intrusion, still there is no doubt that in other respects, their prayer varies. Some are, I am sure, for the abolition of patronage; others for the full establishment of the veto law; and many, no doubt, pray that ministers should not be obtruded on parishes contrary to the wishes of the congregation, when just objections are taken.

Petitions read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

LORD FITZGERALD AND VESCI. — My Lords, recollecting that a petition was last year presented from Galway, calling for certain alterations in the Irish Municipal Corporations Bill, and that another petition, of a contrary description, was then presented by a Noble Marquess, as speaking the sentiments of the inhabitants of that town (which the Noble Marquess afterwards fully admitted not to be the case),— I take this opportunity, as some space of time will intervene before the second reading of the Bill now before your Lordships (which stands for the 30th inst.),— to present a petition with which I have been intrusted by the inhabitants of Galway; in order that if any Noble Lord have a petition to present of a contradictory character, time shall not be wanting to ascertain the real facts before the measure proceeds further. Therefore it was that I gave notice of my intention to present the petition this evening. Whatever my own opinion on particular parts of the present Bill may be, and however I may regret that Government has not adopted the course which I recommended last year,— namely, the abolition of exclusive corporations in Ireland,— still, after the discussions which have taken place in this and the other House, and after the alterations that have been made in the measure, and admitting its very great importance, I do not feel myself justified in resisting the progress of the Bill now introduced. My principles remain unchanged; but I am not ashamed to be guided in cases of such importance by the opinions of others, rather than doggedly to persevere in a particular course. The inhabitants of Galway complained, last year, that they had not had an opportunity of being heard in support of their petition before the House of Commons; and this year they have instructed their two Members in that House to move for the exemption of the town of Galway from Schedule A. It is true, that the Bill now before your Lordships' House differs in some respects from the Bill which was presented to you last year. By that Bill, it was proposed to transfer all the fiscal powers of the grand jury to the town council. Such a provision is not to be found in the present Bill; and I rejoice at it, as I should not like to see the disposal and control of 30,000*l*. a-year, the amount of grand jury cess, transferred from the gentlemen of property to a popularly elected town council. However, although this difference exists, the prayer is the same: the inhabitants pray to be allowed to choose whether or not they are to have a corporation. I do not agree in political sentiments with the two Honourable Gentlemen who have moved and seconded that proposition; and I state this, lest it might be supposed that, on the present occasion, I am only speaking the sentiments of those in whose opinions I usually coincide. The two gentlemen to whom I have alluded are neither opposed to general principles of municipal reform, nor are they opposed to Her Majesty's Ministers; on the contrary, they are amongst the most constant and steady supporters of Government; yet these gentlemen advocate the change in the Bill for which the petitioners pray, thus proving that the proposition is not a party one. The petitioners state that by the 5th and 6th of William IV. the management of the income of the town of Galway was placed in the hands of commissioners, popularly elected. They state, that they have already, under that Act, obtained a searching municipal reform, which gives to the people the election of those who are intrusted with the funds derivable from tolls. The mode of administering the town funds, the execution of public works, and the auditing of accounts, are all placed on an improved footing. Under the same Act, a bench of magistrates, popularly elected, are associated with those who are appointed by the corporation. They call on your Lordships, as these great objects have been already effected, not to inflict an expensive system on the town, by which the burgesses would have to pay a new set of officers; and they pray, therefore, that Galway may be exempted from the first schedule of the Bill; not, however, precluding the inhabitants, if the experiment be found to succeed, from hereafter calling for a corporation, if they think proper. I have only further to add, that on this subject a most satisfactory, as well as a most unanimous, feeling prevails in Galway. All political feelings are set aside, and, what is most unusual in a provincial town, men differing on questions of local policy are agreed upon this point. The first signature to the petition is that of the Roman Catholic bishop of Galway, and at the head of the second column appears the name of the Protestant warden, who is at the head of the church establishment in Galway. The petition is from the landowners, merchants, and others of the town of Galway, praying that the said town may be transferred from Schedule A to Schedule B, and that other arrangements may be made for the better regulation of church patronage, parliamentary franchise, and the apppointment of sheriffs.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.—My Lords, I am most willing to bear testimony to the high respectability of the petitioners; and I am sure they have every reason to be satisfied with the manner in which their case has been stated by the Noble Lord. I, however, have a petition, also most respectably signed, not exactly in opposition to, but certainly not in accordance with, that which the Noble Lord has presented. These latter petitioners pray for an alteration in certain clauses of the Bill; and, if these are conceded, they are willing that Galway should remain in Schedule A.

LORD FITZGERALD AND VESCI.—That your Lordships may be fully aware of the respectability of the petitioners, I beg to state that the chairman of the meeting at which the petition was prepared, is one of the most respectable men in the town. I have a letter from him, in which he states, with reference to the petition mentioned by the Noble Marquess, that it was agreed to at a meeting hastily called together, and of which the parties principally interested had no sufficient notice. But, that after that meeting, when the matter became generally known, another meeting was called, which was most respectably attended, and at which it was resolved to petition Parliament that the town should be placed in Schedule B. That petition has been since signed by all the representatives of property in the town, and is that which I have had the honour to present this evening. The petition is signed by 130 out of 154 rate-payers, — the whole number in the town, — paying nineteen twentieths of the entire rate. The Members for the town have deemed this petition so completely to represent the opinion of the inhabitants, that they have made a motion, in another place, grounded on it. I think, my Lords, that this short statement must settle the comparative value of the two petitions.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.—I have no doubt of the correctness of the Noble Lord's statement. I merely observed that I had received such a petition, and that I kept it back for inquiry. I have also no doubt that the Noble Lord's speech will produce three or four petitions, which your Lordships will have time to consider before you come to your final decision.

The EARL of GLENGALL. — My Lords, I have to present to your Lordships a petition of a similar nature. It is the petition of the mayor, corporation, merchants, and other inhabitants of the town of Clonmel, against the Bill, and praying that the said town may be excluded from the list of towns to which the provisions of the Bill are intended to apply. It is signed by the great majority of the proprietors of the town, — a town which, in importance and wealth, is second to none of the same extent in the kingdom. The rates of the town amount to 750l. a-year, of which the petitioners pay three fourths. The petitioners are in no way anxious that the present system should be continued; but they are sensibly alarmed at the idea that, under the new Bill, the salaries of municipal officers alone will absorb the whole property of the corporation, which is only 600l. a-year. They fear every kind of corruption under the proposed measure, and trust that your Lordships will not permit the town of Clonmel to be included in Schedule A.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — My Lords, I have given notice of my intention to present to your Lordships a petition, which is certainly of a very different nature from that which has just been presented. I cannot help saying, that I have heard with regret what has fallen from my Noble Friend behind me, because I cannot but feel, in my conscience, that the Municipal Corporations Reform Bill for Ireland, looking at it in all its bearings, is a most objectionable measure. I shall not, however, present the petition this night; but I will give notice, that on Thursday, the 26th instant, I shall do so. But I may be permitted to state that it comes from the city and county of Londonderry, and prays that no further innovations may be made which will endanger the Protestant Established Church of Ireland, or fundamentally alter the municipal corporations of that country. On the day when I shall present the petition, I will endeavour to discover, by questions which I shall put to the Noble Viscount at the head of Her Majesty's Government, whether it is the intention of that Government to adhere to the declarations made in May last, after the desertions from the Cabinet which have since taken place, and the appointment of persons inimical to the Protestant constitution since that time. I give notice that I shall present the petition on Thursday, the 26th instant, for which day I move that the Lords be summoned.

Agreed to.

On the motion of the MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY, a Bill "for better defining the Powers of Justices within the Limits of the Metropolitan Police District," read a first time; to be printed, and to be read a second time on Monday next.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE BILL.

On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, — second reading (which stands appointed for to-morrow) put off to Friday, the 27th instant, and the Lords summoned.

BRITISH LEGION (SPAIN).

SIR DE LACY EVANS. — I have to present a petition, signed by 200 of the officers belonging to the late British Auxiliary Legion serving in Spain, setting forth their claims on the Spanish Government for arrears of pay due to them; and stating that, having entered the Spanish service under the direct sanction of the British Government, the latter are bound either to enforce the settlement of their claims on Spain, or to take the liquidation of them on itself. They pray that the House will afford them such redress as, in its wisdom, it may think meet. I will not trouble the House with entering into a detail of the statements in the petition; but, if the House will allow me, I wish to make two or three observations.

[Cries of "Order, order!" "Chair, chair!"]

I throw myself on the indulgence of the House. The statements I desire to make have reference to my own conduct, as connected with the legion.

[Cries of "Go on, go on!"]

I wish to correct an erroneous impression that has gone abroad, that I had entered into a contract with the Spanish Government for the pay and subsistence of the petitioners, and the men of the legion. That statement is entirely unfounded. Neither I nor any other person entered into any contract with the Spanish Government, but merely agreed to certain conditions. I entered that service, as any other soldier would have done, acting entirely upon my own judgment; yet, having had the command of the force, and being the only member of that force in the House, I feel that I am placed in a peculiar position, and I therefore wish to make some observations with regard to the time I have chosen for presenting this petition.

[Cries of "Order, order!" "Chair, chair!"]

The SPEAKER. — By the rule of the House, the Honourable Member must confine himself to the statements of the petition. I am sure, however, that if the Honourable and Gallant Member desires only to explain as to any misapprehension relating personally to himself, the House will grant its indulgence; but the Honourable and Gallant Member should not go beyond that.

SIR DE LACY EVANS. — The observations I was about to make, Sir, were strictly personal to myself. I wish to state that I have selected the present time for presenting this petition, because, although I felt the greatest anxiety that the petitioners should obtain what they are entitled to, yet, so long as the fate of the constitutional cause of Spain remained in doubt, and while the question of the amount remained under examination, I did not think it right to do anything which might interfere with the great object for which the legion was originally formed. The constitutional cause is now safe, and the amount of pay due is admitted by the Spanish Government to be 280,000*l.*, which is very nearly the amount originally claimed. I wish, also, to observe, with respect to the commissariat officers, ——

[Renewed cries of "Order, order!" and, "Chair!"]

I will not trespass further on the indulgence of the House, but will give notice that I shall call the attention of the House to the subject after Easter.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS COMMITTEE.

Report brought up, and read. — To lie on the table, and to be printed.

DIVORCE BILLS.

On the motion of SIR GEORGE GREY. Standing Order (30th June, 1801,) relative thereto read, and repealed.

Resolved, That, before any Bill of divorce for adultery do pass this House, evidence be given before the Committee to whom the said Bill shall be committed that an action for damages has been brought in one of Her Majesty's courts of record at Westminster, or in any one of Her Majesty's courts of record in Dublin, or in one of Her Majesty's supreme courts of judicature of the presidencies of Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, or the island of Ceylon, respectively, against the persons supposed to have been guilty of adultery, and judgment for the plaintiff had thereupon; or sufficient cause be shown to the said Committee why such action was not brought, or such judgment was not obtained.

Resolution to be a Standing Order of this House.

Resolved, That, in all cases in which the petitioner for the Bill has attended the House of Lords upon the second reading of the Bill, he be required to attend also, to answer any questions the Select Committee may think fit that he should answer.

Mr. HUME. — I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without repeating the opinion I have before expressed, that this House is not the proper tribunal for deciding upon divorce cases. The examinations which occasionally take place at the bar of the House, on cases of this nature, do us but little credit. I will not offer any opinion as to what sort of tribunal such cases should be referred to, but I certainly think some other tribunal should be established.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH—NON-RESIDENCE.

Mr. HUME. — I beg to give notice that, on Tuesday next, I shall move for "Returns of the number of incumbents, curates, &c. in the Established Church, distinguishing residents from those non-resident; those appointed by the Crown from those appointed by the Lord Chancellor and others."

WAR WITH CHINA.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — I will avail myself of the present opportunity to give notice that, on the 2d of April, I intend to submit to the House a motion respecting he papers which have been laid on the able upon the subject of the disputes beween this country and China. Of the precise terms of that motion I shall give due intimation.

NAVAL AND MILITARY COMMISSION.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN. — On Tuesday last, in replying to a question from he Honourable and Gallant Member for Sussex, I stated that the delay in placing he Report of the Naval and Military Commission before the House had arisen rom the lamented illness of the Duke of Wellington. I have since ascertained hat that statement was not correct; for find that every paper sent to the Duke of Wellington was returned by him, corected, within the space of twenty-four hours.

[Cries of " Hear, hear, hear!"]

The delay has arisen from the numerous nd laborious duties which have devolved upon the secretary in preparing the documents for the press. I have seen that genleman this day; and he informs me that he papers will be ready within a fortnight.

POST OFFICE.

SIR R. PEEL. — I wish to refresh the memory of the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in regard o some papers relating to the Post Office Department, for which I moved some days go. Perhaps the Right Honourable Genleman can say when they will be laid on he table?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — On this point, I must beg to refresh the memory of the Right Honourable Baronet. The papers to which the Right Honourable Baronet refers have been already presented.

SIR R. PEEL. — But have they been printed?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.— I believe not.

PATENTS—PRIVY COUNCIL.

SIR R. PEEL. — Some time ago, I moved for certain papers concerning the judicial decisions of the Privy Council respecting the renewal of patents. I am not aware whether there is any representative for that particular department in the House; but, perhaps, the Right Honourable the President of the Board of Trade will make some inquiry on the subject.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — There is no connection between the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the department with which I am connected. I will, however, make inquiry upon the subject.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — It is my duty, officially, to attend before the Privy Council when the renewal of a patent is sought for. I am quite sure there can be no objection to furnish the papers which the Right Honourable Baronet requires; and I will do all in my power to procure their production at the earliest possible period.

CHINA.

SIR J. GRAHAM.—Seeing the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in his place, I wish to ask him one or two questions upon the subject of the present state of our relations with China. The first is, with respect to the opium question. It appears, from the papers on the table of the House, that a certain quantity of opium was obtained from the British merchants at Canton, and delivered up by the superintendent, under certificate. There is reason to believe that a further quantity of opium was obtained by the superintendent, not under certificate, in order to make up a specific quantity; and that a surrender was made by him of the whole to the Chinese authorities. It is understood that, as the quantity of opium that was surrendered to the superintendent did not amount to the quantity that had been specified to the Chinese authorities, a further quantity had to be purchased by him to make it up. This fact, though publicly stated, and uncontradicted, does not appear upon the face of the documents that have been furnished to Parliament. Now, I wish to know from the Noble Lord, whether the superintendent did effect such a purchase; and whether it is true that that purchase was made, not under certificate, but by bill? The next question I wish to ask relates to the supposed destruction of the opium surrendered to the Chinese authorities. From these papers, it does not appear that the destruction of the opium actually took place; the only mention made of it seems to show that it was transmitted to Pekin, to be there made a matter of profit by the Chinese Government. Now, what I wish to know from the Noble Lord is, whether he has any other information upon the subject, showing that the opium so surrendered to the Chinese Government was really destroyed, or sent to Pekin; and, if so, whether there will be any objection to produce it?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.—With respect to the first question which the Right Honourable Baronet has put to me, I believe that what happened was this:—the parties in Canton having been called upon to deliver up the opium in their own or their agents' hands, each house made out a statement of the quantity they had in China; and the aggregate amount was given in to the Chinese commissioner, as the quantity that would be delivered up. One of the ships, however, that had opium on board, and which opium was included in the aggregate amount that had been delivered in to the Chinese commissioner, disobeyed the orders of the superintendent, and sailed away: the consequence was, that there was a deficiency to the amount that ship contained. Under these circumstances, I believe Captain Elliot did purchase a quantity of opium, which arrived subsequently, in order to replace that deficiency. I am not aware that there are any papers in the office relating to this transaction; but, if there are, of course they will be produced. My information upon this point is derived, not from official sources. With regard to the destruction of the opium, no other account has been received by me than that which is contained in the papers which have been presented. I have seen, in the newspapers, the accounts to which the Right Honourable Baronet refers; but I know nothing further, officially, than what is contained in the papers I have laid on the table of the House.

SIR J. GRAHAM.—May I understand that the papers relating to the purchase of the opium will be produced?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.—Whatever papers are in the office having reference to that subject shall be laid before Parliament.

SIR J. GRAHAM.—I find, in the official instructions to the superintendent, that reference is made to the Order in Council of the 1st of December, 1833, for regulating the trade with Canton. That order is not included in the papers on the table. I wish to know whether there is any objection to the production of that order; and I wish, also, to ask the Noble Lord, whether any other Order in Council has been passed, under the Act for regulating the trade with China? Another question I wish to ask the Noble Lord is, whether or not Her Majesty's Government have received, and, if so, will they produce, any remonstrance that may have been made by certain American merchants, at Canton, against the blockade instituted by Captain Elliot?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.—In reply to the Right Honourable Baronet's first question, I have to observe, that the papers, relating to this subject, have been produced, in obedience to an order of this House; but, in that order, the Order in Council to which the Right Honourable Baronet has alluded was not mentioned. I believe, however, there will be no objection to its production. As regards the second question which the Right Honourable Baronet has put to me, I can only reply, that I have not yet received any Report of the remonstrance said to have been delivered in by the American merchants at Canton.

Mr. J. A. SMITH.—As the warlike preparations going on in the ports of India are now a matter of public notoriety, and as great anxiety exists on the subject, I wish to ask the Noble Lord whether he has any objection to state the object of the expedition?

LORD J. RUSSELL.—In answer to the Honourable Gentleman's question, I beg to refer him to the answer I gave, on a former occasion, to a question that was put to me by a Noble Lord on the other side of the House. I was then asked, in reference to certain statements that had appeared in the newspapers, whether a declaration of war had been made by the Governor General of India against China; and my reply was, that the Government had received no official information on the subject, and could not believe that report to be well founded; but that it probably arose from the order which had been sent out by the Government to make certain preparations. What I then stated has turned out to be the fact, as has been proved by the recent arrival of official despatches. The orders sent out were to make certain naval and military preparations. The Honourable Gentleman now asks me what is the object of those preparations. I can state them only very generally. In the first place, they are to obtain reparation for the insults and injuries that have been offered to her Majesty's superintendent, and her Majesty's subjects, by the Chinese Government; and, in the second place, they are to obtain, for the merchants trading with China, an indemnification for the loss of their property that was incurred by threats of violence offered by persons under the direction of the Chinese Government; and, in the last place, they are to obtain security in future for the persons and property of British subjects trading with China.

HILL COOLIES.

Mr. MACKINNON. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to permit the continued importation of Hill Coolies into the Mauritius, and whether that permission is to be extended to all the West Indian possessions of England? Also, whether there is any objection to the production of the despatches that have been addressed to the Governors of our West Indian colonies on the subject?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Some propositions have been made to Her Majesty's Government upon the subject of the introduction of the Hill Coolies into certain of the British colonies, which, as yet, have not been acceded to. The Noble Lord the Member for Lancashire asked me, the other night, whether I had any objection to lay on the table the despatches and instructions which had been sent out to the Governor of British Guiana, in relato this subject. I beg, now, to state that those instructions are now ready, and will be produced, on a motion to that effect being made.

Mr. MACKINNON. — Then, I beg to give notice of my intention to make such a motion.

BRITISH CLAIMS ON PORTUGAL.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I rise to inquire of the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether he has received any intelligence from Portugal which affords a prospect of a speedy settlement of the claims of British subjects upon the Government of that country?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I beg to state, in reply to my Noble Friend's question, that a gentleman, whom I proposed to fill up the vacancy in the mixed commission, by which these claims are to be decided, has declined the office, and no one else has, as yet, been appointed in his stead.

LORD SANDON. — When does the Noble Viscount intend to make an efficient appointment?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I beg to assure the Noble Lord that the appointment to which I allude was made bonâ fide.

LORD SANDON. — Can the Noble Lord name a time when we may expect the appointment to be made?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I assure the Noble Lord that I am perfectly in earnest in what I say. It is impossible that I can name a time.

THE CASE OF JOSEPH AND JOHN WORKMAN.

Mr. GORING. — I wish to ask the Honourable Member for Finsbury whether it is his intention to call the attention of the House, in the course of this evening, to the petition of William, Joseph, and John Workman, in pursuance of the notice which he has given on the subject?

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — I intend to postpone my motion on that subject; I may, however, take this opportunity of asking, when it is intended to lay upon the table of the House the papers recently ordered, on the motion of the Honourable Member for Essex?

Mr. F. MAULE. — There will be no objection, eventually, to lay the whole of those papers upon the table of the House, nor any objection to the production, at present, of a portion of them; but, I must say, I do not think it expedient that the whole should be produced until the opinion of the judge who has tried the case shall be known. I think it would be a most inconvenient precedent to consent to the production of documents of this description, so long as the merits of the question are under the consideration of the judges; but I have no objection to the production of any communication on the subject that may have been received from the gaoler or the visiting justices.

Mr. GOULBURN. — It appears that the Honourable Member for Finsbury does not intend to bring forward his motion respecting the petition of William, Joseph, and John Workman, presented on the 13th March last, although that petition was ordered to be printed with the Votes of the House. The petition contains serious charges against magistrates and other parties in Sussex; and I think this ought to prove to Honourable Members how cautious they should be in ordering petitions to be printed, which are not intended to be brought under the consideration of the House.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — There is no particular regulation as to the time when a motion must be brought forward. I think if any one has reason to complain, it is the unfortunate lunatic pauper who is now a prisoner in Chelmsford gaol.

Mr. GOULBURN. — The petition contains much of criminatory matter, reflecting upon the magistrates who passed the sentence.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — I believe there is an inquiry now going on into this subject.

STEAM NAVIGATION REGULATION.

SIR T. COCHRANE. — I wish to know from the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, whether he has abandoned the hope of being able to bring in a Bill, during the present Session, for the regulation of steam navigation?

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I certainly have not abandoned the hope of introducing such a Bill; but I find that there are a great many difficulties to be overcome. I trust, however, that I shall be enabled to bring in the Bill before the Easter holidays.

STADE DUTIES.

Mr. HUTT. — I beg, Sir, to present a petition from the merchants of Hull, complaining of the duties, fines, and charges levied by the Hanoverian authorities at Stade on British ships and cargoes passing up the Elbe to Hamburg.

Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HUTT. — Sir, the House will have observed, from the number of petitions laid on the table relating to the Stade duties, that the subject has excited a considerable share of the public attention. The feeling among large and influential classes in the country is so strong, and the expectation with which even this night's discussion is regarded, is so earnest, that I regret the matter has not been brought under the consideration of the House by some one better calculated, by personal qualities and habits, to do it ample justice. The responsible task, however, has devolved on me, as the representative of a large commercial constituency, deeply interested in the question, and I will endeavour to execute it to the best of my power. I only hope that, during the statement I have to make, I shall have the good fortune to secure from the House a degree of attention, on account of the importance of the subject, which, on my own account, I have no pretensions to expect. The subject of the Stade duties is assuredly of some importance. It closely affects the welfare of large numbers of people engaged in shipping and manufactures, and it calls in question, also, that moral influence and authority of our flag among foreign nations, without which neither our manufactures nor our commerce can long maintain their pre-eminence. I have to complain that the King of Hanover is in the habit of levying on British vessels and cargoes, proceeding up the river Elbe, certain tolls and duties to which he is in nowise entitled; and that he enforces the payment of his unjust demands by many circumstances of oppression; and that, too, in a manner highly derogatory to the British flag. I do not deny that the King of Hanover has a right to collect tolls at Stade; unhappily for the general interests of commerce, I am constrained to admit that he has such a right. But I contend that he is in the habit of pushing his demands to an extravagant and unwarrantable extent; and that the amount which he exacts is excessive; and that his mode of compelling payment is utterly incompatible with our commercial security and national honour. I am not going to make any personal attack upon the reigning King of Hanover. I do not admire that monarch; but his character and opinions are in no way mixed up with the Stade tolls, and it is not my intention to confound them. I will say more; I can easily believe that the present King of Hanover considers that, in levying those tolls, he is only exercising his unquestionable rights, inasmuch as he is only continuing a practice handed down to him by two of his immediate predecessors. The circumstances under which the Stade privilege became the property of the Kings of Hanover are remarkable, and singularly inconsistent with the abuse of which I have to speak. The tolls at Stade originally grew up under the permission, and, in some degree, under the sanction, of the early Emperors of Germany, to whom that town was subject. In the year 1648, Stade, together with the rest of the Bremen territory, was ceded to the King of Sweden, who exercised, as a customary right, the practice of levying these tolls on all vessels navigating the Elbe, those of Hamburg excepted; for Hamburg had been declared exempt from the tolls by the Emperor Barbarossa. Some disputes having arisen between Sweden and the city of Hamburg as to the tolls to be legally exacted, a convention was appointed by these two states in 1691, and a treaty executed for the final settlement of that question. In that treaty, the Hamburg privilege was recited, and the mode in which all other vessels were to pay the required dues was clearly laid down. In the following year, a scale of charges or tariff was drawn up, under the sanction of both parties, and was formally annexed to the treaty. The two documents were officially published, and styled "The Permanent Settlement of the Stade Tax." The tariff was framed on this general principle: most articles of commerce were rated at one sixteenth of their value, and charged on that basis. In certain cases, the maximum charge appointed was one sixteenth per cent. on the real value. In all others, the duty was to be paid according to either system, as the merchant himself might direct. The election was with the merchant, not with the collecting officer. Other provisions were added for the favour and protection of trade; and Sweden formally renounced all idea of alleviating or altering the tariff. In the year 1715, the duchy of Bremen, which includes the town of Stade, was ceded by the King of Denmark, who had wrested it from Sweden, to George I., as part of the electoral dominions, in consideration of the sum of 150,000*l.*, which the British Government undertook to pay for it. The British Minister justified the act by declaring that the sacrifice was necessary to secure the interests of our trade with Hamburg, which, even at that period, was of considerable importance. The Elector of Hanover, of course, took possession of his new territories, with all their existing rights and obligations, among which was the Stade tax. The transfer, could not, of itself, afford any pretext for altering the agreement of 1692, or for making that agreement binding upon one parly only,—namely, those who were to pay the toll. The Stade tolls, then, became the private perquisite of the Kings of England; and George II., in consideration of his obligations to the British people, first of all relaxed the mode of collection in 1736; and, in 1740, renounced them altogether, as appears from the following statement in Anderson's History of Commerce:—

> A. D. 1740. In this same year, His Majesty King George II., of Great Britain, and Sovereign of the town of Staden, in the duchy of Bremen, was graciously pleased to remit to all British and Irish ships the ancient toll payable at Staden by the ships of all nations in sailing up the river Elbe. For which bounty his said Majesty received an humble Address of thanks from the British company of merchant adventurers trading to Hamburg.

These taxes were resumed by George III. In the year 1804, Hanover was occupied by the French; and the Stade duties ceased till the year 1814, when they were compelled to retire. When the ancient Government of Hanover was re-established in 1814, it revived the Stade duties, with many aggravations; and this state of things proceeded till the assembling of the Congress of Vienna, in 1815. One of the first subjects which occupied the attention of that congress was the regulation of the river navigation of Germany. With a view to the settlement of this matter, — so important to every state of Germany, — the Minister at Vienna agreed to certain general principles to be applied to all the rivers of that country, and to form the basis of all further regulation by the Germanic states. The principles adopted by the congress were most just, liberal, and comprehensive, and they were developed in language the most decisive and unambiguous. The publication of these principles was received throughout Europe with sentiments of the utmost satisfaction. To reflecting men, in every part of Germany, they suggested the most pleasing expectations of extensive commercial intercourse. The day, in their apprehension, had at last arrived, when the noble rivers of their country, the arteries of her trade, and the instruments of her civilisation, should no longer be obstructed by every petty, sordid, and capricious authority; but should be declared, by the universal voice of Europe, the natural and organic right of all its states, and be irrevocably thrown open to the trading enterprise of the world. In regard to the Elbe, this brilliant dream, like most others, ended in disappointment. The congress having thus laid down the principles on which all measures for regulating the rivers should in future be framed, deputed to the states bordering on each river the part of settling the details of all matters relating to its navigation. Commissioners appointed to re-organise the regulations of the Elbe met at Dresden, in June, 1819. They consisted of the representatives of Austria, Prussia, Hanover, Saxony, of Denmark for Lunenburg and Holstein, of Mecklenburg, Anhold, and the city of Hamburg. Now, as no paper relating to this convention of Dresden has ever been formally communicated to this country, I have no power of quoting any recognised official account of its proceedings; but as a report of them has lately been published, by a lawyer of great talents and high reputation on the Continent, who has had access to the original minutes preserved at Dresden, perhaps I may refer to that publication as an authority. The convention assembled on the 3d of June, 1819, and in the outset everything seemed to accord with the liberal view of the court. On the 19th of June, the Hanoverian minister astonished the meeting by objecting to any interference with the Stade tolls, asserting that the Stade tax did not come within the sphere of their duties, it being, not a river, but a sea tax, and levied only on ultramarine vessels and produce. The president of the assembly stated, in reply, that their duty, as expressed in their commission, was to inquire into everything relating to the navigation of the river; and therefore, that the Stade tax fell obviously within the province of their duty. The quibble, however, of the Stade tax being a sea tax was renewed by the Hanoverian commissioner whenever reference was made to that subject; and though he at last gave it up, and promised to submit his tariff to the inspection of the commissioners, nearly three years passed away without that pledge being redeemed. Both Denmark and Hamburg were dissatisfied at this, and strongly protested against the withholding of this important document. But the commissioners, being at last wearied out with the repeated evasions of Hanover, and the fruitless discussions to which they gave rise, came to this formal resolution, which was afterwards incorporated in their proceedings, as the fifteenth article of the convention of Dresden.

With respect to Denmark and Hamburg, the question of the Stade duties was left untouched by the Convention of Dresden. As related to the other states appointed by the congress to settle everything relative to the navigation of the Elbe, the Stade duties were to remain unconsidered, on condition that the general principles laid down by the congress should be respected in the tariff; — that a copy of it should be laid before the commission, and that Hanover should introduce no alteration in it without the concurrence of the other states interested therein. The Hanoverian minister, when all the labours of the convention had terminated, and when the commissioners assembled for the last time to exchange the ratifications of the several courts, produced his tariff, which, of course, passed without discussion or revision. Thus, although the convention successfully resisted the claim of the King of Hanover to consider the Stade duties as sea taxes, the real object which His Majesty had in view — that of preventing any interference with his system of collecting taxes at Stade — was completely attained. And thus, notwithstanding all that was arranged and enacted at Vienna, the system of collection was left untouched by the convention, both in principle and in detail. I have already stated to the House the nature of the tariff established by the Swedish treaty. Merchants were ordered to pay, as a maximum, what amounted to —— per bale, or, if they preferred the ad valorem tax, they were to produce their invoices, to show what the value of their goods really was, and on that value they paid one sixteenth per cent. This, with a small toll on the ship, constituted the whole of the Stade duties. Many provisions were made, in the tariff, for the safeguard of commerce, and the Crown of Sweden specially abjured all design of altering or augmenting the charges thereafter. Such, then, was the Stade tariff up to the year 1715, when it fell into the hands of the Elector of Hanover. What is it now? By singular good fortune, I am enabled to answer that question, on authority; for, last year, the Crown of Hanover condescended, for the first time, to apprise our Government of the nature of the tariff by which it levies taxes on our commerce. Up to the year 1839, the Stade tariff was an unacknowledged, if not a secret, document. The Noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department made repeated applications to the Court of Hanover, to ascertain the scale of charges which it was applying to our ships and cargoes in the Elbe; and the answer of the Court of Hanover was practically this:—"Ah! you don't know, and we won't tell you." However, last year, it was formally produced, and placed in the hands of Mr. Bligh, the representative of the Foreign Office at the Court of Hanover. It is the tariff brought forward at the Convention of Dresden; and if it can be said to bear any resemblance to the only legal tariff,—that of 1692,—it is the resemblance of a hideous caricature. In the first place, it is more than ten times as long;—again, all the stipulations favourable to commerce, in the legal tariff, are struck out; in the third place, in regard to the rates laid down, such a latitude of construction is assigned to the collecting officer, that the whole character of the tariff, as a table of fixed charges, is effectually and entirely nullified. In short, the tariff which Hanover admits to Mr. Bligh to be in practical use, bears no sort of resemblance to that which was handed over, on the cession of the duchy of Bremen to George II. It can derive no pretence to legality from the treaty of 1692. It is a heap of miscellaneous exactions, with no force or validity but what has been gathered from usurpation. This is not my opinion merely. I do not give this as the mere opinion of the petitioners; they, unhappily, are too deeply interested in the question to pass for the most impartial judges of any portion of it. But I beg the House to listen to the language used by the Crown of Denmark in 1824, when invited to a conference on the subject by Hanover:—

> With regard to the tariff, we have carefully considered that which was produced at Dresden. It is impossible that we should be satisfied with the pretensions of a state to levy such taxes on no other grounds than its own will and pleasure. We must consider, in the first place, by what right or authority the duty is levied at all; and, as this is not stated, to inquire into its history. A tax without a fixed scale of amount would be perfectly monstrous, and nothing less than a revival of the club law of our ancestors in the dark ages. There is no document in which a rule of taxation can be found, except in the tariffs drawn up by mutual agreement between Hamburg and the Crown of Sweden, dated the 15th of August, 1692, which is to be found in the Bremen and Verden Corpus Constitutionum. The Danish commissioner goes on to remark, that, looking at the tariff put forward by the King of Hanover, it seemed as if His Majesty had renounced all notions of being confined by any fixed standard of dues; and that, in such a proceeding, Denmark would never concur. The tariff of 1821 was, therefore, objected to by Denmark:—first, because the principle on which it turns is erroneous, as it brings into application all varieties of measures, values, numbers, casks, and cases, without any attempt at a definite regulation of duties. Secondly, because it proceeds on an arbitrary departure from the old lawful standard, established in 1692, and is, therefore, without any foundation in right. Denmark requires an adaptation of the proposed duties to the Vienna regulations, or, where the novelty of wares, forms of package, &c. renders them inapplicable, a return to the old system of "quantities," as the mode of valuation. Thirdly, because the new scale having, as has been just shown, no legal foundation, it cannot afford any security against further infringement in future.

Thus far the statement of the Danish commissioners. That of the Hamburg commissioners was, in many respects, similar; but it contained the additional remark, that the maximum of Stade taxation, as established by contract, was one sixteenth per cent., whilst most of the charges were below this rate; but, according to the new tariff, one sixteenth had become the minimum, and the more important articles of commerce were subject to a charge of one half, two and a half, and even five per cent.; and that this, together with the complexity and confusion introduced into the mode of election, would place the whole trade of the Elbe at the mercy of the customs officers of Hanover.

It was the fashion in this country, some years ago, to jest a good deal at the ingenuity with which the Government made every object, in whole circles of material nature, the subject of taxation. It was said that all the things on the earth, and in the waters under the earth, were the subjects of fiscal assessment. Against any ingenuity of this sort which the most acute Chancellor of the Exchequer ever displayed, I will place that now arrayed by the Hanoverian authorities against British commerce in the Elbe. I will just recite the different classes of taxes which a vessel bound to Hamburg is required to pay to the King of Hanover, on passing the town of Stade. They consist of eight kinds. Taxes on the ship; which, on a ship of 250 tons, are about 215*l*. Taxes on the cargo; every article being charged in detail. These taxes frequently amount to 5 per cent. on the value of the commodities. Commission of 6¼ per cent. on the above paid to collecting officers; ship's expenses; commission thereon to the collecting officers; eventualiter interim certificate; certificate of return; tax on passing Stade outward bound. From these various imposts, the King of Hanover obtains, for his private revenue, 70,000*l.* or 80,000*l.* per annum; and, large as the amount is, it is absolutely nothing in comparison with the cost and trouble thrown upon merchants and shipowners by the penalties which menace them, should they offend in any manner against the mandates of the Hanoverian custom-house, or against the caprice of the officers placed in charge of it. On the slightest inaccuracy in a ship's papers, — and her papers and cargo are scrutinised with the most vigilant search after inaccuracies, — both ship and cargo are seized and confiscated; — a penalty sometimes commuted for heavy fines and ruinous expenses. I will mention one or two cases of this species of oppression; for, without some such illustrations, the House will scarcely believe that the grievance exists to such an enormous extent: —

> Some time ago, Messrs. Gee, Loft, and Co., of Hull, merchants of great wealth and of the highest integrity, shipped for Hamburg, by the Fairy, Captain Gell, a vessel which was loaded by them with a general cargo, "three bales of cottons, or merchandise." In the bill of lading, the articles were inadvertently entered "bales of cotton twist;" the difference of the Stade duty was about 7*s.* only. All the ship's other papers described the goods with technical correctness, and in no other respect was there any informality. For this error alone, in the bills of lading, the Fairy was seized by order of the Hanoverian custom house, to be released only on Messrs. Gee, Loft, and Co. paying to the King of Hanover the sum of 215*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* This enormous fine was paid, and all applications for reconsideration were unavailing; — not a farthing was ever restored. All suspicion of fraudulent intention must, in this case, be out of the question; the undoubted honour and integrity of the parties, on the one hand, and the miserable benefit attainable by an act of smuggling (7*s.*) on the other, alike preclude the possibility of such a construction of the irregularity. It was, in truth, one of those trifling inaccuracies in the ship's papers which may be detected in the clearance of most of the ships that enter our ports with a general cargo; yet it was punished like an act of outrage and criminality, with a fine of 215*l.* and expenses in the law courts of Hanover. The second illustration is of very recent occurrence. It is a case in which the Stade authorities seem to have been actuated by the mere gratification of wanton power, such as suggested to a whimsical tyrant of other days the amusement of appointing his horse to the consulate. In the course of last year, as the Severn steam-ship, Captain Knocker (which plies between Hamburg and Hull), was proceeding on her homeward voyage, she stopped, as usual, off the guard-ship at Stade, to render the certificate of return. A gun was fired at the Severn by the guard-ship, and a boat sent alongside. It then appeared that the officers of the guard-ship had been pleased to determine that, on her last voyage, the steam-vessel did not stop soon enough. They demanded, in consequence, as a fine for the offence, the sum of eight marks, and prepared to detain the packet, because the captain, knowing there was no foundation for such complaint, hesitated to comply with so arbitrary an exaction. The captain, to avoid the detention of his ship, paid the money, but did so under protest, and made application to Mr. Canning, the British Consul General at Hamburg, for its restoration. For this act of contumacy towards the authorities of Stade, the Severn was condemned to an additional fine of fifty dollars on her return to Hamburg. As, in the former case, remonstrance was fruitless, there was no redress. The fine was paid.

Is it astonishing that Englishmen complain? Is it very wonderful that, fleeced and insulted as they are by a petty German prince, they should besiege the Foreign Office and the Board of Trade with petitions and remonstrances? But all redress is still denied them; and I have not been able to learn of a single case, however aggravated, in which satisfaction has been obtained for the British merchant. I do not complain particularly of the Noble Lord, nor of the present Government, nor of the past Government, nor of any Government in particular, — I complain of every successive Government which, during the last five-and-twenty years, has swayed the destinies of England; for one and all have exhibited, in regard to the British interests involved in the Stade question, a most reprehensible dereliction of their first duties. So long as the King of Hanover was also King of England, I suppose that the Stade duties, being the private property of the monarch, were a delicate and difficult subject to deal with. But that difficulty exists no longer. That excuse — a bad one at the best — cannot justify our doing nothing now. Is the evil not to be stayed here? What answer does the House mean to give to the petitioners, whose complaints, expressed in respectful but vehement language, now lie upon the table? They assert that the King of Hanover is levying unjust demands on their property, and enforcing payment with every circumstance of injury and insult. The Noble Lord is bound either to justify the conduct of the king, — to prove that he has a right to act in the way I have described, — or else to put a period to such proceedings at once and for ever. Has the King of Hanover law and justice on his side, in burdening our commerce and oppressing our mariners? I trust that the House will declare to the King of Hanover that he shall not do these things with impunity. I protest that I cannot approach the subject with temper; it rouses my indignation to think that any prince or authority should be allowed to plunder and oppress the maritime navy of England, and that our merchants should not only be denied all redress for past injuries, but denied even a guarantee for better treatment in future. Can it be asserted that the King of Hanover has a right to act in this manner? I contend that he possesses no inherent right to levy these taxes on the Elbe. His right, if he has any, must rest upon some clear and intelligible proof. All general assumption is against such a right; and the title to it, like all other titles, ought to be established by the party claiming, upon competent and unquestionable evidence. I presume that the circumstance of its having been enforced since the peace of 1814 will not establish its title, since, against the enforcement of it, various European states have constantly, and vehemently, and formally protested. What pretence, then, is set up?—The Congress of Vienna. But what said the general act of the Congress of Vienna?

> The navigation of the German rivers, along their whole course, shall be free. The duties collected shall be as nearly as possible the same along the whole course of the river. They shall be regulated in a uniform and fixed manner, with as little reference as possible to the different qualities of merchandise. The duties shall in no way exceed those now paid. They shall never be increased without the consent of the co-riverans states. The tariff shall be so framed as to encourage navigation. There shall be no port or forced harbour dues; even those now existing shall not be permitted, unless all the states deem them necessary for general commerce. Regulations shall be established to prevent customs officers throwing impediments in the way of navigation.

Now, in regard to every British ship that passes Stade, the King of Hanover has broken one or other of these regulations. The King of Hanover can draw very little help from the articles of the Congress of Vienna; and the Convention of Dresden cannot be brought forward in support of his proceedings. I remember that the Noble Lord contended, last year, that the 15th article of the Convention of Dresden bore a construction favourable to the practices now going on at Stade. But, surely, the plain meaning of that paragraph is, that the convention consents to abandon all further discussion respecting the Stade tax, provided that the Hanoverian minister should bring forward the tariff, and bind himself that it should not be varied without the concurrence of the states interested therein, — always supposing that this tariff was not repugnant to the general principle expressed by the congress act respecting navigation. To contend, from the words of this article, that the commissioners engaged to sanction the tariff, whether it was or was not in harmony with the navigation law laid down at Vienna, is to contend that they agreed to assume new functions altogether; for they were appointed to carry those principles into effect; and they really had no power committed to them to authorise any regulations which were prejudicial to those principles. But I have shown that the system pursued by Hanover, at Stade, is in utter defiance of them all. If, then, the sanction of some of the commissioners (for those representing Denmark and Hamburg protested against the proceeding altogether), — if some of the commissioners gave a conditional assent to the tariff, and if their conditions were not observed by Hanover, the assent fell to the ground. The tariff, therefore, derived no sanction or authority from the Convention of Dresden. If, then, neither this convention, nor the Congress of Vienna, nor the treaty between Sweden and Hamburg, affords any justification of these proceedings, I must infer, having carefully examined every source from which such license can be derived, that the taxes levied at Stade have no foundation whatever in right or justice, and that they differ in no assignable respect from the depredations of an Algerine pirate. The system in operation at Stade is a system of robbery and of outrage. If I believed that there existed any ancient custom, treaty, or engagement, which could shelter the King of Hanover in a course so ruinous to our interests, so degrading to our honour and dignity, — against him, as the lawful collector, I would not use any harshness of expression, nor attempt to excite any feeling of jealousy on the subject. I should lament over a necessity which places the King of Hanover in a situation by right, where, by exacting money for which he renders back no equivalent, he contradicts all our natural ideas of justice and propriety; I should deplore his power to obstruct the passage of our manufactures to the most valuable market on the Continent, where they are already so much let and hindered by the rising manufactures of rival nations, as well as by the prohibitions of the Berlin Confederacy; I should bewail the destiny by which that flag which has "braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze" has been compelled to yield supremacy to the might of prescription, or the allurements of diplomacy. But since this is not so, I feel that the case is one of very aggravated injury and wrong. I complain, in the name of thousands engaged in manufacturing industry, — in the name of thousands dependent on commerce and on shipping, — in the name of all to whom the honour and dignity of the country are dear, — not of the King of Hanover merely, but of those who, from their official stations, might have put down his aggressions if they would, and who have not done so. I have a very high respect for the Noble Lord; I admire his talents and his assiduity; I feel grateful to him for the fields which he has so successfully laid open to the operations of British industry. No former Minister, as far as I know, ever paid so much attention to the general interests of our commerce; but the Noble Lord must excuse me for saying that, in regard to the Stade exactions, he appears neither to have kept faith with his country, nor with his own well-deserved reputation. The parties of whose cause I am the feeble advocate are weary of these fruitless applications for redress to official boards and Government offices. They have resolved, after many years of patience, to seek reparation and protection from other quarters; and, strong in the conviction of right, — strong in the belief of their country's sympathy, — to this House, as the parens patriæ, which has so often redressed the wrongs of the injured, they offer their last appeal. I now move, "That it is the opinion of this House, that the tolls now levied upon British ships and cargoes in the River Elbe, by the authority of the King of Hanover, under the name of Stade duties, are of doubtful legality, oppressive in amount, and highly vexatious in the mode of exaction; and that it is therefore incumbent upon Her Majesty's Government to take the steps necessary for procuring relief from imposts so injurious to the general interests of the country."

Mr. HAWES. — Sir, in seconding the motion of the Honourable Member for Hull, it is not my intention to enter into any details, after the luminous statement which has just been made. I am exceedingly glad that the subject has been brought forward, because it will have the effect of drawing the attention of the House to the state of the river navigation of Germany; and I must say, that the Treaty of Vienna, and the stipulations therein contained, are well deserving of the attention of the Noble Viscount. I know not where the blame may rest, but many complaints have been made of the non-fulfilment of the Treaty of Vienna, with reference to the river navigation. In the case of the Elbe, the Honourable Member for Hull has made out a distinct case, in which the King of Hanover exercises an arbitrary power, without any clear right; and the interference of the Noble Viscount is absolutely necessary. I believe that nothing would more effectually tend to carry out the Treaty of Vienna than an effectual protection of the navigation of the River Elbe. I have no doubt that the Noble Viscount has both the power and the will to redress this grievance; and that the expression of the opinion of the House will materially assist him in so doing. There never was a period when the foreign policy of the country occupied so large a share of the public attention; and the most vigilant attention is required to this subject. I can fully confirm the statements of the Honourable Member for Hull, and I quite agree with him as to the services of the Noble Viscount, in the protection of our interests abroad, which, at the present time, are peculiarly entitled to consideration.

Question put.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — Sir, undoubtedly the question brought forward by the Honourable Member for Hull is one of great interest and importance to the commerce of the country; and so far I agree with the Honourable Member in the view which he has taken of the subject. On the other hand, however, I am afraid that the question is not quite so simple in its elements as the Honourable Member appears to consider it. I apprehend that it is a question very complicated in its bearings, not only upon old treaties, and old transfers of territories, but upon the articles of the Congress of Vienna, and the proceedings of the conference of the plenipotentiaries, held afterwards at Dresden, which left it to the plenipotentiaries of states bordering upon the Elbe and its confluents to settle the details of the principle agreed upon. The subject has not been allowed to sleep since the last discussion took place; for we have earnestly pressed the Government of Hanover to come to an arrangement, which should place the question upon a rational and fair footing, consistent with what the commerce of the country demands. It was only last month that an answer to the representations made by our minister at Hanover was received by our Government. That answer is at present under the consideration of my Right Honourable Friend the President of the Board of Trade; and we are considering the steps necessary to be taken. Now, that being the state of the matter, — it being a subject of negotiation between the two Governments, — I think my Honourable Friend and the House will feel that it would, perhaps, be premature to come to the resolution proposed by my Honourable Friend; and therefore I would suggest to him, at all events for the present, to postpone calling on the House for the expression of a positive opinion, such as that contained in the resolution, and to allow Her Majesty's Government — of whose sincerity and good intentions he can entertain no doubt — to proceed in such a way as will enable us to see whether we cannot, by negotiation, place the matter on a footing satisfactory to the House, and to the commercial interests of the country Under these circumstances,—the matter being now under negotiation between the two Governments, — I think my Honourable Friend will feel that it cannot be expedient or advantageous for me to enter into a discussion of the various questions started with regard to the rights of Hanover either to levy tolls at all, or to levy the particular tolls of which complaint is made. At the same time, I am quite prepared to say that the tariff under which they are claimed is not a tariff which Hanover is entitled to enforce; and it is on that footing, that the negotiations with Hanover have hitherto been placed. This is a question in which England is not alone concerned; because negotiations have been going on between Hamburg and Denmark with Hanover, on the same subject. I will not, therefore, go into an investigation of the particular grounds on which my Honourable Friend has brought forward his motion; but I will only submit to his consideration, whether it would not be better, even with a view to the objects which both my Honourable Friend and myself contemplate, not to press his motion on the House, with the view of coming to a decision, when we have not, in a parliamentary sense, sufficient grounds for deciding the question; and when, moreover, the latter part of the resolution is unnecessary, because the Government is employed actively and sedulously in taking steps for the relief of the commerce of the country from the vexatious interference of which the petitioners complain.

My Honourable Friend who seconded this motion stated, what is undoubtedly true, that the free navigation of the great rivers of Europe is a matter of the highest importance to all commercial nations; and, perhaps, it is also true that the different powers which, by the Treaty of Vienna, were deputed to arrange those matters, have not, with respect to all those rivers, been as active in carrying the stipulations of the treaty into effect as might have been expected, even with regard to their own interests; because, although, with regard to the Rhine, a convention was held and regulations were established, yet there are many other large rivers, with regard to which no such proceeding has hitherto taken place. There is at this very moment an unsettled question between the Governments of Spain and Portugal, with regard to the navigation of the Douro, one of the rivers coming within the stipulations of that treaty; and the Danube also, one of the most important rivers in Europe, is one to which, undoubtedly, the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna must now be considered applicable, — I say, must now be considered applicable,—because Russia having acquired, by the Treaty of Adrianople, possession of the lower part of the Danube, and the upper part being in the hands of Austria, and these two powers being both parties to the Treaty of Vienna, I apprehend that the stipulations of the treaty must now be considered as applicable to the Danube, whatever might have been the case when the river was in the possession of Austria, which was, and of Turkey, which was not, a party to that treaty. As to the accumulation of deposits at the Soulineh mouth of the Danube, the subject has not escaped our consideration; and we have had communications with Austria and Russia, for the purpose of effecting the removal of these obstructions. They are not difficult of removal; and I understand measures have been taken for the purpose of restoring the channel to its original depth, so as to admit vessels drawing thirteen or fourteen feet water. I can assure my Honourable Friend and the House, that Her Majesty's Government are duly impressed with the extreme importance of our commercial interests; because every man who takes even the most superficial or shallow view of our position as a nation, must be convinced that the political power, nay, the existence of the independence of the country, depends on the resources which our commerce affords; and therefore, any Government that can be inattentive to what constitutes the fundamental support of our political importance and power, must be extremely unfit for the management of those affairs intrusted to their charge. I think that we have done something towards the promotion of our commercial interest. I will not say that we have done all that we wished to accomplish; because we have had to deal with other nations which did not participate in our views; and the House must be aware, that although, in this country, public opinion is so enlightened on matters of commerce as to make it less difficult than at former times, to carry points connected with commercial intercourse ; yet, in other countries, considerable difficulties arise, from the want of that information which is diffused throughout this nation, and also, perhaps,—we must not disguise it from ourselves, — from jealousy of our political power, and a wish, in many quarters, rather to reduce those resources whence our political power derives so peculiarly its strength. I can assure my Honourable Friend that, not only with respect to this particular matter, but to all matters in which our commerce is concerned, we are anxious to do all in our power to increase our commercial facilities; and we shall feel obliged to any Honourable Gentleman who will point out measures which may not have suggested themselves to our minds, and who will assist and strengthen us in carrying those measures through; so that, in our negotiations with other powers, it may appear that we are not merely speaking the opinions of the executive Government, but responding to the deep feeling of the country, by which we shall be backed in any measures that it may be necessary to take for the protection of our interests and the enlargement of our commercial intercourse.

MR. A. CHAPMAN. — I shall give my cordial support to the motion of the Honourable Member for Hull, because I am convinced that the Stade duties are highly detrimental to the interests of this country, without the collecting powers conferring a single benefit in return. I should be the last man to take away the revenues of any monarch or state, where a wish was manifested to increase the facilities of navigation, and different nations are placed on an equal footing. I object to the commerce of the country being saddled with a tax of this description; and if no other means can be found of getting rid of it, I would recommend the purchase of the interests of the King of Hanover, in order to relieve this country from a burden of so odious a nature.

SIR WALTER JAMES. — If my Honourable Colleague would have taken my advice, he would, prior to bringing this motion under the notice of the House, have moved for the production of certain papers, in order to ascertain the state of the negotiations alluded to by the Noble Viscount. But I do not think my Honourable Colleague is altogether wrong in the course which he has taken, considering the very meagre information which is generally afforded by documents from the Foreign Office. Although I rather doubt the propriety of pressing the motion, after what has fallen from the Noble Viscount, still, if a division should take place, I feel bound to vote with my Honourable Colleague; because, in the resolution which he has proposed, I see nothing which I can contradict or controvert. My Honourable Colleague has stated that the duchy of Bremen was purchased in the reign of George I., by 150,000*l.* of British money; and that the British Ministers of that day considered the purchase a very appropriate one; and that the money was judiciously expended, inasmuch as it was calculated to secure British interests in the town of Stade. That town, however, has now become the instrument of great oppression, and is a means of great obstruction to our trade, in that quarter, if it does not threaten its total extinction. I do not intend to enter into the question of the legality of the dues, because my Honourable Colleague has already very fairly and fully discussed that part of the subject. What I chiefly rely upon is, the Treaty of Vienna, and the convention which followed that treaty. By that treaty it was provided " that the duties on navigation shall be regulated in a uniform and settled manner." Now, so far from these duties being regulated in a uniform and settled manner, they are levied in a manner directly the reverse. The treaty further states, — " and with as little reference as possible to the different qualities of the merchandise." But is that the case, if, by a clerical error, an entry is made of cotton bales instead of cotton twist, or vice versâ, the individual is subjected to a penalty to the amount of 215*l.*? I recollect an instance in which a quantity of stationery was sent out in the Elbe packet, and because a few knives and scissars were included in the package, the vessel, which belonged to a most respectable merchant, was detained for five months; and only released on the payment of a fine, and heavy expenses. I can bear my testimony to the correctness of the statement made with respect to the Severn, because Captain Knocker, a gentleman of the highest respectability, intrusted his case to me, which certainly evinced a most tyrannical disposition on the part of the officer at Hanover; and I am bound to say that the exaction then practised was extremely unjust and unwarrantable. Now, although I am very unwilling to bring any charge against the Noble Viscount, I must say, that if a Noble Duke in another place (the Duke of Wellington) had been at the head of the Foreign Office, these matters would have been settled long ago. With respect to the negotiations now pending, I think an expression of opinion on the part of the House will materially assist the Noble Viscount; and unless he gives a positive assurance that such a course of proceeding will place him in a situation of difficulty, I shall feel bound to support the resolution of my Honourable Colleague.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I rise, Sir, not for the purpose of entering into this discussion, but rather to add my request to that of my Noble Friend, that the Honourable Member for Hull will be satisfied with the discussion which has taken place, and not think it necessary to press his resolution to a division. If my Honourable Friend should not yield to the suggestion, I believe that many Honourable Members, who concur in the view which he has taken, will feel inclined to oppose the motion; and I am afraid that their votes will be misconstrued on this occasion. I should be sorry to give a vote which might seem to imply that the propositions contained in the resolution are not founded on truth and justice. I confess that I have read, with much attention, the records in the office with which I am connected, and I feel very great difficulty in saying that these tolls are not of doubtful origin. Where claims are made, resting on the construction of so many treaties, and complicated by the arrangements subsequently made by the Treaty of Vienna, it is extremely difficult to say whether they are well founded or not. I find that the states bordering on the River Elbe have experienced considerable difficulty in arriving at a conclusion; and I imagine they agreed to waive the abstract question, in order to come to some practical arrangement with the King of Hanover, and to induce him to consent to what every one must admit to be a fair reduction of the duties at present levied, to the amount which can be legally exacted, and the abolition of all the vexatious regulations by which the levy is accompanied. My Noble Friend has intimated that it is the intention of the Government to insist upon the dues being placed on such a footing; and even the Government of Hanover admit that the duties and regulations, in their present condition, are utterly indefensible. I therefore trust that, in a very short time, they will be satisfactorily arranged; and I should be sorry to find the present attempt at an adjustment postponed until the complicated and difficult question — whether Hanover has a right to impose these tolls or not — be finally disposed of. These two branches of the subject should be kept entirely distinct. Entertaining these opinions, and not being prepared to give a direct negative to the motion of my Honourable Friend, I trust he will consent to withdraw it; otherwise, I shall be under the necessity of moving the previous question, in order to avoid an expression of the opinion of the House on the subject. My Honourable Friend has alluded to the practical hardship inflicted on the port of Hull, by the effect of the Stade duties on steam navigation. He justly says, that, notwithstanding our relations of reciprocity with Hamburg, the oppression of these duties is such, that it imposes a burden on steam-boats, to which other vessels are not subjected; and, consequently, that the steam-boat proprietors find themselves in a different position from that in which they ought to be placed, by the treaty between Hamburg and this country. That subject has engaged the attention of the Board of Trade, and has been referred to the law officers of the Crown; and we shall not be wanting in defending the right of British merchants, if there be good ground for so doing. I hope my Honourable Friend will not think the Government lukewarm on this subject; for they have taken an opportunity of urging on the Hanoverian Government the necessity of making some alterations in the matter; and I trust that he will consider he is best discharging his duty to his constituents, — whose cause he has so ably advocated, on this and on other occasions, — by accepting the pledge of the Government, that no exertion shall be wanting on their part, to accomplish the object which he has in view.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, whatever may be the result of the proposition of my Honourable Friend, the British public are greatly indebted to him for bringing the question before the House. I have certainly heard with great satisfaction the declaration of the Noble Lord, that he is anxious to have the support of the House on questions connected with the foreign commerce of the country; and I can assure him that whenever he takes a proper course, he will find the House desirous of rendering him every assistance. I wish those parties who have so long plundered British commerce to understand that there is not a dissentient voice to the resolution of my Honourable Friend; and I trust the Noble Lord will persevere with his negotiation, in the full confidence that every Honourable Member is convinced that the proceedings which have taken place on this subject are most unjust and vexatious. I believe that a vote of this House would greatly strengthen the Noble Viscount in the course which he is now pursuing. The Noble Viscount may say that he and his colleagues are actively engaged in arranging this matter. But what degree of activity have they manifested? Why has it slept since the year 1824? The Honourable Baronet opposite (Sir W. James) wished the House to understand that if the Duke of Wellington had had the management of the affairs of the country, a different course of proceeding would have taken place. But from 1824 to 1830, when the Noble Duke was in power, British commerce was plundered exactly in the same manner. The fact is, that both Governments have neglected their duty. Does the Honourable Baronet believe that any Minister of England would attempt to take out of the pockets of the King of Hanover 70,000*l.* or 80,000*l.* per annum? A complete system of cajolery has too long been pursued; and the British public have been plundered, for the purpose of supporting the King of Hanover. The Noble Viscount is aware that memorials have been sent to the Government, by merchants connected with this trade, and that they have been unable to obtain any redress; and I think, when they have been trifled with in this manner for ten years, the House ought to interfere in the matter. There would be no difficulty in effecting an arrangement, if energetic steps were taken. Some time since, when a dispute arose with one of the Mexican states, a 74 and a few frigates settled it very quietly. A misunderstanding has lately arisen between this country and China, and we are now sending out vessels in a similar manner. Let the Noble Viscount moor a 74-gun ship at Stade and he will find that quite sufficient. We are not going to declare war against China; but merely to carry on a friendly communication, conducted by an officer in a 74, accompanied by six or seven frigates, and several steamers. Let a friendly communication of that nature be sent to Hanover, and it will have the desired effect. I trust, the next time the Severn proceeds up the Elbe, she will be accompanied by the Plutus, or some other armed steam-vessel, from Chatham; and the question of our commercial relations will be settled in the course of a very few minutes. If my Honourable Friend divide, I shall certainly vote with him; and I trust that the House will unanimously support the motion, in order to strengthen the Government in their attempt to convince the King of Hanover that his conduct has been exceedingly vexatious, and that his regulations are a great impediment to the trade of this country.

SIR F. TRENCH. — Sir, connected as I am with the shipping interest, I have heard with great pleasure the statements of the Noble Viscount, and the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite; and I am extremely anxious to see their promises realised. If the Honourable Member for Hull persists in dividing the House, I shall take it as a symptom of distrust, on his part, of the professions of the Noble Viscount; but he shall certainly receive my cordial support. Some expressions have been used in the course of the debate, which would have been much better avoided; for I think the King of Hanover is fully disposed to show his gratitude and regard to England; and I was extremely sorry to hear him compared with the Dey of Algiers.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I beg to move the previous question.

Mr. HUTT. — I endeavoured, in the course of my statement, to avoid making any personal allusions; and I cannot admit that I said anything improper. I repeat, that, if the conduct of the King of Hanover cannot be justified by any existing law or treaty, I can discern no difference between the contributions which he forcibly and illegally levies on the Elbe, and the depredations of an Algerine corsair. My observations do not apply more to the present than to the preceding Sovereigns of Hanover. The question now under the consideration of the House is one of immense importance to the country; and I must say, that I have heard with great satisfaction the remarks of the Noble Viscount, and of the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, — and, indeed, of every Honourable Member who has spoken on the subject; — for the unanimous opinion appears to be, that these dues are of a doubtful character. I do not think the Right Honourable Gentleman has stated the case with his usual candour; for he says the question is complicated and doubtful Now, I deny that it is either doubtful or complicated. But that is not a part of the question on which the House has to decide. I stated, at the outset, that I did not doubt the right of the King of Hanover to levy a toll at the Stade. My complaint is, that he pushes that right to a most improper and unwarrantable extent; an extent inconsistent with a due regard either to the commercial interests of this country, or to its honour and dignity. The Right Honourable Gentleman says that it was in consequence of the difficulty of the question, that the Convention of Dresden did not peremptorily decide on the subject; but I have read the records of that convention with very different feelings. With the exception of the ministers of Hamburg and Denmark, the whole of the parties there assembled were traitors in the camp: and it was in consequence of the imposing attitude of England, whose Sovereign's personal interests were engaged in the question, that the proceedings terminated in that unsatisfactory manner. I entertain very considerable doubt whether I ought to accede to the proposition of the Noble Viscount, because, twelve months ago, he met this proposition with nearly a similar statement. I then gave way, in the hope that the Noble Viscount was about to make a satisfactory settlement of the question. And what has been done? The Noble Viscount has induced the King of Hanover to forego the duties on gentlemen's walking sticks, umbrellas, and carpet bags; and that I believe to be the extent of the Noble Viscount's success. But the Noble Viscount says that he is negotiating. My complaint is, that he has been negotiating too long; for it is the system of negotiation and treaty that has enabled the King of Hanover to continue, for the last quarter of a century, this species of oppression. Still I cannot, on this occasion, resist the feeling of the House and the expressed wish of the Noble Viscount and my Right Honourable Friend. I trust that they will bear in mind the great interests involved in this question, and that they will actively and zealously apply themselves to the task of redressing those grievances of which our merchants so justly complain.

The previous question, "That that question be now put," was put, and negatived.

BENJAMIN MILLS.

On the motion of Lord Teignmouth, the petition of Benjamin Mills (presented 3d February) read.

LORD TEIGNMOUTH. — Sir, in bringing this case before the House, I will endeavour to state the facts connected with it as briefly as I possibly can. Benjamin Mills, the petitioner, is the representative of a class of persons — about twenty-five in number,—who were removed from their situations as surveyors of taxes, in consequence of the consolidation of the duties of that department; and, on their removal, they naturally looked for some compensation. The income of Mr. Mills, during the war, was about 500*l.* a-year; after the peace, it was reduced to 300*l.*; — so that the medium is 400*l.* That income was made up of salary and emoluments; the former amounting only to 90*l.* The Act of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke (the 4 & 5 William IV. cap. 94.) specifically provided for cases of this description; and I wish to ask why this gentleman is not to receive an allowance of three fourths of the amount of his salary and emoluments, according to the scale there laid down? What has been done with regard to the officers admitted into this department at a subsequent period? Why, the very person who succeeded Mr. Mills receives a salary of 400*l.* a-year, calculated upon the salary and emoluments of the three preceding years; and when that gentleman retires from office, he will be entitled to an allowance of eight twelfths of that amount, provided he has performed its duties for the specified period. I wish to call the attention of the House to the opinion of Sir W. Follett, who has regarded both the letter and spirit of the Act, upon a case precisely similar. He says, —

> If the emoluments of the office, which are here stated to amount to 182*l.*, arose from the receipts of money authorised to be taken by the statutes referred to, or by any other legal authority, it appears to me that the amount of superannuation allowance should have been calculated with reference to the salary and emoluments jointly; and that the Lords of the Treasury might, under the Act, have awarded six twelfths of such joint amount. I do not think, however, that the Lords of the Treasury were legally bound to do so, or could be compelled to award any greater sum than they have done.

This opinion, no doubt, is founded on the last clause of the Act, which provides, "that nothing in the Act shall be construed to give any person an absolute right to compensation or a superannuation allowance." The 43d of George III. also specifically alludes to the emoluments, which were subject to the income tax. The Right Honourable Gentleman may say that there was a superannuation fund formed by 2½ per cent. levied upon the salary, and not upon the emoluments, of these officers. But I contend that that arrangement has nothing to do with the present transaction, and that it is quite a different fund. I do not impute any unkindness to the Right Honourable Gentleman, but I think this a very hard case. The fact is, that these gentlemen, after having moved in very respectable spheres, unjust and vexatious. I believe that a vote of this House would greatly strengthen the Noble Viscount in the course which he is now pursuing. The Noble Viscount may say that he and his colleagues are actively engaged in arranging this matter. But what degree of activity have they manifested? Why has it slept since the year 1824? James) wished the House to understand that if the Duke of Wellington had had the management of the affairs of the country, a differe[illegible] course of proceeding would have t[illegible] place. The an[illegible] situation in which this gentleman is ta[illegible] placed is not attributable to the present Treasury Board, but is the effect of an old established rule. The old Superannuation Act laid down a general rule that a certain deduction should be made from the salaries of certain officers therein specified, who, when they retired, should be, in consequence of such deductions, entitled to a proportionate amount of retiring allowance. The case of these surveyors came before the Treasury, and was well considered at the time; and every case has been decided by them in a similar way. To every application, in which an officer has sought to ground his retiring allowance on the amount of his emoluments, the Lords of the Treasury have said, — "If you had calculated the emoluments when the annual deductions were to be made, you would be entitled to have them considered, now, as a ground of claim; but you cannot cut both ways, and be allowed to reckon them as part of your salary, for the purpose of increasing your allowance." I trust the House will come to the same conclusion which it did on a former occasion. It would be an extremely inconvenient practice to en- regulations are a gr[illegible] trade of this cou[illegible]

SIR F. T[illegible] I am with[illegible] heard w[illegible] of th[illegible] Hon[illegible] an[illegible] [illegible]islature, as expressed [illegible]ance of the different statutes. [illegible] fully considering the subject, I am of opinion that the amount of money received by these individuals, as surveyors of taxes, from whatever source it was derived, was dry salary, according to the true construction of the Act. The Noble Lord has referred to the 43d of Geo. III. as giving the right, and showing that these emoluments were legal receipts; but that is not the most material part of the Act. Under that Act, every person who made a false Return was liable to the payment of a double duty; and the individual making the discovery was entitled to receive the whole of the excess of the duty which he, by his vigilance, had occasioned to be charged upon the individual. The Legislature thought proper, after the lapse of seven years, to make an alteration; and, by the 50th of Geo. III., this regulation was introduced — that whatever was surcharged by the vigilance of the officer, out of that surcharge he should receive a compensation as a part of his salary. The amount of salary received by the surveyor was thus made uncertain in amount, because he had only a small fixed allowance, the real amount being actually dependent on his vigilance. When we consider the present Act, I think its provisions are too plain to be mistaken; and I beg the attention of the Right Honourable Gentleman to this point. If any reasonable doubt be entertained, I admit that the Treasury have a right to exercise their discretion; but where the words of the Act are clear and distinct, every individual ought to have the full benefit of them. The general words refer to salary only. No officer is to receive more than a certain

" his salary. But, the mo- 'rticularises, these words 'n order to show the 'l "salary:" — "To 'son who shall have 'er fifteen years, ', exceeding in 'nnual salary –evidently 'n the in- 's case, 'being ' he 'e

.. Ho- .e acted as ., must be aware .. the assessors, whose . hold an even hand between ..ic and individuals, and that 52*l.* ,ear is a very insufficient compensation for thirty-five years' services. I would ask, is it politic to tell public officers that nobody in the world so little deserves to be well served as the public, because nobody is so niggardly as the public in rewarding its servants on their retirement, after a long and faithful discharge of their duties? I again urge on the Right Honourable Gentleman the propriety of a full examination of this case. If there be anything like a contract on the part of these gentlemen, by which they have waived the benefit of the legislative provision in their favour, let them be excluded from it; but let it be on the distinct understanding, that justice has been done them, and not that the Act has been passed by, and that, in the exercise of their discretion, the Lords of the Treasury have reduced an income of 400*l.* to a mere allowance of 52*l.* Mr. Mills is labouring under a double disadvantage; for he can receive nothing from the private fund, in consequence of having purchased an annuity for his life of 50*l.* a-year. He is thus excluded from the receipt of 30*l.* a-year, to which he would otherwise have been entitled. In order to satisfy a class of most respectable men, who have a strong claim on the sympathy of the public, I trust the House will agree to the appointment of a Committee.

Mr. HUME. — So far from thinking the Treasury niggardly, or the public servants ill paid, I believe that if a Committee be fairly appointed to consider the burden imposed on the public by this compensation system, it will appear that the Treasury have been too liberal. My opinion is, that these parties have no claim whatever to any allowance. If a Committee is to be appointed, let its inquiries be general; let the question of too much, as well as that of too little, be discussed; and if that be done, I pledge my existence that the result will be a recommendation of large reductions.

LORD TEIGNMOUTH. — Sir, the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that the 'ight Honourable Baronet the Member Pembroke did, on a former occasion, 'e a motion of this kind; but I ..ık there must be some mistake on that point. In the early part of the present evening, the Right Honourable Baronet gave precisely the same interpretation of the Act which I have done; and, on my asking the cause of his opposition, he stated that there must have been some special circumstances in the case, and that some bargain must have been made with the Gentlemen. Now, I think that any person making such a bargain would have been exceedingly unwise. But from all I have heard, the parties in the present case have no idea of any such bargain as that; and I would appeal to the House whether a private arrangement of that kind ought to defeat the intention of the Legislature. I have heard nothing to induce me to alter my determination; and I shall therefore press the question to a division.

and discharged their public duties without any degree of blame, were suddenly reduced to a state of poverty and distress, except in cases where they had private incomes. I only wish that justice should be done to this respectable class of individuals by the Lords of the Treasury, who, I think, have not complied with the spirit of the Act. If the Right Honourable Gentleman can convince me that I am wrong, I will readily withdraw the motion; but if he cannot do so, I will divide the House, even if I should only receive the support of half a dozen Members. I now beg to move "that the petition of Benjamin Mills be referred to a Select Committee."

An Honourable Member. — Sir, I beg to second the motion.

Question put, — "That the said petition be referred to a Select Committee."

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Sir, although this question may be new to the Noble Lord, it is not so to the House, because an explanation has been already given on similar cases; and so satisfied was the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for Pembroke that the decision of the Treasury was in conformity with the Act and with equity, that he gave it his support. I will, now, turn to the case itself, of which the Noble Lord does not seem to be fully aware. The situation in which this gentleman is placed is not attributable to the present Treasury Board, but is the effect of an old established rule. The old Superannuation Act laid down a general rule that a certain deduction should be made from the salaries of certain officers therein specified, who, when they retired, should be, in consequence of such deductions, entitled to a proportionate amount of retiring allowance. The case of these surveyors came before the Treasury, and was well considered at the time; and every case has been decided by them in a similar way. To every application, in which an officer has sought to ground his retiring allowance on the amount of his emoluments, the Lords of the Treasury have said, — "If you had calculated the emoluments when the annual deductions were to be made, you would be entitled to have them considered, now, as a ground of claim; but you cannot cut both ways, and be allowed to reckon them as part of your salary, for the purpose of increasing your allowance." I trust the House will come to the same conclusion which it did on a former occasion. It would be an extremely inconvenient practice to encourage applications to the House of Commons in cases of this kind; and it would have a very bad effect on the public service, if the House should interfere with the retired allowances of public officers. I must therefore resist the appointment of this Committee.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — Sir, I hope, notwithstanding the statement of the Right Honourable Gentleman, that he will not object to the appointment of a Select Committee for the purpose of considering this petition. It would be extremely satisfactory — not only to the parties themselves, but to those individuals who look impartially at the question — to ascertain whether they are bound by any such arrangement as that to which allusion has been made. It would require a very strong agreement to supersede the obvious intention of the Legislature, as expressed upon the face of the different statutes. After fully considering the subject, I am of opinion that the amount of money received by these individuals, as surveyors of taxes, from whatever source it was derived, was dry salary, according to the true construction of the Act. The Noble Lord has referred to the 43d of Geo. III., as giving the right, and showing that these emoluments were legal receipts; but that is not the most material part of the Act. Under that Act, every person who made a false Return was liable to the payment of a double duty; and the individual making the discovery was entitled to receive the whole of the excess of the duty which he, by his vigilance, had occasioned to be charged upon the individual. The Legislature thought proper, after the lapse of seven years, to make an alteration; and, by the 50th of Geo. III., this regulation was introduced, — that whatever was surcharged by the vigilance of the officer, out of that surcharge he should receive a compensation as a part of his salary. The amount of salary received by the surveyor was thus made uncertain in amount, because he had only a small fixed allowance, the real amount being actually dependent on his vigilance. When we consider the present Act, I think its provisions are too plain to be mistaken; and I beg the attention of the Right Honourable Gentleman to this point. If any reasonable doubt be entertained, I admit that the Treasury have a right to exercise their discretion; but where the words of the Act are clear and distinct, every individual ought to have the full benefit of them. The general words refer to salary only. No officer is to receive more than a certain proportion of his salary. But, the moment the Act particularises, these words are introduced, in order to show the meaning of the word "salary:" — "To any officer, clerk, or person who shall have served ten years and under fifteen years, an annual allowance, not exceeding in amount four twelfths of the annual salary and emoluments of his office,"— evidently making the amount dependent on the individual's industry. Now, in this case, Mr. Mills received 400*l.* a-year, being salary, annual, and emoluments. When he applies for compensation, after thirty-five years' service, he is told, "Your salary was 90*l.* and not 400*l.*, and you can only receive the proportion in reference to the former sum." Now, the House ought to look to the nature of the service of these individuals, and to their station in life. Many of them are persons of the highest respectability and education; and Honourable Members who have acted as Commissioners of Taxes, must be aware of the characters of the assessors, whose duty it was to hold an even hand between the public and individuals, and that 52*l.* a-year is a very insufficient compensation for thirty-five years' services. I would ask, is it politic to tell public officers that nobody in the world so little deserves to be well served as the public, because nobody is so niggardly as the public in rewarding its servants on their retirement, after a long and faithful discharge of their duties? I again urge on the Right Honourable Gentleman the propriety of a full examination of this case. BANKING ESTABLISHMENTS.

Mr. WODEHOUSE. — Sir, pursuant to the notice which I have given, I rise to put a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, prior to his nomination of the Committee on Banking. My question relates to a petition which appears in the Appendix to the Ninth Report of Public Petitions. It is a petition from the bankers, traders, and merchants of Manchester, showing that great losses have of late been incurred by them in consequence of the fluctuations in the value of money; that severe privations and sufferings have been endured by the industrious classes in that neighbourhood; and that similar fluctuations, producing similar calamitous results, have been, in the memory of the petitioners, of frequent occurrence. The petitioners, therefore, pray this Honourable House to appoint a Committee on the earliest possible day to ascertain how far the present laws which regulate the currency have been instrumental in producing these evils, with the view of providing a remedy. My question is this: — Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer mean to refer this petition to the consideration of the Committee, or does he not? If referred, is it to be so, with a view to provide a remedy for the evils of which the petitioners complain? If excluded, on what grounds? and, lastly, whether, in that case, such a petition, of such a nature, coming from such a quarter, and at such a moment, ought to be excluded from the consideration of that Committee, which, if I rightly understood the Right Honourable Gentleman, is to be specifically appointed for entering into a preliminary consideration of the principles on which the paper circulation of the country is to be regulated for the time to come?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Sir, it certainly was my intention to refer that petition to the Committee; and that being the case, of course it is not necessary for me to give any reasons for not doing so.

Mr. WODEHOUSE. — Does the Right Honourable Gentleman, in giving me that answer, mean to admit that he is aware of the evidence offered in 1826 by Mr. Lloyd, before the Committee of the House of Lords, showing that nine parts out of ten of the circulation of Manchester consisted of internal bills of exchange?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — If the House thinks it right that I should submit to a preliminary cross-examination, I shall be happy to answer any of the questions the Honourable Gentleman may think fit to put to me; but I feel that I cannot do so without entering into a statement of a more general nature than would, perhaps, be quite convenient at this moment. If the Honourable Gentleman will direct his question to any particular point, I shall be glad to give him any information as to the views which I entertain.

Mr. WODEHOUSE. — I beg to repeat my question. It is on record, from the evidence given before this House, as well as the House of Lords, that at Manchester the greater part of the circulation for many years past has consisted of bills of exchange; and I wish to know whether the Right Honourable Gentleman is aware of that circumstance?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I am aware of the general nature of that evidence; but I do not recollect the particular point to which the Honourable Gentleman refers. I now beg to move that the following Members be nominated as the Committee: — Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Hume, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Goulburn, Mr. Mark Philips, Mr. O'Connell, Sir James Graham, Mr. Clay, Mr. Gisborne, Sir John Rae Reid, Mr. Oswald, Mr. Charles Wood, Mr. Rickford, Mr. John Parker, Mr. Pattison, Mr. Herries, Mr. Ellice, Mr. Serjeant Jackson, Mr. Hector, Mr. Grote, Sir Thomas Fremantle, Mr. John Abel Smith, Mr. Strutt, Mr. Matthias Attwood, and Mr. Morrison.

Question put.

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN. — Sir, I feel myself placed in a situation of some difficulty on the present occasion. During my temporary absence, I understand that my name was called; and I wish to ask whether I am to be deprived of the opportunity of submitting the motion of which I have given notice, relative to the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords? My absence was occasioned simply by my desire to escape from a division upon a question which I did not understand.

Mr. HUME.—I consider the rule of the House to be imperative. The Right Honourable Gentleman's name was called, not once, but twice; and not being present to reply to it, he must endure the consequence.

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN.—I have already stated the cause of my absence. I returned at the earliest moment, in order to answer to my name; and I do not think any other Honourable Member will object to my proceeding with the motion.

The SPEAKER.—The invariable rule of the House is, that if a Member be not present to respond to his name when it is called from the chair, his turn for submitting any motion which he may have placed upon the paper is lost. In the present instance, I am sure the House will bear witness that the Right Honourable Gentleman's name was not called with any haste. After the numbers of the division had been declared, I called upon the Right Honourable Gentleman twice. As the Right Honourable Gentleman was not in his place to answer to the call, according to the rule of the House, the Right Honourable Gentleman has lost his turn, and the other business must be proceeded with.

Mr. R. STEUART.—I perhaps may be allowed to state that you subsequently called the name of the Honourable Member for Finsbury, who did not answer, and that you then called on the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SIR R. PEEL.—Sir, I did not understand my Right Honourable Friend to call in question your perfect impartiality. The point which he urged was—the propriety of giving Members an opportunity of leaving the House when they find a difficulty in saying "ay" or "no" to the particular question before the House. For my own part, I very much object to leaving the House. I think it is the duty of a Member, in almost all cases, to make up his mind in what way he will vote; but, certainly, on many occasions, it may be perfectly justifiable to decline voting; for instance, in the case of a Member coming in during the discussion of a question relating to some individual interest, and not having heard the whole debate. There may also be certain public cases in which a Member may be justified in not voting; and I think, therefore, that an opportunity ought to be given to Members to leave the House under those circumstances. I understood my Honourable Friend to say, that as he could not conscientiously give a vote on either side of the question before the House, he left the House; and, consequently, had not an opportunity, by the rules of the House, of bringing forward his motion in its turn. I think, under such circumstances, that he ought not to be prevented from bringing forward his motion.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL.—I regret that the Right Honourable Gentleman has not had the opportunity of making his statements, which I am most anxious to hear; but, by the course of proceeding established by the House, if an Honourable Gentleman declines to vote, it must be at the risk of losing his turn, from being absent when his name is called. Besides, when an Honourable Member has left the House, it cannot be known that it is his intention to return; and the consequence may be, that those who intend to oppose the motion, finding that the Honourable Member is absent when his name is called, may have left the House. I therefore think that it would be a dangerous precedent to depart from the usual course, and that it will be more convenient for the Right Honourable Gentleman to give another notice.

CAPTAIN PECHELL.—Sir, several other Members have been similarly situated. On one occasion, although I felt very little disposition to vote either way, I did vote, in order to keep my position on the paper. If the Right Honourable Gentleman should obtain permission to bring forward his motion, I trust it will not be until after the other Orders of the Day are disposed of.

SIR R. PEEL.—Sir, I do not object to the Committee; but I am sorry that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has considered it necessary to make it so very numerous. I can foresee that this must prove a very protracted inquiry; and I doubt very much whether it would not be advisable to distribute the separate branches of inquiry among different Committees. It may be said that the different branches of the subject are very much connected together; and that to have different Committees sitting on the different branches, and probably going over the same ground, is liable to much objection; but I think that there are some parts of the subject sufficiently distinct to entitle them to investigation by a Committee not exceeding eleven or thirteen Members. For instance, one great question which must be inquired into, is the policy of separating the functions of a bank of issue from the ordinary business of banking. Now, I doubt whether that would not be more satisfactorily investigated by a separate Committee, composed of a small number of Members, who would direct their exclusive attention to that subject, than by a general Committee, of not less than twenty-six members; but, at the same time, I do not underrate the force of the argument, that the different parts of the subject are very much connected together.

Motion agreed to; Committee nominated.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, after the observations of the Right Honourable Baronet, I perhaps may experience some difficulty in inducing the House to sanction the nomination of two additional members. The suggestion of the Right Honourable Gentleman must be founded either on principle or precedent. I think it cannot be founded on the latter, because the practice is not uniform. The Committees on this subject have generally been very numerous. In 1832, I believe, the Committee consisted of thirty-two members; in 1836 the number was fifteen; in the following year, nineteen; and the year after that, sixteen. The inquiry is of immense importance; and I do not see any objection to a large Committee. The additional names which I propose are those of Sir H. Parnell and Mr. Thornely. If any individual, more than another, has distinguished himself by his attention to the subject, it is the Right Honourable Member for Dundee; and I am exceedingly anxious that the Committee should have the benefit of his advice. Mr. Thornely has been extensively engaged in business as a merchant, and having now retired, can devote his exclusive attention to the subject. I beg to move "that Sir H. Parnell and Mr. Thornely be added to the Committee;" but if the Right Honourable Gentleman has any objection, I will not press the motion.

An Honourable Member. — Sir, I beg to second the motion.

Question put, — "That Sir Henry Parnell be one other Member of the said Committee."

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, the Honourable Gentleman assumes that my suggestion was founded either on principle or precedent; but I think that I have heard propositions made by the Honourable Member, in which I could discover no foundation either in principle or precedent.

Mr. HUME. — Oh! that was your dulness of comprehension.

SIR R. PEEL. — My observation was suggested by a consideration of convenience. In 1832, there was a Committee consisting of thirty-two Members; but it was found that so numerous a Committee led to such vague responsibility, and bad attendance, that a rule was laid down that Committees should not consist of more than fifteen members, unless special reasons should exist for the appointment of a larger number; therefore I think that my observation is in conformity with precedent. I cannot help thinking that if separate Committees directed their undivided attention to some parts of the subject, the inquiry would, on the whole, be more complete.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I cannot, of course, have the smallest personal objection to the names proposed by the Honourable Member; and I should be sorry to object to them, if I did not feel it impossible to go effectually to work with a Committee exceeding a certain number. I have been anxiously endeavouring to reduce the number as much as possible; but, looking to the various interests involved, I could not avoid naming a large Committee, for the purpose of having each of those interests fairly represented. I have been obliged, very reluctantly, to omit several names; and I therefore trust the House will not make the Committee larger.

Motion (for adding Sir H. Parnell) withdrawn.

Question proposed, — "That Mr. Thornely be one other Member of the said Committee." Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. RAIKES CURRIE.—I also wish, Sir, to add the name of an Honourable Member to this Committee. It would be presumptuous in me to allude to the more general qualifications of the Honourable Member for Bridport, as they are known and acknowledged by all parties in this House, but I may be permitted particularly to refer to his distinguished exertions on Lord Althorp's Committee in 1832. By no person who sat on that Committee were more pertinent questions put than by that Honourable Gentleman; and I am sure that, if the House were to peruse the evidence taken before it, it would see that most of the more important answers that were elicited were made in reply to those questions. It will, of course, be necessary that all the present prevalent theories, with respect to banking, be examined into by this Committee; and it is my firm belief that, for such an investigation, the critical spirit of the Honourable Member for Bridport's philosophy would be found of eminent service. After having been, for many years, extensively engaged in commercial pursuits, he has, long since, withdrawn from them; and, when I contrast the few pithy sentences that have, on so many occasions, fallen from him, in this House, upon banking and commercial matters, with that muddy torrent of figures which too often flows from the lips of many others, I am the more induced to press the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make what, I am sure, will be a very great improvement to his Committee, by the addition of the name of the Honourable Gentleman. I therefore move, Sir, "That Mr. Warburton be one other Member of the said Committee."

Motion seconded, and question put.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I can assure the Honourable Member that it has been with very great reluctance that I have omitted the name of Mr. Warburton in the list. At the same time, if I could be assured that this would be really the last name which would be pressed upon me, I might, perhaps, be disposed to give way. But I have no assurance to that effect on the part of other Honourable Gentlemen.

SIR R. PEEL. — How will the Right Honourable Gentleman settle the matter with Sir Henry Parnell and Mr. Thornely?

[Laughter.]

Two names of, I must say, most respectable Gentlemen have been proposed, and negatived; how will the Right Honourable Gentleman assent to the third? But there are two other names still to be proposed. Will the Right Honourable Gentleman reject the two first proposed, reject, also, the two last, and admit only the middle one? He can have no guarantee that other names will not be pressed upon him. The ground which the Honourable Member for Bridport has taken upon the currency would naturally incline me, with my views on that question, to assent to the name of that Honourable Gentleman being added to the Committee; but I really do not see how the Right Honourable Gentleman can, without doing an injustice to Sir Henry Parnell, who has devoted so much attention to financial matters, consistently give way, on this motion.

Mr. WODEHOUSE. — I have heard that the Government are "made of squeezable materials;" and it is clear that the Right Honourable Gentleman is, at present, rather more in the "melting mood," with regard to the name of Mr. Warburton, than he was when that of Sir Henry Parnell was proposed.

Mr. HAWES. — I must say, Sir, that I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has more reason to reject the name of Sir Henry Parnell than the one now proposed; inasmuch as the former Gentleman has other important public duties to perform. The case is very different with respect to the Honourable Member for Bridport. I think that that Honourable Member would elicit very pertinent answers from those who might be examined before this Committee; and I hope the Right Honourable Gentleman will, at all events, admit that there are parties, out of doors, whose names are entitled to great weight, who have urgently recommended the addition of that Gentleman to the inquiry. The object we all have at heart is, to obtain the best possible information on this important subject; and I would, by no means, appear to press the name of this Honourable Member upon the Right Honourable Gentleman, did I not think that, of the five additional names that are now before the House, the name of the Honourable Member for Bridport is the best. It would be taking the "middle course," as hinted at by the Right Honourable Baronet opposite.

Mr. R. CURRIE. — It is my intention to press my motion to a division.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHE-

of inquiry among different Committees. It may be said that the different branches of the subject are very much connected together; and that to have different Committees sitting on the different branches, and probably going over the same ground, is liable to much objection; but I think that there are some parts of the subject sufficiently distinct to entitle them to investigation by a Committee not exceeding eleven or thirteen Members. For instance, one great question which must be inquired into, is the policy of separating the functions of a bank of issue from the ordinary business of banking. Now, I doubt whether that would not be more satisfactorily investigated by a separate Committee, composed of a small number of Members, who would direct their exclusive attention to that subject, than by a general Committee, of not less than twenty-six members; but, at the same time, I do not underrate the force of the argument, that the different parts of the subject are very much connected together.

Motion agreed to; Committee nominated.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, after the observations of the Right Honourable Baronet, I perhaps may experience some difficulty in inducing the House to sanction the nomination of two additional members. The suggestion of the Right Honourable Gentleman must be founded either on principle or precedent. I think it cannot be founded on the latter, because the practice is not uniform. The Committees on this subject have generally been very numerous. In 1832, I believe, the Committee consisted of thirty-two members; in 1836 the number was fifteen; in the following year, nineteen; and the year after that, sixteen. The inquiry is of immense importance; and I do not see any objection to a large Committee. The additional names which I propose are those of Sir H. Parnell and Mr. Thornely. If any individual, more than another, has distinguished himself by his attention to the subject, it is the Right Honourable Member for Dundee; and I am exceedingly anxious that the Committee should have the benefit of his advice. Mr. Thornely has been extensively engaged in business as a merchant, and having now retired, can devote his exclusive attention to the subject. I beg to move "that Sir H. Parnell and Mr. Thornely be added to the Committee;" but if the Right Honourable Gentleman has any objection, I will not press the motion.

An Honourable Member. — Sir, I beg to second the motion.

Question put, — "That Sir Henry Parnell be one other Member of the said Committee."

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, the Honourable Gentleman assumes that my suggestion was founded either on principle or precedent; but I think that I have heard propositions made by the Honourable Member, in which I could discover no foundation either in principle or precedent.

Mr. HUME. — Oh! that was your dulness of comprehension.

SIR R. PEEL. — My observation was suggested by a consideration of convenience. In 1832, there was a Committee consisting of thirty-two Members; but it was found that so numerous a Committee led to such vague responsibility and bad attendance, that a rule was laid down that Committees should not consist of more than fifteen members, unless special reasons should exist for the appointment of a larger number; therefore I think that my observation is in conformity with precedent. I cannot help thinking that if separate Committees directed their undivided attention to some parts of the subject, the inquiry would, on the whole, be more complete.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I cannot, of course, have the smallest personal objection to the names proposed by the Honourable Member; and I should be sorry to object to them, if I did not feel it impossible to go effectually to work with a Committee exceeding a certain number. I have been anxiously endeavouring to reduce the number as much as possible; but, looking to the various interests involved, I could not avoid naming a large Committee, for the purpose of having each of those interests fairly represented. I have been obliged, very reluctantly, to omit several names; and I therefore trust the House will not make the Committee larger.

Motion (for adding Sir H. Parnell) withdrawn.

Question proposed, — "That Mr. Thornely be one other Member of the said Committee." Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. RAIKES CURRIE.—I also wish, Sir, to add the name of an Honourable Member to this Committee. It would be presumptuous in me to allude to the more general qualifications of the Honourable Member for Bridport, as they are known and acknowledged by all parties in this House, but I may be permitted particularly to refer to his distinguished exertions on Lord Althorp's Committee in 1832. By no person who sat on that Committee were more pertinent questions put than by that Honourable Gentleman; and I am sure that, if the House were to peruse the evidence taken before it, it would see that most of the more important answers that were elicited were made in reply to those questions. It will, of course, be necessary that all the present prevalent theories, with respect to banking, be examined into by this Committee; and it is my firm belief that, for such an investigation, the critical spirit of the Honourable Member for Bridport's philosophy would be found of eminent service. After having been, for many years, extensively engaged in commercial pursuits, he has, long since, withdrawn from them; and, when I contrast the few pithy sentences that have, on so many occasions, fallen from him, in this House, upon banking and commercial matters, with that muddy torrent of figures which too often flows from the lips of many others, I am the more induced to press the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make what, I am sure, will be a very great improvement to his Committee, by the addition of the name of the Honourable Gentleman. I therefore move, Sir, "That Mr. Warburton be one other Member of the said Committee."

Motion seconded, and question put.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I can assure the Honourable Member that it has been with very great reluctance that I have omitted the name of Mr. Warburton in the list. At the same time, if I could be assured that this would be really the last name which would be pressed upon me, I might, perhaps, be disposed to give way. But I have no assurance to that effect on the part of other Honourable Gentlemen.

SIR R. PEEL. — How will the Right Honourable Gentleman settle the matter with Sir Henry Parnell and Mr. Thornely?

[Laughter.]

Two names of, I must say, most respectable Gentlemen have been proposed, and negatived; how will the Right Honourable Gentleman assent to the third? But there are two other names still to be proposed. Will the Right Honourable Gentleman reject the two first proposed, reject, also, the two last, and admit only the middle one? He can have no guarantee that other names will not be pressed upon him. The ground which the Honourable Member for Bridport has taken upon the currency would naturally incline me, with my views on that question, to assent to the name of that Honourable Gentleman being added to the Committee; but I really do not see how the Right Honourable Gentleman can, without doing an injustice to Sir Henry Parnell, who has devoted so much attention to financial matters, consistently give way, on this motion.

Mr. WODEHOUSE. — I have heard that the Government are "made of squeezable materials;" and it is clear that the Right Honourable Gentleman is, at present, rather more in the "melting mood," with regard to the name of Mr. Warburton, than he was when that of Sir Henry Parnell was proposed.

Mr. HAWES. — I must say, Sir, that I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has more reason to reject the name of Sir Henry Parnell than the one now proposed; inasmuch as the former Gentleman has other important public duties to perform. The case is very different with respect to the Honourable Member for Bridport. I think that that Honourable Member would elicit very pertinent answers from those who might be examined before this Committee; and I hope the Right Honourable Gentleman will, at all events, admit that there are parties, out of doors, whose names are entitled to great weight, who have urgently recommended the addition of that Gentleman to the inquiry. The object we all have at heart is, to obtain the best possible information on this important subject; and I would, by no means, appear to press the name of this Honourable Member upon the Right Honourable Gentleman, did I not think that, of the five additional names that are now before the House, the name of the Honourable Member for Bridport is the best. It would be taking the "middle course," as hinted at by the Right Honourable Baronet opposite.

Mr. R. CURRIE. — It is my intention to press my motion to a division.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHE-

QUER. — I by no means desire to put the House to a division upon this point. If Mr. Warburton's name be insisted upon, I shall not further object to it; and my only reason for not proposing it myself was, that I thought the Government was sufficiently represented by the names I had previously placed upon the Committee.

Mr. SHAW. — I think that it seems improper that the Right Honourable Gentleman, after he has well considered the names of the persons to be nominated, should now alter his decision.

SIR R. PEEL. — I was prepared to support the Right Honourable Gentleman in refusing to add any more names to the Committee. I myself have been pressed, by my friends, to add other names; but I said, "No, the Committee is already too numerous;" and I followed out my opinion, by resisting, with the Right Honourable Gentleman, the addition of two names already proposed. But, now, the Right Honourable Gentleman says he will give way. I, Sir, however, say that I will not give way.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I will not be placed in the painful situation of admitting Mr. Warburton now, after rejecting two other most respectable names. I never went so far, in advising a "middle course," as to say that, because a man happens to be named the third, with two before him and two behind him, you are to reject the two extremes, and therefore take the middle name. But, supposing any Gentleman should propose two names more, then there would be seven, and Mr. Warburton would lose the enviable situation of middleman, which he holds at present.

Mr. W. S. O'BRIEN. — If there be so strong a feeling, on the part of the House, in favour of the Honourable Member for Bridport, I would suggest that the better mode would be, to subtract some other name from those on the Committee, and to substitute that of the Honourable Member, should any one of the Committee consent to withdraw. I do think, however, for my own part, that there is no Member of this House who, from his knowledge upon the particular subject to be investigated, has so great a claim to be placed on this Committee.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — If the Honourable Gentleman who has made this motion will withdraw it, some other Gentleman on the Committee may, no doubt, be induced to give way, to make room for the admission of the Honourable Member for Bridport.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUND TURNER. — I rise to move, Sir, the addition of Mr. Blewitt's name to the Committee, because he is well acquainted with, and has taken an active part in, the management of joint stock banks, and because, on the Committee, as named, there is not one person connected with joint stock banks of issue. There are, on the Committee, three directors of private banks of issue, the governor and another director of the Bank of England, Mr. Serjeant Jackson, connected with the Bank of Ireland, and two members of private banking firms in London; and I must, therefore, make an appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer (for, although Sir T. Fremantle, whose name is on the Committee, is a director of a joint stock bank, yet it is not, however, a bank of issue) in favour of the Honourable Member for Newport, in order that the inquiry may be a fair and not a partial one, and that the Report may be such as to carry great weight with the country. I move then, Sir, "that Mr. Blewitt be one other Member of the said Committee."

Motion seconded, and question put.

Mr. WODEHOUSE. — I must object, Sir, to the insertion of any more names on the list of this Committee.

Mr. GISBORNE. — The House knows, Sir, that any joint stock bank in the country can, if it please, become a bank of issue; and I cannot, therefore, see any distinction between the two. Still I think that there is not a sufficient number of persons connected with these banks on this Committee.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I think there ought to be a due proportion of persons on the Committee connected with all the different classes of banking; and I will now read the names of the parties connected with joint stock banks who are on it already. They are those of Mr. Gisborne, Sir Thomas Fremantle, Mr. Matthias Attwood, Mr. O'Connell, and Mr. Hector. I must therefore oppose this motion, if it is pressed to a division. It is not necessary to have Gentlemen absolutely in the position of directrs of joint stock banks of issue on the Committee, but Gentlemen connected and conversant with the general question. There are five Gentlemen connected with hese banks already named; and I think hat number quite sufficient.

Mr. HUME. — I hope the Honourable Gentleman, after what has taken place, will not divide the House on this name.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I have now to move, Sir, "that this Committee be a Committee of Secrecy."

Motion seconded, and question put.

Mr. HUME. — I should like to know, Sir, why a Committee upon a subject of such importance, and which excites so much interest throughout the country, should be a secret Committee?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I must remind the House that, in all cases in which the Bank charter has been inquired into, the Committees have been secret, and have been so with the greatest advantage; as the House thereby obtained much valuable information which would not otherwise have been gained. I do not see any reason, in the present case, for departing from the former practice.

Mr. SMITH O'BRIEN. — I trust that this is not to be a final decision; and if the Honourable Member will press his objection to a division, I certainly shall divide with him.

SIR R. PEEL. — If the appointing of this Committee of Secrecy implied that our proceedings should be of a secret nature, I should object to it; but the Committee on Joint Stock Banks was equally called a Committee of Secrecy. No one was excluded from that inquiry; which was open to the Members of the House. That Committee called for information respecting the private affairs of the Bank, and the result of that information was very valuable. When the chairman of the Committee is placed in a situation to say to witnesses, "If you furnish us with this private information, we will derive our results from it, without disclosing the details," there will be a general acquiescence in granting that information. He is able to gain for the public the results, without giving those minute disclosures of a private nature which parties may reasonably object to. I think that, by making this a Committee of Secrecy, you will have a greater command of useful information.

Mr. HUME. — I think it should not be a secret Committee; and I shall therefore consider it my duty to divide the House upon the question.

Question put, "That the said Committee be a Committee of Secrecy."

The House divided: — Ayes 33, Noes 23; Majority 10.

Mr. HUME. — I wish to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman in the chair what I am to understand by secrecy, as applied to this Committee?

The SPEAKER. — As the House has decided that the Committee shall be a secret one, the Honourable Gentleman, for example, will not be allowed to disclose any of its proceedings.

[Laughter.]

Mr. HUME. — Then all I can say is, that the Committee will be useless.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records; five to be a quorum: petitions presented this Session relative to currency and banking referred; Reports of former Committees on banking referred.

MENDICANCY (IRELAND).

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH.—In pursuance, Sir, of the understanding that prevailed when the Irish Poor Law Bill was before the House, that some measure affecting vagrancy in Ireland should afterwards be brought forward as a distinct and separate question;—in pursuance of the recommendations of the English and Irish Poor Law Commissioners;—and in pursuance of resolutions which have been presented from various quarters, either to the Poor Law Commissioners themselves or to the Government, upon this subject,—I have given notice of my intention to move for leave to bring in a Bill for the suppression of disorderly mendicancy in Ireland. The existing laws upon this subject in Ireland are liable to these objections and to these practical defects,—that their definitions are obsolete and uncertain, or that they subject the parties to such severe penalties as to defeat the object for which they were enacted. They give the extreme punishment of transportation for vagrancy; and, indeed, such is their severity, that, being repugnant to the feelings of the people, they cannot, without the utmost difficulty, be enforced. In the Bill I now move for leave to introduce, I have adopted so much of the vagrancy law of England as relates to the suppression of mendicancy, without incorporating that portion of the English law which relates rather to matters fit for a police code than to the subject of the poor laws. I have endeavoured to make the provisions of my Bill as simple and definite, and the penalties as mild and as considerate, as the difficulties of the subject will allow. My object is, to relieve the proprietors, and particularly the poorer portion of the proprietors, of the soil from the double charge to which they are now, for the first time, subjected,—namely, that to which they are liable under the New Poor Law Act, and that to which, in all times past and present, they have been subjected, by a regular and organised system of mendicancy,—an evil which has risen to its present height, partly owing to the naturally good feelings of the occupiers of the soil, partly to fear, and partly to the dread of the Divine vengeance in case of their refusal to give alms. The Bill which I propose will not apply so strongly to the wealthy class, or to the absentee proprietors, as they are sufficiently protected from this evil, and their lawns, and parks, and avenues are sufficiently guarded against the intrusion of the mendicant's footstep. It is the cabin, that is most open to the winds of heaven, that is also most open to the mendicant's demand; and it is the meal that is composed of potatoes which is most frequently shared by those who are content to live upon the gains and the industry of others. Is it my wish to prevent these acts of charity and of benevolence? I have no such wish; and this House has no such power. The stream of charity, I well know, is too deep, too universal, and too strong, to be controlled by any human law; and all that I am anxious to do is, to place under the superintendence of the central board of Poor Law Commissioners in Dublin, or of the resident magistracy,—and to oppose some powerful check to,—that regular and unprincipled trade of mendicancy which so extensively prevails in many parts of Ireland, and particularly in the most destitute portions of the country, in which, as is well known, the inhabitants are exposed to the daily and hourly necessity of regularly contributing a great portion of their hard earnings to support, in beggary and idleness, large masses of mendicants by profession. I know that there are many difficulties to contend with in a matter of this nature, and that much may be said on both sides of the question. I do not disguise from myself the difficulty of making alms-begging liable to punishment, and especially in a country where the law gives no absolute right to relief. I propose, however, to make it punishable only when the workhouse in any district in which vagrancy may be carried on shall be built, and so long as such workhouse is able to contain all those whom the guardians shall deem proper objects of relief; and, on balancing the whole of the arguments on both sides, I confess it does appear to me that the balance leans towards an Act which shall put under control this system of professional mendicancy. I allow that there must remain doubts on the minds of many persons upon this subject; and I by no means wish to hurry the Bill I shall conclude by proposing through the House. It is not my intention to press it, at present, beyond its first stage; and shall merely lay it on the table of the House, for the purpose of giving the Irish community full time for the consideration of the measure, and its various provisions. Having, then, stated that such are my intentions, I trust there will not be, on either side of the House, any opposition to the introduction of the Bill; and that I shall not be refused permission to lay it before Parliament. I now, therefore, beg to move for leave to bring in a Bill for the suppression of mendicancy in Ireland.

Mr. D. R. PIGOT. — I beg to second the motion.

Question put.

SIR R. PEEL.—I fear I have not quite understood the Noble Lord. Does the Noble Lord mean that, supposing a workhouse in any union to be full, in that case the system of mendicancy will be tolerated?

LORD MORPETH. — The penalties I propose to enact will only apply to parties taken up for vagrancy in any district where the workhouse shall have room for more occupants.

SIR R. PEEL. — But supposing the workhouse in any particular district to be full, and that it would be impossible to receive any more inmates into it, would mendicancy be in that case tolerated in that district?

LORD MORPETH. — In such a case, no alteration is made by this Bill in the law as it at present exists. There will be no penalties where the workhouses shall be incapable of receiving more inmates.

SIR R. PEEL. — I cannot but think that it will be extremely difficult to fix offending parties with a knowledge whether the workhouse may be capable of receiving more inmates or not. The Noble Lord has also used the word "disorderly." Does he mean by that the act of demanding alms, accompanied by violence? If nothing more than that be meant, then the Bill will afford no relief to the smaller proprietors, — those who are now so much exposed to affecting appeals to their benevolence,—appeals, too, which they are always very ready to give ear to.

LORD MORPETH. — In using the word "disorderly," I refer to the asking of alms in any manner contrary to the spirit of the enactments of this Bill.

Mr. SHAW. — I am glad to hear from the Noble Lord that he intends to give full time for the consideration of this Bill, upon which such great doubts exist. In reference to what the Noble Lord has said, however, as to the understanding, with regard to this measure, at the time of the passing of the Irish Poor Law Act, — I beg to remind the Noble Lord that the object of those who then advocated the postponement of any enactment on the subject of mendicancy, was not merely to obtain separate Bills, but to afford time for a full observation of the operation of the Poor Law in Ireland, before any attempt should be made directly to suppress mendicancy. I must say, that I think it would be very premature legislation to pass any law on this subject at present; inasmuch as, so far as I have yet been able to judge, the introduction of the Poor Law into Ireland appears to have worked well. I have always been opposed to the Poor Law being mixed up with a measure of this description; but, hearing that it is not the Noble Lord's intention to press the Bill forward at present, I shall not oppose its introduction, in the hope, and on the understanding, that he will give the people of Ireland ample time for its consideration.

Mr. LYNCH. — I have much pleasure in supporting the motion for the introduction of this Bill. It is impossible that there can exist, at the same time, two sorts of relief in Ireland; one, in-door relief, according to law, and the other, out-door relief, according to the established custom of the country. Yet such will be the case, unless some such measure as this be passed.

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL. — I consider, Sir, that the great objection to the Irish Poor Law is, that, while it takes away what has been truly described by the Honourable and Learned Member for Galway as "out-door relief, according to the custom of the country," it does not substitute "out-door relief, according to law." The object of postponing the question before the House has been to afford time for observing the operation of the Poor Law in Ireland; and yet three weeks have scarcely elapsed since the establishment of the first union workhouse in that country, and this Bill is already introduced. With so short an experience of the operation of that law, this Bill, I must say, is very prematurely brought forward. It would be much better to let the present system continue in operation a year longer, before introducing such a measure as this.

Question put, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill for the suppression of mendicancy in Ireland," and agreed to; Bill ordered to be brought in by Lord Viscount Morpeth and Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.

CORN LAWS.

The EARL of ROSEBERY. — My Lords, I hold in my hand a petition of a very important nature. It is signed very numerously by the bankers, merchants, and other inhabitants of Stirling, and prays for the immediate and total repeal of the corn laws. To those petitioners I owe a deep debt of gratitude for the confidence they have reposed, for a long period, in a near relative of mine. They state, as a reason for their prayer, that, at the present time, the baneful influence of the corn laws is exercising itself with peculiar severity on the middle classes; that it injures the bankers by the frequent derangement of the currency; presses on the dealer by the excessive rates of interest it causes; annihilates private capital, and reduces the artisan and the labourer to the condition of the pauper. They state, further, that these laws, if not abolished, will banish manufactures, and throw the population wholly on the soil for support. My Lords, I need not say that I do not concur in the prayer of the petition; in fact, it is my opinion, that, if it were complied with, that compliance would be very injurious to the interests of the country at large. I believe that the benefits to be derived from a repeal of the corn laws have been most grossly exaggerated by the promoters of the agitation on this subject.

My Lords, differing, as I do, from the petitioners on this subject, I think I should be wanting in respect for and gratitude to them, were I not briefly to state what, in my opinion, would be the best method of dealing with this much agitated question of the corn laws. Without disturbing the principle of the present Corn Law, which I should be sorry to see disturbed, I think a remedy might be applied which would satisfy the just wishes of all parties. I would humbly submit to your Lordships the propriety of preserving the principle of the law; but, at the same time, lowering the scale of duty. Such a proceeding would effect great good, without much deranging the great interests which would suffer by total repeal. The scale I would recommend would be that proposed by Mr. Canning, in his Bill of 1827, which was passed by the other House of Parliament, and also by this, on the second reading, but lost in Committee, not on a question of principle, but on one of detail. I would beg your Lordships to consider what would be the difference in price effected by such a scale, and that effected by the scale proposed and carried by the Noble Duke opposite in 1828. The difference would be as much as that between ten shillings and twenty-one shillings. The present state of the corn trade is such as to require some remedy. At one time, we have no trade, and at another we have the most extensive and ruinous speculation, attended by every species of gambling. I do think we should endeavour to get rid of that evil by lowering the duty, which would make the trade more steady and constant. I have only further to say, that the scale which I have recommended, and which was proposed by Mr. Canning, was stated, at the time, by that Minister, to have been proposed at the suggestion of Lord Liverpool. I have to beg pardon of your Lordships for troubling the House at such length, and to conclude by moving "that this petition be laid on your Lordships' table."

LORD ASHBURTON. — I can assure your Lordships that I have no wish to provoke a discussion on the presentation of a petition; but the question is one of so much importance that I cannot refrain from saying a word or two upon it. Although I am aware that nothing could be more inconvenient than to draw your Lordships, at the present moment, into any discussion on the corn laws, yet I cannot allow to pass in silence what seems to be the Noble Earl's conclusion, — namely, that great evil has accrued to the country from the operation of the present corn laws. Although it is true that, originally, I was not very favourable to the corn laws, yet I think I shall be able to show that it would be impossible to find any artificial system — for all systems of protection must be artificial — which has worked better than the present system. During the last ten years, there has been less fluctuation in the supply in this country than in any part of the world; and, when persons talk of fluctuations, they ought to remember that food is an article which is naturally liable to great fluctuations. It is a matter of surprise to me that the fluctuations have not been greater. This year, after an importation to the value of 6,000,000*l.* or 7,000,000*l.*, the price does not exceed 67*s.*; and it should be remembered that the expectation of the framers of the present law was to obtain for our home growers a maximum price of 60*s.* Let us look, on the other hand, to what has happened during the same period in France. Why, there have been bread insurrections in various parts of that country; and, even in the great corn countries on the line of the Ukraine, there have been fearful famines during the last two years. And still, with all these facts before them, the anti-corn law agitators attribute the fluctuations of our prices to the present system of corn laws! It is a fallacy to assert that the corn laws have caused the difficulties in the circulation of the country during the past year: and those who are acting upon the cry of "Agitate, agitate!" — amongst whom are some very clever men — must know that many of the assertions they make upon this subject are pure fallacies. But they must have something or other to "agitate" with. Last year, the Post Office reform was their instrument, and now they are beginning to work upon the corn laws. I believe that, when this question comes to be fairly discussed, — not in public meetings or great towns, where people are easily excited and congregated together, but in the deliberative assemblies of Parliament, — it will be clear that the complaints against the present corn laws are utterly groundless.

SALE OF BEER (No. 2.) BILL.

On the motion of Mr. PAKINGTON, second reading deferred from Wednesday next till Thursday next,

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. ORD reported, from the General Committee of Elections, that the petitioners admitted parties to defend the return, in the case of the Ludlow election, had served a notice on the chairman of the Committee, that they do not intend to put in any list of votes objected to by them, inasmuch as the said petitioners are advised that the proceedings in regard to the Ludlow election petitions have not been regular, and according to the special provisions of the Act 2 & 3 Vic. c. 38., intituled, "An Act to amend the Jurisdiction for the Trial of Election Petitions:" and that the said petitioners protest against the choice of any Committee to try the said petitions, until such Committee can legally and properly be constituted a tribunal, for perjury committed before which an indictment could be maintained at law.

Upon the question being put, "That this Report do lie on the table,"—

Mr. AGLIONBY said:—I do not intend to object to this Report being laid upon the table; still I think it should be considered what effect the arguments contained in it may have on future cases. If the House be satisfied that the tribunal is properly constituted, there is an end of the question; but, having some doubts upon the subject myself, I think the arguments deserve consideration.

The motion was then agreed to, and the Report ordered to lie on the table.

PRINTED PAPERS BILL.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I beg now, Sir, to move the Order of the Day for the third reading of the Printed Papers Bill.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — Before that question be put, I wish to present a petition from John Joseph Stockdale, now a prisoner in the gaol of Newgate, and praying that Mr. Howard, his son, and his clerk, may be released from prison, and that the petitioner himself may be heard at the bar before any Bill affecting his interest shall pass the House.

The petition was then brought up, and read by the clerk at the table.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — It appears to me that this petition is one that cannot properly be received, inasmuch as, in its terms, it conveys a direct insult to the House. I would therefore submit to the Honourable Member the propriety of withdrawing it.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — We have not yet been told what is the passage which, in the Noble Lord's opinion, is disrespectful to the House. I cannot consent to withdraw the petition until I know what the objection is. I consider myself, in some degree, responsible for the language of all petitions presented by me; and I have, therefore, carefully read over the one I have now offered; and, beyond there being a great number of quotations from Scripture in it, I could not discover that it contained anything objectionable, or disrespectful to the House. I think, too, that the prayer of the petition, namely, that Mr. Stockdale may be heard at the bar of the House against a Bill, which certainly is a Bill of pains and penalties as against him, is a very proper one, and ought to be granted. The House ought also to remember, that of all the persons who have been committed, Mr. Stockdale is the only one who has not had an opportunity of apologising or explaining his conduct.

Upon the question being put, "That the petition do lie on the table,"—

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK said:—I hope the Honourable Member for Finsbury will not press this petition; if he do, I shall feel myself under the necessity of moving that it be rejected.

Mr. HUME. — Before we come to any such determination, we ought to know what the objectionable passages are. Unfortunately, where I sit, we have not been able to hear one word of it. I think, in common fairness, the passages objected to ought to be stated.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — The petition was read in an audible tone by the clerk at the table; and had Honourable Members preserved silence, the Honourable Member for Kilkenny might have heard it.

SIR E. B. SUGDEN. — There was a great deal of noise in the House while the petition was being read. I believe I understand the substance of the petition; but I did not catch any objectionable expression in it. I think it ought to be read again.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — The Honourable Member for Finsbury has told us that he has himself read the petition carefully over, and that it does not contain anything of an objectionable nature. Surely the word of the Honourable Member ought to be sufficient.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — No, no! Read!

The petition was then again read by the clerk at the table.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — This is the person who has been committed for a contempt and a breach of the privileges of the House; and he now again approaches the House under the guise of a petitioner, to declare, at length, that the detention he is enduring is illegal, and that the displeasure of the House, to which he is exposed, is groundless. This person, also, in many more words, refers, in his petition, to the act of the under sheriff, in presenting a petition, in regular and decorous terms, stating that he was ready to comply with the orders of the House; and, in no measured terms, charges him with having been guilty of a grave offence, — an offence, which he compares to those crimes which were sometimes perpetrated when the laws of the land were held in little or no respect, and were not sufficiently stringent to afford protection to individuals. The whole tenour of the petition is one of defiance to the House, under the guise of a petition; and therefore I, for one, cannot vote that it do lie on the table.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I think that the precise passages to which the objection is taken should be stated. I have heard the petition read, and I cannot say that I have discovered anything in the wording of it which ought to be considered as disrespectful, or offering insult, to the House. The Noble Lord has not told us the particular part of the petition which he considers as having a tendency to offer insult to the House. Perhaps his Honourable and Learned Friend beside him (the Attorney General) may infer, from certain inuendos in the latter part of the petition, that insult was intended, inasmuch as the quotations from Scripture may, or may not, be interpreted as applying to the House; but, with that exception, I have heard nothing in the petition that ought to be considered as reflecting upon the House.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!" and, "Hear, hear!"]

I apprehend, from those cheers, that it is assumed, as a matter of course, that those quotations were intended as an insult to the House.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

For my own part, I was struck with the very temperate tone of the petition. One of the phrases which appears to be complained of is that in which the petitioner states, "that his liberty has been erroneously invaded;" but, in my opinion, a milder phrase, for a person who is incarcerated in Her Majesty's gaol of Newgate, is not to be found in any similar document. If any person has reason to complain of the petition, it is the sheriff; for his conduct is condemned in plain terms, without any inuendos; he is accused "of having unconstitutionally acted in the matters of this petitioner." I think, before the House decide upon agreeing, either to the motion of the Noble Lord who has proposed to meet the motion, that the petition do lie on the table, with a direct negative, or to the proposition of the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland, to reject the petition altogether, they should regard, with some leniency, the feelings of a man who considers himself to be unjustly confined by their order. I would ask Honourable Members — if it be not too great a condescension on their part — to put themselves, for a moment, in the position of the person now interested. That person has been incarcerated for seeking compensation for a wrong which, in the opinion of a jury of his country, he has received, — a judgment, too, which the House themselves invoked. Surely, then, when a person is confined, under such circumstances, it is too much to analyse too strictly the terms of the petition in which he does not ask you to release him, nor to rescind the resolutions you have passed; but merely to allow him to be heard at your bar, in his own defence. The petitioner further states that Mr. Howard, his attorney, complied most reluctantly with his earnest and repeated entreaties to bring the last action, and that he actually wrote a letter to Stockdale, declining to have anything further to do with the proceeding. The House has, then, deprived the petitioner of the benefit of legal assistance and advice; and, under those circumstances, he asks you, in his petition, to allow him to appear at the bar of the House, and to state his own case. And I ask the House, are they prepared, not only to refuse that very reasonable request, but even to allow the petition to lie on the table? Under these circumstances, I trust the Noble Lord will see the propriety of withdrawing his opposition; if not, I shall certainly, for one, divide with the Honourable Member for Finsbury.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — In my opinion, it is impossible for any one to hear the petition read, and not perceive that it conveys a deliberate insult to the House. The petitioner talks of his illegal detention, and describes the other persons who are confined by the orders of the House as his outraged and afflicted fellow-subjects.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

That may be the feeling of Honourable Members on the other side, ——

[Renewed cries of "Hear, hear!"]

but it is not that of the great majority of this House;

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

nor is the language of the petition that which will induce that majority to allow it to lie on the table. Looking at what has been the former practice of the House, in reference to petitions, I hold that this is a petition that cannot be received. I shall therefore move, as an amendment to the motion, to leave out the words, "do lie on the table," in order to add the words "be rejected," instead thereof.

SIR G. STRICKLAND. — Although I joined the Noble Lord, and majority of the House, in supporting our privileges, I cannot consider that, in this instance, we shall be doing justice to the petitioner if we reject his petition. With regard to the reception of petitions, the House has passed certain resolutions for the regulation of that part of its business: — first, that the petition shall be respectfully worded; and, secondly, that the prayer of it shall be such as the House can grant. Now, with regard to the first, I think no one can doubt that this petition is respectfully worded; and the prayer with which it concludes, namely, that the petitioner may be heard at the bar of the House, is quite in accordance with the rules and customs of the House. Then, the only thing, in regard to this petition, that can be considered disrespectful to the House, is, that Stockdale has had the bad taste to interlard his petition with certain quotations from Scripture, which, if you put a particular construction upon them, may be considered as disrespectful to the House. But I think I am bound to show some compassion towards a man who, like Stockdale, is suffering confinement by the orders of the House; and I think we ought to extend the utmost possible indulgence to any subject who comes before us, under such circumstances. It is on these grounds that I shall, if the question go to a division, vote against the Noble Lord.

MR. HUME. — I have supported the Noble Lord throughout the whole of his struggle in defence of the privileges of the House; but as he has himself brought in a Bill by which he declares all our proceedings in this matter illegal ——

[Cries of "No, no!"]

That is all the difference between me and the Noble Lord. The Noble Lord says that he requires a new law, and, consequently, he has hitherto been acting without any law.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

The Noble Lord has abandoned the high ground upon which he started in this matter; and he has thought it necessary to bring in a Bill to protect our privilege. How, then, is it possible that we can object to receive this petition, which merely, in words, reiterates that which the Noble Lord has, in act, admitted,— that the petitioner has been illegally imprisoned?

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

MR. GREENE. — I, for one, certainly object to the reception of this petition, on the ground that this House ought on no occasion to encourage such an irreverent use of the Scriptures as is made in the quotations that have been referred to.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I am sorry that the Noble Lord has placed the House in this state of embarrassment. It cannot be denied that these actions have been vexatiously brought by Stockdale; but the House ought not to be very delicate in reviewing the terms of the petitions of this nature, for Stockdale has the law on his side, —that is, he has the statute law,—although the House considers their law superior. I think, the petition is drawn in an improper manner, and evinces bad taste and bad feeling. But it is hardly to be wondered at, that Stockdale should address the House without very much care in his expressions, when we consider that we are about to deprive him, by the Bill now before us, of what he conceives to be his right as a British subject, — that is, we are about, by that Bill, to put a speedy end to these actions, which, by law, can now be brought. Surely, under such circumstances, it is not unreasonable that Stockdale should ask to be heard at the bar in his own defence. If you proceed with the Bill, and reject this petition, you deprive Stockdale of his only remedy. I must not be understood as defending the language in which this petition is couched, or the spirit which evidently pervades it; but, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, I feel that I am bound, in common justice, to vote against the Noble Lord.

Mr. JAMES. — For one, I cannot understand how any one can doubt for a moment that this petition is intended as a deliberate insult to the House. I shall certainly vote against its being received.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — If the Noble Lord will consent to postpone the third reading of the Bill, I shall be willing to withdraw the petition, in order to have the objectionable passages expunged.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

SIR R. PEEL. — The object of this petition is, that Mr. Stockdale may be heard at the bar, against the third reading of this Bill. Now, I am always very reluctant to object to a petition upon anything like captious grounds. I consider that we ought not to seek for a pretence to reject petitions; but, at the same time, I think, when an intentional and deliberate insult is offered, in the form of a petition, to any authority, it becomes the duty of that authority to refuse such a petition, not so much on the ground of its own feelings of offended dignity, as for the purpose of defending the sacred right of petition, which ought not to be prostituted either to gratify mere personal feelings, or for the purpose of offering insult. The question, then, must resolve itself into this, — is there, in this instance, a deliberate insult offered to the House? I think there is. A petition may be firm, and, at the same time, decently respectful; but I cannot understand what other object the petitioner could have in quoting, as he has done, from a volume which was written by him in 1827, and published in 1831, in which he states that the laws of England never authorised or contemplated revenge, and that, when they are brought into operation for such a purpose, they evince weakness, or some baser motive. When I see that passage thus quoted, and am asked, what is the motive of him who quotes it, I cannot for a moment hesitate in saying, that it is to go as near as possible to offer a deliberate insult to the House. And as to the quotations from the Scriptures, I think the practice of introducing such quotations in such documents is in every way most objectionable; and I believe, in the present case, they also have been introduced with the view of offering insult to the House. If, therefore, I am to decide on the intention of this petition, I cannot say but I think there is an evident intention to insult; and I hold that no petitioner has a right to use any terms that can approach to an insult to the authority to whom the petition may be addressed. Then, it is difficult to exercise a discretion in this matter, inasmuch as the petition was not offered at a time when the question might have been fairly discussed, but has been reserved for the last day, so that the petitioner may have the opportunity of saying, "I tender my petition, and leave it to you to say whether you will reject it." But there is also another ground for rejecting this petition. By a large majority, we have determined that we are in possession of this privilege. We have committed the sheriffs for not respecting it; one of the under sheriffs has shown a disposition to defer to the authority of the House; and even those who differ from the majority of the House on the question of the privilege, still give credit to the sheriff for having done everything in his power to conform to the authority of the House. The under sheriff presented a petition to the House; and this is the way in which the petitioner speaks of him, in reference to that act. He says, — "Your petitioner has been informed that a petition has been presented from the sheriff, &c., in which he unconstitutionally offers to delay the administration of justice, as the price of indemnity and protection from the House." I consider that the House of Commons, in maintaining the right of petition, is bound also to require that the petitions presented to them, however firm and plain-spoken they may be, shall be couched in respectful language; and, as the petition now before the House is not, in my opinion, respectfully worded, I shall vote for its rejection.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question."

Words added; main question, as amended, put, and agreed to; petition rejected.

On the question, "That the Bill do pass,"—

SIR R. INGLIS said: — It is now my duty to move the insertion of the following clause: — "And be it further enacted, that it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons who hereafter shall be a defendant or defendants in any civil or criminal proceeding commenced or prosecuted for the publication of any such Report, Paper, Votes, or Proceedings, in any newspaper published according to the direction of an Act passed in the seventh year of the reign of His late Majesty King William the Fourth, chapter 76., intituled, 'An Act to reduce the Duties on Newspapers, and to amend the Laws relating to the Duties on Newspapers and Advertisements,' to apply, as aforesaid, for a certificate, stating that the Report, Paper, Votes, or Proceedings forming the ground of such civil or criminal proceeding, was published by order or under the authority of the House of Lords, or of the House of Commons (as the case may be); and which certificate is hereby authorised to be granted upon such application; and having obtained the same, to apply to any judge of Her Majesty's superior courts of common law, at chambers or elsewhere, upon an affidavit verifying such certificate; and further deposing that such publication in such newspaper was a true transcript or copy of such Report, Paper, Votes, or Proceedings; and thereupon it shall and may be lawful for such judge, upon due summons and notice, to stay such civil or criminal proceeding, upon such terms as to such judge shall seem fit." The principle on which this Bill is founded is, that it is essential to the discharge of our legislative functions, that publicity should be given to our proceedings; and therefore, in carrying out that principle, we should give protection to the newspapers publishing extracts or copies of our papers. If this Bill pass without some provision of the kind I am now proposing, the proprietors of newspapers will be worse off afterwards than they are now; as all the vengeance of parties inspired by the publication of these proceedings of the House will be directed against them for reprinting them, the actions against the officers of the House being stopped. The printers of newspapers, therefore (two of whom have petitioned the House on the subject), ask us not to alter the law as it at present stands, unless we extend its protective operation to them, as well as the servants of the House. I have limited the operation of the clause to the publishers of newspapers, on these grounds; first, that they pay a heavy tax upon the commodity in which they trade; and, secondly, that, by the showing of the advocates of this privilege, their object is to promote the publicity of our Reports; and I would ask whether it does not appear, by the Returns on the table, that these Reports which are reprinted by the newspapers have a circulation ten times as great as others? On these grounds, I think I am justified in asking, on behalf of newspaper proprietors, for the insertion of this clause; first, because the Bill will expose them to greater risk than they are at present subject to; secondly, because your great object of publicity is effected by them; and, thirdly, because they pay specifically for your protection. I do not know what objection may be made to this clause; perhaps it may be objected that it would be an act of undue condescension to require of the Speaker, or the Lord Chancellor,—being the Speaker of the House of Lords,—to give a certificate of this kind, in accordance with the prayers of an indifferent party. But I think this objection ought not to hold; as I can see no difference between the position of the two parties, except that the one is fulfilling the intention of the House, under its authority, and the other without it. I can see many reasons against this Bill; but I can see few or none against the insertion of this clause, if it pass. I would remind the House of a case of hardship which occurred to the printer of one of the morning papers — the Times — only last year, and which would be prevented from repetition by this clause. That was an action brought against them by Polack, for having republished an alleged libel from a printed Report of the House of Lords. My Right Honourable Friend near me, on that occasion, when this subject was brought before the House, said that the object of the appointment of the Committee of the House of Lords was, not that they should report to that House, but to the country at large; and of what consequence was it that the plaintiff did not bring his action against the printer of the House of Lords, but only against the printer of the Times? It has been said that the action was not for the reprint, but for the comments of the editor of the newspaper. I have read the Reports of August last, referring to this subject, and I recollect nothing of any distinction of this kind being drawn. But the case of "The King v. Wright," at any rate, was for a reprint, and not for any comment; and therefore that is a case in point. I am not aware that the object of the clause requires any more comment. I will merely repeat, that its effect will be to authorise you, Sir, to give a certificate that the extract published by the newspaper is a faithful transcript from the Blue Book. Then, in case of an action, that certificate shall authorise the judge to stay proceedings, except in cases where special circumstances may induce him to act otherwise. I insert the discretionary power merely to meet the possible contingency of a case in which protection would be an injustice. I beg, therefore, that I may be now permitted to bring up the clause.

On the question being put, —

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said:— I rise for the purpose of opposing this clause. At the same time, I cannot help saying that I rejoice extremely to find the Honourable Baronet expanding so much in his ideas of the necessity of publishing our proceedings. I hope that all stamped newspapers will republish our Reports; and not only that, but that they will be given to the public in another form. I do not allude to the unstamped and illegal press, but to the various channels through which information is properly and beneficially conveyed to the country. I feel it, however, my duty to oppose the clause of the Honourable Baronet, because it would be prejudicial, if not fatal, to the Bill. We are not now reviewing the law of libel. I hope the time will come that when any action, civil or criminal, is brought, it will be a sufficient answer to say that the allegation complained of was true. We are now, however, providing a particular remedy for a particular grievance. Now, what is the grievance? That an action has been brought against our printers for papers published by the authority of the House. The remedy does not go further than providing for this grievance. The Honourable Baronet is mistaken in supposing that the action of Polack against the Times newspaper was for a Report. It was for extracts from a Report, and for editorial comments on those extracts. But the Honourable Baronet supposes that newspapers will be in a worse condition after this Bill passes. There is not the slightest ground for such a suspicion, when this Bill begins by stating that the publication of our proceedings is essential to the public information, and that no proceedings can be instituted from them against the printers or officers of the House. This Act and the decision of " The King v. Wright " will effectually relieve any newspaper from the apprehension of an action for republishing a Report of either House of Parliament. Then, as to the certificate of the Speaker; suppose an action were brought against the Times, Morning Chronicle, or Morning Post, for extracts of our Reports, with editorial comments, how could you, Sir, grant a certificate? You would read the whole paper over, you would be obliged to go into an investigation as to the intention of the parties in printing some part of the Report in italics, or omitting some portion of it? But then the Honourable Baronet next suggested that this question should be left to the judge. Such an anomalous proceeding is wholly unknown to the law of England. It would be investing the judge with the functions of a jury, and would produce great confusion. It seems to me, that, by adding the clause, we should be defeating the object which the House has in view in passing the Bill.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — The clause proposed by my Honourable Friend will protect not only the printers of newspapers, but booksellers. It seldom answers the purpose of a newspaper to give more than a faithful abstract of a Report; and all such should be protected. But I withdrew my clause, because I did not see how it could work with the machinery of the present Bill. I do hope, therefore, that my Honourable Friend will withdraw his motion, and introduce a Bill for the purpose, as the machinery of the present Bill must be affected by any clause of the kind.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I trust that the House, whether it accept or reject the clause, will pardon me while I state that I have been entirely misapprehended as to my object. I did not mean to give you, Sir, in addition to your numerous labours, the trouble of comparing, word for word, all copies of our Reports. I merely wish that you should certify that a certain Blue Book was published by order of the House; and then the proprietor of the newspaper could prove in court that his publication was a faithful copy of that Report. However, as I see the feeling of the House is against me, I will not put it to the trouble of another division.

Question, " That the said clause be brought up," put, and negatived.

On Clause 3. being proposed, —

SIR E. SUGDEN said: — I move the omission of this clause, on the ground which I formerly stated, that though the warrant of the Speaker might be legal, it might be shown there was an excess in executing it.

The SPEAKER. — I would submit to the Right Honourable Member that if he omit this clause, it will be necessary to move the omission of that part of the preamble which has reference to it.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — Then, Sir, I move that so much of the preamble be omitted as has reference to the clause. The words I would omit are — " And whereas an action hath been brought, and is now depending, against certain persons employed in the execution of a warrant granted and issued by the Speaker of the House of Commons, during the present Session of Parliament, for taking into custody the person therein named, and it is expedient that such action should be put an end to, and that no other action should be allowed to be brought or prosecuted in respect of the execution of any such warrant which has been so granted or issued by the said Speaker as aforesaid, during the present Session of Parliament."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I think it better the clause should pass, in order to get rid of the numerous actions which are now pending.

LORD HOWICK. — I have the same objection to this clause that I have to the Bill itself; that it tends to throw a doubt on our power to defend our privileges. It is very true it gets rid of the Howard action; but the moment the Bill passes, Mr. Pearce, or Mr. Howard, jun., may bring similar actions. At all events, it does not at all apply to persons who may hereafter be found guilty of a contempt. I shall, under this conviction, vote with the Right Honourable Member for Ripon.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — If this clause pass, it will dispose of all actions down to the very day the Bill receives the Royal assent. That will be a great public advantage; and it will be gained without, in the slightest degree, impairing the power of the House in future. I should therefore prefer, although it is not essential to the Bill, that the clause should stand.

Mr. DARBY. — How are we to get rid of the actions which may be brought after this Bill has received the Royal assent? If we allow them to be proceeded with, it will be a tacit condemnation of our present conduct. According to the statement of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, the same reasons which now exist for the clause may again arise. If you mean to stop actions, act with courage, and stop them altogether. As this clause will not have that effect, and is, therefore, in my opinion useless, I shall vote with my Right Honourable Friend.

Mr. GORING. — Notwithstanding the eloquence of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite, I cannot be convinced that this clause should pass. The object of this Bill is, to give protection to whatever we may see fit to publish, — a protection which we ought not to possess, except our Reports were, previous to publication, subjected to a rigorous supervision. However, I shall not trouble the House at greater length, as I feel convinced the Bill will be rejected elsewhere.

SIR R. PEEL. — In my opinion, the speech of the Honourable Member should rather have been made on the second reading, as the question now is, merely as to the insertion of the third clause. I confess, that I fear very much that the effect of this clause will be to weaken our power in case of future actions. The Bill itself does not weaken, or even touch, our privilege; it merely gives us a more effectual means of exercising it. However, while I feel the force of this objection, I think that, in the present excited state of the public mind, an advantage will be gained by getting rid of all the actions arising out of the Stockdale case. And as the Attorney General has expressed a strong opinion in favour of the clause, I am inclined to vote for it, although of its propriety I have considerable doubt.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — For some time I thought my Right Honourable Friend intended to vote with the Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon, and that, for once, I should have the honour of voting with him on this question. I oppose this clause, because I believe that there is no warrant of any court in the empire, which, in its execution, may not involve a violation of the law. The question is — not whether the Speaker may issue his warrant, but — whether the officer, in executing that warrant, may violate the law with impunity? Holding these opinions, I shall vote with my Right Honourable and Learned Friend for the rejection of the clause.

Mr. HOBHOUSE. — In my opinion, the clause is open to all the objections to which the Bill itself is liable. Any special clause will, I conceive, weaken the protection at present enjoyed by the Sergeant-at-Arms. Let us suppose, for instance, the case of a Member of this House illegally arrested. In that case the Sergeant-at-Arms would commit the sheriff, who would immediately take his action for false imprisonment. There is nothing in the Bill to prevent that. On hese grounds, seeing that a special proection would only provide for a particular ase, while it would weaken our power generally, I think that the clause should be expunged.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN. — I beg to state that I have voted for the Bill under the impression that the Noble Lord is prepared to consider how the gratuitous and unnecessary publication of libels, in the publications of this House, shall be guarded against. I will not oppose the third reading of the Bill; but if it should go forth as law, whilst the rules remain as they are, the House will be thought guilty of neglecting the public interests by protecting its own privileges, without giving the necessary protection to individuals against being libelled. Under the impression, however, that the Noble Lord will address himself to the necessary means for preventing unnecessary libels being published in the parliamentary papers, I will not oppose the passing of the Bill.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — I can assure my Right Honourable and Learned Friend that every regulation of the kind which will not have the effect of cramping the privileges of this House, will be supported by the Government. I do not, however, believe that any material injury has been done to private character by the publications of the House.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I will not occupy the attention of the House further than to say that the opinions I at first entertained against the Bill remain quite as strong as when I originally expressed them.

Mr. DARBY. — Although I think the security provided by the Bill should be permanent, I shall not oppose it in its present advanced stage.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I beg to say that I will not consent to any proceeding respecting our papers which shall not come from a Committee.

Bill passed.

On the motion of the ATTORNEY GENERAL, addition made to the title of the Bill to the following effect: — "And to any persons employed in the execution of certain warrants granted by the Speaker of the House of Commons during the Session of Parliament."

SUPPLY. — ORDNANCE ESTIMATES.

On the question, "That the House do resolve itself into a Committee of Supply," —

An HONOURABLE MEMBER said:—May I inquire from the Honourable Secretary of the Treasury, whether there is any intention of increasing the steam force in the Mediterranean?

Mr. MORE O'FERRALL. — The subject is under consideration.

MILITARY ACADEMY AT WOOLWICH.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — Sir, I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the Right Honourable the Master General of the Ordnance to statements that have appeared in certain military periodicals; — statements intended to injure the character of the distinguished officer who presides over the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich. The statements to which I allude, in accounting for the frightful state of disorganisation lately exhibited in that establishment, give, as one reason for it, that the academy has been, since the accession of the present Master General of the Ordnance, made an arena for political jobs; that, in fact, the irregularity has been caused by the introduction of youth whose parents possess political influence, to the exclusion of the sons of old and meritorious officers. The periodicals I have mentioned beg to know the number of cadets, the sons of civilians, from Devonshire and Cornwall, who have lately been admitted: they ask, what has been their conduct since admission? and then they charge, that these admissions have been made subservient to electioneering purposes. These charges are made in influential periodicals, having great circulation in military circles; but, for myself, I can sincerely state that I believe them to be unfounded; and I am content merely to call the attention of the Right Honourable and Gallant Officer to them. But I wish to say a few words with respect to the discipline of that establishment. During the last nine or twelve months, it has been found necessary to remove no less than seventeen or eighteen cadets from the academy. Now, from my experience of that establishment, I should have thought it would have required as many years to have disposed of such a number. It is necessary, therefore, that some explanation should be offered of the fact of the system of discipline being so much relaxed as to require such wholesale dismissals. I know that some of these cadets have been discharged on account of idleness, or want of ability but the larger number, I believe, have been expelled for breaches of military discipline. I am quite aware that there are various grades of crime recognised in that establishment, and various degrees of punishment provided. For instance, if it be thought expedient that a youth should be removed, the Master General of the Ordnance writes to his parents, stating his offence, and that it is desirable that they should take him away. This, of course, is very distressing to the parents; but how much worse is the punishment given in these late cases,—that of peremptory dismissal. The House will bear in mind that, by expulsion from the academy, all the prospects of the youth are blighted; he is rendered incapable of serving in the army or navy, and incompetent to fill any office under the Government; and I trust that we shall hear from the Master General of the Ordnance that no cadet has been expelled unless some decided moral taint has attached to his character and conduct.

I will not bring forward individual cases, nor will I mention names, but I will advert to the fact of one of the charges brought against three of the youths; which was, that, with a view of trying the courage of one of their comrades, they got up a sham duel, with pistols loaded with powder, and a sponge saturated with blood. The boy who, on that occasion, was the subject of their frolic, gave such decided proofs of courage, that he has been the favourite of the school ever since. I believe that some slight accident did occur on that occasion; and I do not mean to say that boys should not be punished for such as absurd and improper frolic; but, at the same time, I trust that expulsion was not visited on these young men on that account alone; as, in my opinion, a much less punishment would have been sufficient to satisfy the ends of justice.

In my opinion, the reason for the greater relaxation of discipline witnessed now, as compared with former years, is, that, whereas, in former times, the age for admission was from fourteen to sixteen years of age, it is at present from fifteen to seventeen. Now, I am very much inclined to think that the sooner a boy enters the academy the better; and if the system of admitting from fourteen to sixteen worked well, why alter it? The artillery and engineer corps were supplied, during the ast war, with officers entirely from Woolwich; and there is not an instance n the history of that war of a fort having successfully resisted the efforts of those officers; nor did they, in a single instance, display any want of zeal, talent, or courage. That was the system which carried us through the whole Peninsular war; and I fear that it is by having altered the age of admission that we have shaken the discipline of this great national establishment.

There is another defect in the system, o which I would allude, which is, that a youth is not permanently inrolled until he has gone through twelve months' probation. I think that this probationary year induces many a youth to leave the academy, having imbibed a distaste for military restraint; whereas, if he were nrolled at once, he would soon become econciled to it, as inevitable. I take the iberty of making these suggestions, beause I have been at the academy myself, nd know the working of it; and I would onfidently promise the Gallant General opposite, that the discipline of the academy will not suffer, if he will exercise his prerogative, by restoring these youths, whose conduct, however imprudent, has een free from any immoral or dishonourng taint. Let him consider what sorrow as been inflicted on the respectable portion of the community of which the conections of these young men form a part, y their disgraceful expulsion from the cademy, and the blighting of all their uture hopes. Let the Gallant General ive them an opportunity of recovering is good opinion; and let us hope that the unishment they have received will be ufficient to make them assiduous stuents; so that, at no distant day, they may ecome an honour to the profession for hich they are intended; and I trust that he Gallant General will live long enough to see that his confidence has not been misplaced. Sir, I take up this subject rather warmly, because I commenced my own military career in the academy at Woolwich; I imbibed my first impressions, and formed many friendships there. I make these observations out of no feelings of opposition to Her Majesty's Government; but, in the name of the parents of the youths, I do hope that the punishments they have already suffered will be considered sufficient, and that the Gallant General will see fit to reinstate them, and thus restore peace to the minds of those parents who now have to grieve for the prospects of their children blighted, and their characters disgraced.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN.— Sir, I am not at all surprised at the anxiety evinced by the Honourable and Gallant Officer opposite on behalf of the institution to which he has alluded. This House, perhaps, is not the proper arena in which the discipline of the academy should be discussed; but, at the same time, I am unfeignedly obliged to my Honourable and Gallant Friend for having brought forward the subject, inasmuch as it affords me an opportunity for contradicting the many unfounded, or, as they may be justly called, libellous, statements that have gone forth to the public. With respect to the occurrences that have taken place in the Royal Academy at Woolwich, the facts are simply these:— For a number of years, there had existed at the academy a system called "neuxing," equivalent to what is called "fagging" at public schools; and it was reported to me that, under this system, some of the younger boys had been much oppressed. Last year, when I was engaged in the North of England in the performance of my duties, visiting the various baracks,— then full of troops, in consequence of the disturbed state of the country, — I received information that one of the youths of the academy had been much ill-treated, and the following day a second report reached me that two of the boys had deserted and gone to France. Being unable to be present in person on the spot, and imagining that the desertion of the two youths might also be caused by ill-treatment, I directed a Committee of Inquiry, consisting of five of the most distinguished officers of the corps, to assemble, and directed that the whole matter should be thoroughly investigated, and that the Committee should forward to me a full Report of the circumstances, with the names of the youths who had misconducted themselves. I hold in my hand an abstract of that Report; but, before I read it, I may observe that Lord Bloomfield — a man distinguished alike for his high and honourable character, his integrity, and his humanity — presided over that inquiry. I will not, of course, read the names of those who have been expelled, but I will simply state what were the crimes for which the Committee felt themselves compelled to recommend their removal from the academy. No. 1. was for striking another cadet, for leaving the hospital without orders, and for general insubordination; Nos. 2. and 3. for desertion; No. 4. for abuse of his authority as a corporal. This had been one of the best conducted youths in the establishment; and I have since restored him. No. 5. was for ill-treating another cadet; Nos. 6. and 7. for insulting other cadets, and being engaged in the mock duel that has been alluded to. Now, I will not go into the circumstances attending that duel,—it would not be right in this House; but I think I shall be able to satisfy my Honourable and Gallant Friend that the Committee had no alternative than to act as they did. I have no hesitation in saying that one of the youths concerned in that transaction had been, previously, one of the best conducted in the academy; and nothing gave me more pain than being obliged to expel him. No. 8. was for being concerned in the said mock duel; however, his conduct had been bad before. Nos. 9. 10. and 11. were for ill-treating other cadets; and No. 12. was for repeated insubordination: but of those twelve, one has been restored. Then there was one discharged for a breach of discipline, in keeping company with discharged cadets; another for ill-treating a brother cadet; a third for disobedience; and a fourth for intoxication during the hours of study.

Such were the crimes for which those youths have been discharged; and, notwithstanding the statements to which the Gallant Officer has referred, I can distinctly declare it to be my firm conviction and belief, that nothing has occurred at the academy at Woolwich which has not frequently occurred in other public establishments of the same description, and where youths of the same age are collected together. There was an instance before, in which thirteen cadets were dismissed. These things often happen at our public schools, at our colleges and universities, and at other public institutions, both abroad and at home; and so it ever must, from time to time, be the case, when youths of so mature an age are brought together in considerable numbers. In an establishment of this description, it ever must be a great object to preserve discipline; — that has ever been one of my objects; and I hope that all who know me will do me the justice to believe that it gave me the greatest pain to be obliged to have recourse to such a measure in order to effect it. Much in these unpleasant transactions has arisen from a determination, on the part of the elder students, to resist my determination to put an end to the ill-treatment experienced by the younger students by the system of fagging; and my Honourable Friend will perceive that the dismissal of the greater part has been occasioned by such conduct, on their parts, towards their juniors. Their dismissal was necessary to the discipline of the academy; and I have now the greatest possible satisfaction in stating that, since those transactions, up to the present time, the Report of the state of the academy is, in the highest degree, satisfactory; — one instance only of misconduct is stated to have occurred, and in no instance has there been any ill-treatment of the junior cadets.

Now, respecting the alteration in the time of life, to which the Gallant Officer has adverted, at which youths are to enter, I must first observe that, on looking back to the Reports of the academy, I find that, whilst they were admitted at the age of fourteen, nearly one half never passed up to their commission. At that early age, sufficient time had not been afforded to them to acquire those rudiments of education which were essential to their subsequent success in the military academy. Having found this to be very generally the case, I appointed a Committee, at the head of which was Sir Alexander Dixon, an officer of the highest possible distinction, and to whose name I cannot refer without coupling it with everything that is honourable and good, and the soundness of whose judgment I am sure no one acquainted with his character will question. He it was who concurred with myself and others in deciding that the qualification for admission to the academy should be higher, and that the age of the youths, upon their admission, should not be less than fifteen years. This arrangement has been attended with the most complete success; inasmuch as that, instead of being called upon to discharge a considerable number of youths, upon their probationary examination, during the last two years, I have scarcely been under the painful necessity of discharging one fifth of the number that were formerly discharged at the probationary examinations. The Gallant Member (Captain Boldero) has referred to the statements—the calumnious, the libellous, the utterly false and unfounded statements — that have been made in some publications, with respect to myself, and to the manner in which I have distributed the patronage of the military academy. I have been charged with prostituting it to personal and political purposes; because I reinstated one youth of the name of O'Connell, and another named Maude. In one paper, from which my Gallant Friend read extracts, it is said that I reinstated the one at the dictation of the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin; and, in another paper, it is asserted that the other was permitted to return at the request of two Whig uncles. Now, what are the facts?

First, with respect to Cadet Maude, — he was one of the young gentlemen whom, I have just now stated, I felt it my duty to remove from the academy. I did so with very great regret, for he was a remarkably fine young man, and possessed many qualifications which seemed to fit him admirably for the profession in which he had embarked. But, unfortunately, he deliberately (but, certainly, not with the intention of doing him the injury he did) struck a younger comrade in such a way as to render it necessary that he should be sent to the hospital. When the circumstances under which this offence was committed were made known to me, I immediately ordered that Maude should be removed from the academy. Great interest was made to procure his restoration. Applications poured in from many quarters, which it was most painful to refuse; but I steadily resisted them all. I refused the application, not only of the youth's Whig uncle, Lord Dunally, a friend and a connection, but of his Tory uncle, Lord Hawarden, an old and cherished friend of mine, as well as of the youth's father, also a personal friend. I refused an application from the highest authority in the Government. I refused other applications that were made by other parties; and I did not consent to restore Mr. Maude until after the vacation, when a petition, which I will now read, was presented to me from the cadets of the academy.

> Sir, — On assembling once more to resume our studies at the academy, we are not unmindful of an event which we bitterly lament, and which cast a gloom over our minds at our departure for the vacation.
> We humbly submit to the decision you then made, on the Report of the Court of Inquiry laid before you; and we pledge ourselves, collectively and individually, to use our utmost exertions to put a stop to that system of severity towards the junior members of the establishment which has been so strongly marked by your disapprobation.
> We trust it will not be deemed unbecoming in us to offer our earnest prayer that, considering the general good conduct and character of our late companion, Corporal Maude, and the rapidity with which he had advanced to the highest class in the academy; considering, too, the utter ruin of all his prospects, and the bitter disappointment and grief which his dismissal, at such a moment, must occasion to himself, and to his parents, you will graciously direct a mitigation of his punishment, and restore to his station amongst us one who is universally esteemed by his companions, and who appears to be particularly qualified for the profession he had chosen.
> Your favourable consideration of this our prayer will confer the highest obligation on your most obedient servants.
> We, the undersigned junior members of the Royal Military Academy, do heartily concur in the object of the above petition, and annex our earnest hope and entreaty that it may be favourably considered.

This was signed by every cadet in the academy. I immediately went down to Woolwich, and assembled the whole of them, and told them that, although, in a military point of view, they had acted improperly in addressing me in this manner, I would look over that point — would accept the pledge they had offered me — and would restore the youth in whose favour they had so strongly interested themselves, and whose re-instatement I had refused to the most influential friends. Thus I yielded to the compassion of the young man's comrades all that I had refused to the entreaties of my own personal and political friends; and I did so in the hope that, in the redemption of the pledge given me, I should find a stop put to the ill-treatment of the junior cadets; and for some months I was not disappointed. So much, then, for the motives that have governed me in this instance. The youth named O'Connell is the son of a very distinguished general officer, who, I believe, is a relative of the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin. But I really do not, even at this moment, know whether the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin is aware that the youth, the son of his relative, is a cadet in the Woolwich Academy. General O'Connell is now commanding in Australia; and it was at the earnest request of the father that I placed this youth in the academy. Unfortunately, he was found wanting in his probationary examination, and, in consequence, was ordered to be removed. I hold in my hand a letter which I subsequently received from the young gentleman himself, explaining the cause of his failure, and asking to be permitted to make another trial. It was in these terms: —

> I trust, Sir, you will not feel offended at my > addressing you by letter on this subject, when you consider the utter ruin to my prospects in life that must result from my discharge, and the distress which it must occasion to my father and family, who are now all in New South Wales. I feel confident you will pardon this appeal on the part of the son of an old and distinguished general officer who throws himself on your kindness, your good nature, and your mercy.

After the receipt of the letter, I inquired again into the case, and found that the young man's failure had, in a degree, been owing to the want of a proper education previous to his being admitted to the academy. I therefore consented to restore him; and, in so doing, I feel confident that no Honourable Member who now hears me will consider that I have justly exposed myself to the charges that have been brought against me in the calumnious publication I now hold in my hand, and to which the Gallant Member (Captain Boldero) has referred, and from which he has quoted. Having thus explained the state of the academy, and the circumstances that have recently occurred there, I shall now feel it necessary to trouble the House with a very few observations in reference to the other charges that have been made against me in some of these newspapers referred to; and from which extracts have been read by the Honourable and Gallant Gentleman by whom this subject was introduced. I should not feel justified in troubling the House, were it not that my conduct is of some importance to my friends around me; as, were it such as it is here represented, I should be unworthy to hold a place in any Government. The first to which I beg to refer is in these terms—it is from the United Service Gazette.

> We continue to receive numerous communications on the subject of the Royal Military College at Woolwich, in which various reasons are assigned for the frightful state of disorganisation to which that establishment has recently been reduced. Whatever the causes may be, it is high time they were ascertained, and some powerful remedial measure applied. The primary one we believe to be, that the establishment has been made an arena for political jobs; that youths have been introduced into the academy, having no claim whatever to the privilege, at the expense of the children of old and highly meritorious officers in the Royal Artillery and Engineers, who have no political influence wherewith to back their applications to the Master General. We should like to know how many of the children of civilians, and of Devonshire and Cornwall more especially, have been introduced into the academy during the last three years, and what their conduct has been since they first entered it. We are assured that a large proportion of the excesses which have recently brought so much disgrace upon the institution have been committed by the sons of civilians, who have received their appointments for no other reason in the world than that their parents are among the political supporters of the Government, and of the Master General more especially. The chief ground of the evil we have already referred to is the corrupt spirit in which the patronage of the academy is administered, the shameless audacity with which all pretext of impartiality is set aside, when any political object is to be gained.

First, then, with respect to political objects, and to the admission of the children of political friends into the academy. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying, that whenever any of my friends here around me have applied to me to admit a son into the academy, and I have had the means of complying with their request, I have always felt the greatest pleasure in doing so, and will do so again; but, at the same time, I must observe, that I have friends on the other side of the House, as well as on this; and whenever they have made a similar application, and the means have been in my power, I have been happy to have had it in my power to meet their wish.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from both sides of the House.]

I have always held that admission into the military service of the country should on no account be made to depend on politics; and if such were ever to be made the rule, I should hold it to be a great misfortune to the country. Although the parents may differ in this and in the other House of Parliament, I see no reason why the children should not go forth together to fight the battles of their country. If, therefore, since I have held the office of Master General, by the nomination of a Shaw, a Jocelyn, or an O'Connell, as cadets at the Woolwich Academy, I shall have enabled the children of those politically hostile families, on some future day, to fight in the same battery, to stand in the same breach, and to gather glory in the same field, I shall feel that, in making such appointments, I have done that which may effect much good to my country, and certainly, according to my notions, no harm to the party to which I belong. I must now beg to say a word or two in reference to the allegation of my having used the patronage of the academy for personal purposes. I have been asked, how many youths from Cornwall have been appointed within the last few years? In reply to the question, I can state, that since I have been at the head of the Ordnance, I recollect five youths only who have been admitted and remained who could be said to have had any connection whatever with Cornwall. Of these, the first was admitted upon the application of a very distinguished officer, who had been severely wounded in the service, who was then living at Falmouth, but with whom I have no personal acquaintance. On receiving his letter, I sent it to Lord Fitzroy Somerset, to inquire whether the statements of service which it contained were correct. The reply was in the affirmative; and his son was, in consequence, appointed. The second youth was also the son of an officer, a captain in the navy, now living in Ireland. The third was, certainly, the son of a political friend of mine, once a member of this House, but for some time past resident abroad, and who did not vote at the last election. The fourth was the son of a clergyman living in a parish where I have property, but who is decidedly opposed to me in politics, and who, at the last election, plumped against me. The fifth was the son of a gentleman living in the western division of the county, and who has neither vote nor interest in the eastern division, which I represent. So much, then, for the prodigal manner in which I have granted admissions to the academy to my Cornish friends. I could give an equally satisfactory explanation with respect to the cadets from Devonshire; but as the House appears perfectly satisfied, I will proceed to reply to another charge,—that of not appointing so many children of old officers as my predecessors.

Now, with respect to the children of old officers, the regular rule, or rather the general custom, has been, to admit them into the academy in the proportion of about one half of the whole number admitted. To cover the expenses of the academy, which are considerable, it is found necessary to admit the sons of civilians, who pay in a much higher proportion than the sons of old officers; besides which, it would not be just to exclude the children of civilians. Of the 141 cadets who have been admitted within the last three years, 78 were the sons of old officers; being, in fact, a much greater proportion in favour of the latter than has ever occurred at any former period. I trust that this plain and explicit statement will have convinced the House that I never have been guilty of such unworthy conduct as has been attributed to me in the libellous columns of the paper from which my Honourable and Gallant Friend read extracts. I should have been unworthy of the distinguished office I fill,— I should be unworthy of remaining the colleague of my friends around me,—if I could so have conducted myself. There is one other statement made in the papers from which the Gallant Officer has quoted, but to which he has not adverted; and to which I advert, principally, for the sake of showing the malignity to which party spirit will induce people to resort, in order to blacken and defame the character of their opponents. The paper to which I refer, after noticing the case of Cadet Maude, to which I have already replied, goes on to say,—

> Nay; as if to show how far the vilest party spirit can be urged, we actually know an instance where the Master General took out of the hands of a commanding officer in the Royal Artillery the disposal of a subordinate appointment which had always heretofore been left in their gift, and conferred it upon a man, in direct opposition to the recommendation of the commandant, because his wife (a woman, by-the-bye, of bad character) was the daughter of a Cornish voter. But we are tired of multiplying instances, all tending to establish the one truth, which experience has now almost universally recognised,—namely, that the Whigs, as a governing party, are the most contemptible in spirit, the most tyrannically corrupt, that ever cheated the generous confidence of a nation.

Now, really, when I read that passage, I could not understand it. I could not at all imagine to what circumstance it referred. I directed my secretary to write to Lord Bloomfield on the subject; and here is Lord Bloomfield's answer:—

> Woolwich, 15th March, 1840.
> Dear Elliot,—I have looked into our correspondence, and, by Colonel Jones's permission, into that of his office, touching the subject of your note. It does not appear that Sir Hussey, in any instance, interfered with the privileges of commanding officers, but on every occasion most anxiously upheld them.
> I return the paper, wishing that the editor was made aware, and through him the public, of the entire absence of all political feeling in the exercise of Sir Hussey's patronage.
> Yours sincerely,
> Bloomfield.

I did not rest here; and, on further inquiry, I discovered that it must be meant to refer to a circumstance which occurred in October last; which was, that the commandant of one of the battalions proposed promoting a young sergeant (a very deserving and excellent man, certainly) over the head of one of the oldest and most gallant non-commissioned officers in the Royal Artillery. The circumstance was brought under my notice by Sir Alexander Dixon, the deputy adjutant general of the Royal Artillery. I directly wrote the minute I will now read to the House:—

> Glynn, October 13. 1839.
> I am very much obliged by your bringing under my observation the case of M'Kown. As I hope I have never, in any instance, allowed favouritism to supersede claims, in the higher appointments, I shall not be disposed to admit of it in the lower. Colonels commandant, as long as they exercise justly and properly the patronage they hold, shall find no interference on my part; but I never will admit of an old soldier being dealt unfairly with, or allow a junior to be placed over his head, unless under some very extraordinary circumstances; seeing, especially, that, more than in any other corps in Her Majesty's service, promotion by gradation has been the practice in the Royal Artillery for a long number of years.

(Signed) H. V.

I am sorry to trespass at such length upon the patience of the House; but the subject is one of great consequence to me, and of some consequence to my friends around me; and I trust that the House will think, by the explanation I have now given, I have entirely exonerated myself from the suspicion, even, of ever having allowed myself, in any part of my conduct, to be influenced by the unworthy and discreditable motives these scurrilous libellers have thought proper to attribute to me.

With respect to the re-admission of any of the youths who have been dismissed, pressed upon me by the Gallant Officer, I have only to say, that nothing would give me greater pleasure, if I could do so without injury to the discipline of the academy. I have paid great attention to the subject; and have already, some time since, referred the matter to the consideration of the Committee of Inquiry. My present impression is, that I cannot well restore any of them; certainly not just yet;—and any being eventually restored must depend on the conduct of those now at the institution. I will, however, not lose sight of an object I have, myself, much at heart. If, however, I should be induced to restore any of them, it can only be those who have been conspicuous for uniform good conduct prior to the occurrence of these unfortunate circumstances.

Mr. HUME.—I wish to know from the Gallant General how many of the hundred young men appointed as the sons of old officers received commissions during the last year?

SIR H. VIVIAN.—I believe about twenty-five; but I have not the Return with me.

Mr. GOULBURN.—Sir, being a person having no connection with military matters, if I say anything upon this subject, it will be from feelings quite apart from any military considerations. I cannot, however, help feeling for the painful situation in which the parents of the young men who have been dismissed have been placed. Nor can I help feeling that there must have been something seriously wrong in the management of the academy, before the necessity could have arisen of resorting to so painful an expedient as the dismissal of fifteen or sixteen cadets at the same moment. I am quite sure that the Gallant General has acted only from a sense of duty, and that he has performed his duty most faithfully; but, at the same time, I cannot help thinking that the necessity of such severe measures must, to a great extent, have been regulated by the age of the offending parties. If they were of such an age as to be easily led away, I cannot help thinking that expulsion was rather a severe step. On the other hand, if they were old enough to appreciate the consequence of their conduct, then, however painful it might be to his feelings, the Gallant General had no alternative but dismissal. What I would wish to impress upon the Gallant General is, the necessity of a vigorous and constant watchfulness, which would prevent those excesses, and thus preclude the necessity of such severe punishment. If I understand the Gallant General rightly, expulsion to a large extent has been found necessary on two separate occasions; and I feel convinced that that necessity might have been avoided, if ordinary watchfulness and attention to discipline had been observed.

SIR H. VIVIAN.—One word in explanation. The thirteen to which I have alluded as having been expelled, were so punished when the Duke of Wellington was at the head of the Ordnance. I can assure the Right Honourable Gentleman that there has been no want of attention, on the part of the head of the academy, or of the other officers belonging to it. The offence for which the greater part of the cadets were dismissed was that of oppression to their younger comrades,—a vice which they evinced their determination to persist in, in spite of the remonstrances and the commands of their superiors.

Mr. GOULBURN.—What I wished to impress upon the Gallant General was, that if the discipline had been preserved in the first instance, all the painful consequences that have since occurred might have been avoided.

SIR HENRY HARDINGE.—In my opinion, the Right Honourable and Gallant General has pursued the only proper course. Most of the young men who have been dismissed had attained the age of 15, 16, or 17 years; they were perfectly aware of the consequences of their misconduct, but, nevertheless, persisted in it. Under such circumstances, the Gallant General had no other alternative than to refer the conduct of the young men to the consideration of the Committee; to take the Report of the Committee upon it; and, if it were unfavourable, to act upon it at once, and dismiss the parties who had offended. If I had been in the position of my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend, I should have acted precisely in the same way. Nothing could be more embarrassing, or more injurious to the future discipline of the college, than to yield to the solicitations that have been made for the restoration of these disobedient young men, unless very special circumstances in their favour can be made out.

I have no doubt that the college, composed, as it is, of young and ardent spirits, requires a severe discipline; and when it is known to the young men that their misconduct will be met by a severe punishment, I hope they will reflect more deeply on the consequences of disobedience, and will behave better in future. I must say, that it has given me great pain to find my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend resort to a defence, in detail, against the calumnies that have been heaped upon him. In the high situation that my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend fills, and after his long and brilliant career in the service of his country, it is painful — nay, it is humiliating — to see him enter into a defence of his conduct;—and a defence from what? From anonymous attacks in newspapers. Why, if public men were from day to day to come down to this House and give an explanation of any attack that might be made upon them in the newspapers, or in pamphlets, or in any other anonymous publications, they would not only lose the time of the House, but would lose, also, much of the dignity which belongs to their own person and their own station. I should have never heard of any one of the charges to which my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend has this evening so convincingly replied; and I am only surprised that my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend should have condescended to give any explanation which his high and unblemished character does not render necessary. At all events, I hope that this is the last time that I shall hear a Master General of the Ordnance defend himself from any petty attack that may be made upon him in a newspaper or other anonymous publication.

COLONEL ANSON. — The Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman must remember that these charges were not made in newspapers only, but that an attack has also been made by an Honourable and Gallant Member opposite. I must say, that I think, under the circumstances, my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend could have pursued no other course than to have given the explanation requested.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — I maintain, Sir, that the Honourable and Gallant Member behind me made no attack upon the department of the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman; on the contrary, he expressly stated that he did not himself believe the allegations that were made against it. What I rise, however, to complain of is, that this matter should have been introduced to the attention of the House at all. I cannot but deem it highly inexpedient and improper that the House of Commons should be made a court of review upon the proceedings of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I do not think there was anything offensive in the observation of the Honourable and Gallant Member opposite: he repeated statements from newspapers, and my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend had no other course to pursue than to answer the calumnies which those statements contained; and, for my own part, I can see nothing improper in the course he has adopted.

SIR G. DE LACY EVANS. — I agree with my Honourable Friend who has just sat down, that the Right Honourable and Gallant Officer had no other course to pursue than to reply to the charges that have been made against him. The Honourable and Gallant Member opposite did not make, but alleged, charges against my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend; and the high character which he so deservedly bears made it natural that he should not pass them over unnoticed. I regret, however, that the subject has been introduced at all; though I concur with the Right Honourable and Gallant Member for Launceston, that, in a military college, it is absolutely necessary that an exact and rigid discipline should be enforced.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — The Honourable and Gallant Colonel opposite has accused me of having made an attack on the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman. I regret that the Gallant Officer should have said this; for I really did no such thing: on the contrary, I completely exonerated the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman from the charge of having made use of the academy for the purposes of political jobbing. It appears that seventeen cadets have been sent to the right-about without any reason whatever having been assigned for it; and I merely asked for some explanation upon the subject. I hope, under the circumstances, these youths may be allowed to return to the academy.

COLONEL ANSON. — I merely rise to state, that I did not mean to say that the Honourable and Gallant Member had himself made any direct attack upon my Right Honourable Friend.

MEDITERRANEAN STEAMERS.

SIR THOMAS COCHRANE. — Before the House goes into committee, I wish, Sir, to be allowed to put a question to the Honourable Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty, respecting the Government steamers employed in the packet service in the Mediterranean. Some statements have appeared in a public print, written by a lady, as to the treatment of passengers on board those vessels, which appear somewhat to affect the character of naval officers. I will not go into the particulars, and I hope the statements are not correct; but I wish to know whether the Government have received any complaints upon the subject. I think that it is derogatory to naval officers to be employed in this description of service at all. At all events, I consider that the commanders of these steamers should have salaries which would place them above all temptation of being parsimonious towards their passengers, and would disconnect them from any interest in the matter, and place them in a position to listen to and decide as to the merits of any complaints that might be made.

Mr. MORE O'FERRALL. — I am not aware that any complaints have reached the Admiralty upon the subject to which the Honourable and Gallant Member has referred.

SIR THOMAS COCHRANE. — My authority is a statement, authenticated by the name of the writer, which has appeared in the Asiatic Journal and in the United Service Gazette.

SIR THOMAS TROUBRIDGE. — It is evident, I think, that it would be quite impossible for those connected with the Admiralty to reply to every grievance that might be put forth, of hard fare, in the shape of sour beer, bad eggs, and damaged anchovy, incurred by ladies in a sea voyage.

Motion agreed to.

The House went into Committee of Supply on

ORDNANCE ESTIMATES.

SIR H. VIVIAN. — Before I enter on the estimates, I must express how fully sensible I am of the handsome manner in which my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend opposite has been pleased to speak of me; and I must, also, in reference to the conduct of the Honourable and Gallant Gentleman who first brought the subject of the academy under the notice of the House, say, that he did not do so in the manner of an attack on me: on the contrary, he did it in the handsomest possible manner, and I thank him for it. My Right Honourable and Gallant Friend has flattered me by alluding to my character, and has given it as his opinion, that I should have stood upon that character in the present instance, and not have condescended to make any answer to the charge which has been the matter of discussion this evening. But I can assure my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend that he is not aware of the extent of mischief which has been done to the academy by the atrocious reports which have been sent abroad. Nor should I have been justified, after the manner in which the discipline of the academy had been adverted to, — after the statements read from a military newspaper distinctly charging me with corrupt practices, — in abstaining from giving the explanation I have given on all and every point touched upon in the speech of the Gallant Officer who first introduced the subject to the attention of the House. In proceeding to move the Ordnance Estimates for the year, it is not my intention, nor will it be necessary for me, to trespass upon the House at any length; but as the estimates of this year somewhat exceed those of last year, and as the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, when speaking on the Army Estimates, said, that he thought there was an esprit du corps on the part of the heads of the different military departments, to keep up the estimates as high as possible, I feel it my duty distinctly to assure the House, and the Honourable Member, that the only principle upon which the present estimates have been framed is the principle of economy, consistently with the efficiency of the public service. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has oftentimes expressed a wish that the Ordnance Estimates, at the present day, should be made to correspond with those of the year 1792; but when the Honourable Member recollects the enormous increase of our colonial possessions since that period, he will find, on a comparison, that the present estimates do not, in reality, exceed what they were in his favourite year of 1792. The first vote which will be proposed is for the Ordnance civil establishments, on which it will be found that there is an increase of only 23*l.* on the vote of last year. The second vote is for the Ordnance military corps, on which, in the department of the Royal Engineers and Sappers and Miners, there is a decrease on the estimates of last year to the amount of 722*l.* The third vote is for the Royal Artillery, the Horse Artillery, the master gunners, the field train, the medical department, and the Royal Military Academy; and on this estimate there is an increase to the amount of 1347*l.*, arising from an increase in the rate of pay given to the soldiers, and for the additional clothing for the troops in Canada. The fourth vote is that for the barrack establishment, on which there is an increase of 3326*l.* This increase arises from the appointment of additional barrack masters, in consequence of the erection of new barracks in Canada. The fifth vote is for Ordnance works and repairs, storekeepers' expenditure, building and repair of barracks, barrack masters' expenditure, pay of clerks of works, &c. On this vote there is an increase of 67,900*l.*: this increase arises from the additional number of barracks that have been built and provided in Canada and elsewhere, and from allowances that have been made to the barrack masters. The sixth vote is for military and civil contingencies, and for army extraordinaries. There is an increase in this vote of 36,354*l.*; but this apparent increase arises from that portion of the expenditure for the army extraordinaries connected with the Ordnance service in the colonies, being now transferred to the Ordnance Estimates. The next vote, the seventh, is for stores; on which there is an increase of 19,000*l.* This is chiefly made up by an additional sum of 5000*l.* for the supply of small arms, 5000*l.* for great coats, and an additional 4000*l.* for bedding. The next item is for the superannuated allowances; in which there is a decrease of 2873*l.*; and the last vote is for the commissariat; on which there is an increase of 25,328*l.* The result, then, of the estimates, is this: that the amount added to the various votes in which there is an increase is 152,556*l.*; and the amount diminished on certain other votes is 7041*l.*; making an actual increase of 145,515*l.* The whole sum to be expended is 1,971,042*l.* Now, the credits, by the sale of lands, of old stores, rents of canteens, &c., amount, this year, to 86,042*l.*; whereas, the amount voted for credits, last year, was 93,287*l.*, making a difference of 7245*l.* The sum, then, to be voted this year is 1,885,000*l.*; the amount voted last year was 1,732,240*l.*; making an increase of 152,760*l.* on the vote of this year, over that of the last. I am not aware that it is necessary for me to trouble the House with any further remarks on these estimates; and I shall therefore now conclude by proposing the first vote, "That the sum of 116,874*l.* be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charges for the Ordnance civil establishments, from the 1st of April, 1840, to the 31st of March, 1841."

Question put.

SIR HENRY HARDINGE. — I wish to ask my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend whether there is any ground for the report that the barracks in the West Indies, under the Ordnance Department, have been accidentally—for I will not say intentionally — neglected, in respect to supplying the troops, in those islands, with proper accommodation? From what I have heard in this House,—motions for the production of papers on this subject having been already made, and others being now on the Votes,—it would appear that, in the opinion of persons very competent to form an opinion, there has been, on the part of the Ordnance Department, a very considerable neglect in this matter. I have called for papers myself, and another Honourable Member — the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland — has called for others; and I hope, as they have not yet been produced, my Right Honourable Friend the Master of the Ordnance will state whether any neglect, which would seem to be imputed by the calling for these papers, is to be attributed to the department over which he presides, and whether, in his opinion, the transfer of this duty to the War Office would lead to the result of the barrack department being conducted in a better and more satisfactory manner.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN.—I regret that the papers alluded to by my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend have not yet been laid on the table of the House. I had hoped that the papers would have been produced before this, and that the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland and my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend would have had an opportunity of fully entering into the subject. I am not aware of, neither will I admit, in any way, that there is the slightest want of attention on the part of the Ordnance towards the barrack department, either in the colonies or at home. It is a question upon which I shall be very glad to meet the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland, who, I know, entertains a strong opinion on the subject, whenever he may be inclined to bring it forward. My Right Honourable Friend knows full well what are the regulations with respect to the colonial barracks. There is, in every colony, an officer of the Royal Engineers, acting under the Ordnance Department. If anything be required to be done, the commanding officer signifies his wants to the engineer officer, whose duty it is to make a special Report, every year, of the state of the barracks. Whenever those Reports are brought before the Ordnance Department, they are immediately attended to, and the slightest neglect is never allowed.

SIR HENRY HARDINGE.—I am glad to hear this denial on the part of my Right Honourable Friend; and I hope, when the papers I have referred to shall have been laid upon the table of the House, that this subject will again be brought under its notice.

Mr. HUME.—I cannot but regret the indifference that has been shown by this House, and by the country, with respect to the extent of these grants. Here is a sum of 1,885,000*l.* to be granted in one night, and not a single word is raised against it; but when the time shall come that fresh taxes will have to be imposed, in order to enable the Government to pay this large sum, then will be the day of grumbling and complaint. I deny that I am the only person who wishes to see the public establishments reduced to the standard of 1792. Committee after Committee have recommended reductions to that standard. The number of men voted for the service of the Ordnance in 1792 was 4000, whereas the present vote is for 8800 men. But of this I am convinced, that until the Ordnance Department be altogether remodelled, there is no hope of seeing the expenses of that establishment less than they are. I, however, will never allow these estimates to pass without expressing my opinion, that the officers of the engineers and of the artillery are very ill used, by being kept in a detached and separate manner, under the control of the Master General of the Ordnance. The British army is the only one in Europe in which the artillery are not in connection with the commander of the forces. In England, the commander of the forces knows nothing of the artillery or of the engineers. The effect of this system is to deprive the British army of the services of men who are in every respect better qualified for appointments in the general service than any other class of officers. In the French, the Austrian, and the Prussian armies, the artillery officers are constantly appointed to high stations, particularly to staff appointments; thus offering a complete contrast to the case of the same class of men in the British service. In my opinion, the same practice ought to be pursued in this country; and these classes of officers ought not to be kept at such a distance from the Commander-in-chief, and deprived of these advantages to which they are fully entitled. My principal objection to these estimates are the expenses of the barrack department, and of the management and care of the stores. The cost of managing the stores amounts to no less than 38 per cent. on the whole amount of the estimates; and though I admit that the barrack department is now much better managed than formerly, still I am of opinion that 520,000*l.* is an enormous sum for that department. I should, however, be very sorry to see the barracks taken from that department under which they are now, and again transferred to the War Office. When I look at the great expense incurred for barracks abroad, I feel myself called upon to repeat my regret that the colonies, with the exception of Gibraltar, should not be expected to defray the greater portion of these expenses. There is no doubt they would be willing to do this, provided this country would but consent to reduce the force kept in the colonies to such an amount as the colonies required themselves. I have, Sir, merely made these few observations, denying altogether the impression which the Right Honourable and Gallant Officer has made as to this department of the Ordnance being now conducted with as much economy as in the year 1792.

SIR H. HARDINGE.—I think that the Honourable Member has misunderstood my question to my Right Honourable Friend. He has mentioned that the barracks ought to be conducted by the Ordnance Department, and not be under that of the War Office. Now, my question was, with reference to the Report of the Commissioners recommending the taking away from the Ordnance Department that branch of its administration, and transferring it to the War Office. When I recollect what was the state of the barracks when under the War Office, I cannot help stating that, in my opinion, the Ordnance Department is the best office to take charge of them; and that, should they be transferred to the War Office, a great detriment to the public service will be the result. I shall view with jealousy any attempt which may be made by the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland to transfer the barracks back to the War Office; and whenever that Noble Lord shall bring forward his motion, I shall be prepared to pay the highest tribute to, and to give my vote in support of, the manner in which that department was established by the Duke of Wellington in the years 1822 and 1823, as it is, unquestionably, the best mode of managing that important part of the public establishments.

SIR DE LACY EVANS. — I cannot agree with my Honourable Friend the Member for Kilkenny in his preference of the efficient state of the armies of the Continent as compared with that of Great Britain. I believe that it is within the experience of all military men that, at all events, the artillery department of the army of this country rather transcends than otherwise, in point of efficiency, that of any other country. This is not a matter of argument; it is known and acknowledged throughout the whole of Europe. With regard to the engineering department, it certainly ranks very high in the British service; but I do not approve of either the artillery or the engineering department being transferred from the control of the Board of Ordnance to that of the Commander-in-chief. I think that such a change would be a most hazardous experiment. At the same time I must say, that greater opportunities ought to be afforded for the development of the services and talents of the officers of those two distinguished branches of the British army. When the officers of these corps rise to the rank of colonels, their efficient services cease; and should my Honourable Friend the Member for Kilkenny think proper, at any future period, to propose means of relieving those officers from this disadvantage, I shall certainly be disposed to give him my support.

Mr. HUME. — I never intended to say anything to the disparagement of these corps; and all I wish to convey is, that the engineers and artillery, abroad, are placed on the same footing as the rest of the army, while ours are kept separate. Many members of these forces have certainly been employed, of late, in the civil service; and I am sorry that it does not occur more often. I think, too, that it is a bad practice, in the British army, for general officers to employ the youngest men they can select to be their aides-de camp, instead of choosing them from amongst more experienced officers.

Mr. W. ATTWOOD. — As the discussion on the more prominent points of these estimates appears now to have closed, I wish to call the attention of the House to an item in the first vote, which, although it may not seem of great general importance, is one of much moment to the parties interested, and, in its consequences, not immaterial to the public service; — I allude to the disparity which is manifest, on looking at the estimates, between the sums charged for salaries for the gentlemen employed in the establishments in the Tower and Pall Mall, and those paid to parties similarly occupied at Woolwich. The senior clerks at the former stations have 900*l.* per annum; the second class, 300*l.* to 600*l.*; and the junior class, 90*l.* to 300*l.*; — while, at Woolwich, all the clerks employed, senior and junior, are on the scale of from 90*l.* to 300*l.* I wish to ask the reason of this disparity? I understand the duties at Woolwich to be as arduous and responsible, and the characters of the persons employed, and their abilities, as good. It is necessary that they should understand, not merely the ordinary routine of their office business, but should be thoroughly acquainted with the nature and various applications of the stores under their charge. It would seem, therefore, that if their salaries are sufficient, those paid in London are too high; or that, if the salaries in London are no more than adequate, those of the Woolwich establishment ought to be raised. I wish to ask the reason of this disparity?

SIR H. VIVIAN. — The difference in the amount of salaries to which the Honourable Gentleman has referred existed for many years previous to my accession to the duties of the Master

General of the Ordnance; and arises, I apprehend, from the superior duties which the one class has to perform, in comparison with the other, and the greater responsibility which attaches to their situations. Taking these circumstances into consideration, I cannot but consider that the difference in their salaries is fully justified. With respect to what has fallen from the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, he must recollect that we have fifteen more colonies now than we had in the year 1792; and that we have consequently an additional number of artillery, guns, stores, and other things to send out to them for their protection. With regard to the transfer of the Ordnance military corps, and the civil branch of the department, from the authority under which they are at present placed, to the Horse Guards and the War Office, that is a subject which, in the absence of the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland, I will not discuss. I shall, however, whenever called upon by the Noble Lord, — as I hope he will call on me when the papers already referred to are before the House, — be able to show to the House that such a proposition would, if acceded to, tend to destroy altogether one of the most efficient departments of the service, and lead to an enormous expense.

Mr. W. ATTWOOD. — I can only say that much dissatisfaction has been occasioned by the disparity which I have pointed out; and I was desirous to know whether the attention of the Master General had been called to the subject. Although the Right Honourable and Gallant Officer says that the comparative nature of the duties to be performed justifies the inequality, I cannot but think it desirable that the subject should receive consideration, and that some more satisfactory arrangement should be made.

SIR H. HARDINGE. — I have had some little experience in the Ordnance Department, and I can bear my testimony to the eminent deserts of the clerks who are employed in the Tower and Pall Mall branches of that department. The officers of those branches of the Ordnance Department are political officers, like those of the Admiralty, and are changed with the change of Government. The consequence is, that, although those gentlemen bring with them a great deal of military knowledge, yet, on the other hand, they are very much indebted for departmental information to the senior clerks; whereas, at Woolwich, meritorious as the individuals performing the duties there undoubtedly are, they are never brought into intercourse, upon important matters, with the members of the board; and therefore their services are necessarily less rewarded. I am enabled, from experience, to declare that I have never found any set of clerks more competent than the senior clerks of the Ordnance Department; and I am persuaded that the clerks of that department are underpaid, rather than overpaid, as compared with those of other departments.

SIR H. VIVIAN. — I can truly say, that, so far as my experience goes, which extends now nearly over five years, the clerks to whom my Gallant Friend has alluded are amply deserving the commendations which he has given them.

Motion agreed to.

Motion made, and question put, "That a sum, not exceeding 106,930*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charges of the Royal Engineers, Sappers, and Miners, from the 1st of April, 1840, to 31st March, 1841."

Agreed to.

Motion made, and question put, "That a sum, not exceeding 354,073*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charges of the Royal Artillery, Horse Artillery, master gunners, field train, medical department, and Royal Military Academy, from the 1st of April, 1840, to the 31st of March, 1841."

Agreed to.

Motion made, and question put, "That a sum, not exceeding 37,714*l.*, be granted to her Majesty, to defray the charges of barrack masters at home and abroad, from the 1st of April, 1840, to the 31st of March, 1841."

Mr. HUME. — I have to complain of the great number of barrack masters and barracks in our colonies; and I cannot but press upon the Government the necessity of these expenses falling on the colonial funds, rather than on those of the mother country. Our colonies, however, have never been allowed, by the policy of this country, to manage their own affairs, and have been so little consulted in what relates to their benefit, that the result is, that these expenses cannot be imposed upon them, and are, of necessity, defrayed by this country.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and question put, "That a sum, not exceeding 437,711*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charges of the Ordnance works and repairs, storekeepers' and barrack masters' expendiure, pay of clerks of works, &c., from the 1st of April, 1840, to the 31st of March, 1841.

Mr. HUME. — This portion of the esimate shows, more than any other, in what a shameful manner the public money s thrown away. Under the head of works and repairs in Bermuda, I find the sum of 486*l.*, together with various other expenses, as well as other heavy charges for similar things in Nova Scotia, New South Wales, and other places. No doubt, too, if the state of the Treasury would have admitted of it, the Government would have expended still more than they have done under these items. As it is, however, I must reiterate my complaint, that great sums of money are yearly thrown away in these particulars.

SIR H. VIVIAN. — It appears to me that so long as this country has colonies, they must be defended; and no one knows better than the Honourable Member himself the necessity for extending our protection to the commerce we carry on with our colonial possessions: and he must recollect that, although directly, the navy and army may not contribute so much as the Honourable Member might wish, to their own support, — that, indirectly, through the means of the commerce of the country, and the import duties, — exceeding 23,000,000*l.* last year, — they do most materially contribute; — in short, they are not that dead weight on the country the Honourable Member would represent them to be.

Mr. HUME. — The fact is, that the colonies have the greater portion of the profit, and we have all the expense. It is a curious fact, too, that our military expenses are greatest in those colonies with which we carry on the least trade.

SIR G. DE LACY EVANS. — I cannot but consider the abandonment of our colonies — for withholding our protection from them would amount to that — a question rather of civil policy, than one for the consideration of the Master General of the Ordnance.

Mr. HUME. — I am far from wishing to abandon any colony; but I may be allowed to say that our colonial expenses have trebled since the war; and we have now a regiment in each, for every company which we formerly had.

SIR G. DE LACY EVANS. — I agree with my Honourable Friend that the colonies ought to pay a larger proportion of these expenses than they now do; but this is not, I think, a subject to be discussed on the Ordnance Estimates.

Mr. HUME. — As I see that a sum for works and repairs at the Tower is included in this estimate, I would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is disposed to give the sixpences received for viewing the armoury at the Tower, for the purpose of erecting a proper building in which to deposit the regalia, in order that they may not remain any longer in the dirty hole in which they are kept at present, to the great disgrace of the country?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I must say that I am much surprised that the Honourable Gentleman can entertain such an unconstitutional notion; as he ought to be aware that the Treasury could not make such an appropriation of those fees without the sanction of Parliament. If such sanction were granted, and an inquiry entered into upon the subject, I should not, perhaps, say, that such an arrangement might not be desirable.

Mr. HUME. — I am of opinion that the consent of the House to such an appropriation might be obtained without difficulty. There are regulations made in various parts of the country for opening museums of natural curiosities. I do not mean to call the regalia natural curiosities; but there are arrangements made, in various large towns in the country, for gratifying the curiosity of the public; and the plans on which they are made are invariably found to be profitable. The Government will pocket 1000*l.* by these sixpences received during the last two years; and the public have a right to expect, and do expect, that something of the description I have suggested should be done with the money.

COLONEL ANSON. — If this suggestion were acted upon, its effect would be, to increase the Ordnance Estimates for the next year by 1000*l.*

Mr. HUME. — I see, also, the sum of 559*l.* in the estimate of fees on officers' commissions. I wish to ask if such fees could not be abolished?

SIR H. HARDINGE.—I agree with the Honourable Member for Kilkenny that they ought to be abolished; and perhaps the Report of the Naval and Military Commission now sitting may make the same recommendation on the point.

Motion agreed to.

Motion made, and question put, "That a sum, not exceeding 180,415l., be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charges of military and civil contingencies, Ordnance surveys, &c., from 1st April, 1840, to 31st March, 1841."

SIR H. VERNEY.—I wish to ask the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman when the maps connected with the Ordnance survey are likely to be completed?

SIR H. VIVIAN.—In reply to the question of the Honourable Baronet, I have to state, that the maps of England and Ireland have been delayed, in consequence of the number of surveyors who have left our service to find employment on the different railways, where they are much better paid. I hope, however, that the Irish survey will be completed in three or four years, and the English in five or six; but much must depend on circumstances, beyond the control of the department, both in England and in Ireland. With respect to Scotland, there is a question yet to be determined, whether the scale is to be six inches to the mile, or what the scale is to be.

SIR H. VERNEY.—I cannot understand why the English scale is only one inch to the mile, whilst the Irish is eight inches, and the Scotch is to be six inches.

SIR J. Y. BULLER.—As this vote, Sir, includes the civil charges, I wish, as connected with the county of Devon, to make an inquiry relating to the dismissal of Mr. Foote, the local solicitor to the Ordnance at Devonport, who for fifty-five years has discharged his duty to the entire satisfaction of the Ordnance Boards. The general impression is, that he has been dismissed in consequence of his having been canvassed at the recent election by the clerk to the Board of Ordnance; and having told him that he could not agree either with him or the Liberal candidate for the town of Devonport, he was dismissed after the election, and no reason has been given for his dismissal, nor have his inquiries upon the subject met with any answer.

SIR H. VIVIAN.—I can only say that, with respect to Mr. Foote's dismissal, the Honourable Baronet knows as much about it as I do. It is not an Ordnance appointment; and the first I heard of the case was the other day, from Mr. Dawson, at the levee, who expressed to me his hopes that Mr. Foote would not be dismissed in consequence of the manner in which he had given his vote. Shortly before the election at Devonport, Mr. Smith, the late London solicitor to the Board of Ordnance, died, and the appointment was given to a Mr. Hignett, with whom, and not with the Ordnance, lies the appointment of the country agents; and it is to be presumed that, in making a selection of those agents, the newly-appointed solicitor would naturally choose them from his own friends. Mr. Foote has written to me a statement somewhat similar to that just made by the Honourable Baronet; and the answer I returned was, that I had heard of the matter before, from Mr. Dawson; but that the Board of Ordnance had nothing to do with the appointment. It is true, I understand, that Mr. Foote has interfered in the election at Devonport; but whether that was, or was not, the cause of his removal, I cannot undertake to say.

SIR H. HARDINGE.—I do not at all like this transaction; and cannot see why a new solicitor to the Ordnance is to discharge another because he happens to be of a different opinion from himself. If there should be any change of Government presently, what would take place? Why, that if this is to be the rule on which this new solicitor is to act, with respect to the political opinions of others, the next Government might dismiss him on the same grounds; and by such occurrences the public service would be put to great inconvenience. This never used to be the system acted upon by the Ordnance Department heretofore; and I very well recollect that, when I was, some years ago, attached to that office, there was a clerk there—a man of very good conduct and character in his situation—who seldom asked for leave of absence except at the time when the election was about to take place at Rochester, where, being himself a Whig, he always voted for the Whig candidate, and no notice was ever taken of the circumstance. I do not think, then, that it ought to be tolerated, that this gentleman, who is newly appointed to the office of solicitor to the Ordnance, should dismiss others from their appointments, on the ground of a difference of political opinion; and I should have hoped that my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend, knowing Mr. Foote, and his respectability and long services, would have taken the circumstance of so abrupt a dismissal into consideration.

SIR H. VIVIAN. — I never so much as hinted that Mr. Foote had been removed for electioneering reasons. I said, decidedly, that, until some months after Mr. Hignett had ceased to employ him, I was ignorant of the fact, and I never inquired into the reason why Mr. Hignett had employed another person. My Right Honourable and Gallant Friend has alluded to a clerk in the Ordnance, who, though voting against the Government candidate, was not interfered with; and I can also tell my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend of a case of a clerk in the Ordnance Department, at Devonport, who, when I was a candidate for that borough, voted against me, and no notice was taken of it by me, or any one by my desire.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — I agree with my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend the Member for Launceston that it was in the power of the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman opposite, when applied to by Mr. Foote, to see whether the cause alleged for that gentleman's dismissal was the right one, or not. Mr. Foote has served in the same situation for upwards of fifty years, and is a man of high character and respectability; and when Mr. Smith, the late solicitor to the Ordnance, was appointed, he did not find it necessary to act as the present solicitor has done, and to remove him from his agency. The Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman has not been able to avoid saying that this gentleman has interfered in the election against the Government candidate; and I cannot but think that it would have been more becoming in the Right Honourable Gentleman if he had looked into the case, and ascertained the true cause of his dismissal.

SIR H. VIVIAN. — Sir, the appointment does not rest with the Board of Ordnance, but with Mr. Hignett, who can employ whatever person he likes; and if I had requested him to appoint any particular individual, he would have justly said, "I have the business of the Ordnance to do, and must discharge my duty in the best manner I can. How am I to be responsible, if I do not name my own agents?" I believe there is nowhere a more respectable gentleman than Mr. Foote. I never knew, until after the change had taken place, that he had been removed. But removal it can scarcely be called; for, in point of fact, there was no official appointment. It was merely a private arrangement; and I say, again, I had no right whatever to interfere with Mr. Hignett.

COLONEL ANSON. — I can assure the Committee that, until the circumstance was alluded to in the newspapers, I was not at all aware that Mr. Foote had been superseded. What Mr. Hignett's reasons may be, it is impossible for me to say; but I do not believe he has been actuated by political motives. Probably he has chosen a confidential agent to fill the situation. I cannot see any ground for the charge that Mr. Foote has been dismissed for voting in a particular manner. I can assure my Right Honourable Friend that I should be exceedingly sorry to find such a principle acted upon; and I can confidently assert that not one member of the Board of Ordnance would sanction such a course of proceeding.

Mr. HUME. — I consider the question before the House to be one of very great importance; and I am exceedingly glad that it has been brought forward. In my opinion, no person ought to be punished for an expression of political opinions; and I cannot think it proper that any one holding an official appointment under Government should be dismissed from office for voting at an election according to his own views and sentiments. If such a pernicious principle should be generally acted upon, the consequences would be most serious to individuals, and to the public service. I hope that we shall never follow the example of the United States, where a clean sweep is made whenever a change takes place in the Government. It is the duty of the House to guard against such a proceeding in this country; and I will offer a very simple remedy. If the House will adopt the system of vote by ballot, no person will be dismissed for political opinions; as the votes of individuals cannot then be ascertained. When the question of vote by ballot next comes before the House, I shall certainly claim the votes of those Honourable Gentlemen opposite who complain of the dismissal of Mr. Foote.

SIR T. D. ACLAND. — Sir, the Honourable Member for Kilkenny will certainly not have my vote in favour of the Ballot. I sincerely rejoice that the Board of Ordnance has had nothing to do with this transaction; and I, at once, acquit the Right Honourable Gentleman the Master General of the Ordnance of having taken any part in the dismissal of Mr. Foote. I do not consider the Ballot the proper remedy for evils of this nature. I think the best protection for official persons expressing their political opinions is the public and general reprobation which Mr. Foote's dismissal has received. That gentleman is upwards of seventy years of age; he is a person of the highest respectability; and has, for the long period of fifty-five years, been honourably employed in the public service. Why, then, has he been dismissed? As some doubt seems to exist on the subject, I will read to the Committee Mr. Foote's own statement. That gentleman says, —

> Most true it is, that I have had the honour of acting as law agent to the Board of Ordnance and their town solicitor at this place for the fifty-five years last past.

It does not appear that Mr. Foote considered himself merely the agent to the town solicitor; but it is quite clear that he considered himself as acting on the part of the board. Now, it is difficult to conceive how a subordinate officer should have his authority so complete as to dismiss an old and faithful servant, without being, in some measure, accountable to the head of the department. I am certain that the Right Honourable Gentleman the Master of the Ordnance has had nothing to do with this transaction; but I have a right to call on him to make further inquiry; and I should be glad to have the date of the new solicitor's appointment, and to be informed whether any business has been done by Mr. Foote since that appointment, and how it happened that, immediately after he was canvassed, he was removed from the office he had filled for more than half a century, without the common courtesy of an intimation to that effect, and his situation placed in the hands of a comparative stranger. Let the Committee attend to Mr. Foote's statement, in order to ascertain if there were any just ground for his dismissal. He says, —

> During that very long period, I have, under the direction of the latter, conducted a great variety of law business, and, I hope I may be excused for saying so, so satisfactorily, that the board never, on any the most important occasion, deemed it necessary to send down their solicitor to direct or assist me.

He further states, —

> After this statement, it may seem almost needless to add, as the fact is, that I never received the slightest indication or expression of the board's or their solicitor's disapprobation for any one act done by me, or in my office; and that there was never any objection made to any one item in my professional bills of costs when presented for payment, although, by the rules of the board, they were always very strictly examined.

What, then, was the cause of Mr. Foote's dismissal? Mr. Foote says, —

> Thus circumstanced as I have been with the board and their solicitor for more than half a century, it remains only for me, most reluctantly, to confirm the current reports, and to state that, in consequence of myself and son having given our votes at the last election for Devonport in favour of Mr. Dawson, and against the Government candidate, Mr. Tufnell, the law business of the Ordnance and barrack department has been withdrawn from us, and bestowed on another, without the slightest intimation to us on the subject.

Now, this is the statement of a gentleman whose character is quite unimpeachable. During the fifty-five years, he had never been canvassed on the part of his employers, or disturbed in the exercise of his political opinions. He was a constituent of mine twenty years ago, and I had good reason to be thankful for his services.

[Cries of " Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

That cheer will hardly be considered a cheer of triumph against one who recollects those services with some feeling of gratitude, although his peculiar mildness and moderation scarcely made him a very efficient electioneering partisan. I think it therefore peculiarly hard that he should have been treated in this manner. Although I distinctly acquit the Master General of the Ordnance of having taken any part in the dismissal of Mr. Foote, I think the Right Honourable Gentleman is bound in duty to himself to ascertain whether political motives have induced the solicitor to the Board of Ordnance to transfer the legal business of the department from that gentleman to another agent.

SIR H. VIVIAN. — Sir, I wish to say one word in explanation. I think the Honourable Baronet is mistaken in supposing that Mr. Foote was canvassed. Captain Dundas, the clerk to the Ordnance Department, has assured me that he was not canvassed nor pressed to vote; and another gentleman, an officer of engineers of high distinction (Sir George Hoste), was present, who can confirm that statement. I can only again repeat that Mr. Foote was not appointed by the board; and I question very much whether, during the whole period of fifty-five years, he had any direct communication whatever with the board.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I think that the discussion of this evening will give great satisfaction to the public. It will certainly afford extreme gratification to large classes of the community to hear the warm and indignant terms in which Honourable Gentlemen opposite have expressed themselves at the supposed interference of a person appointed by the Board of Ordnance with the individual whom he might think proper to employ as his agent, in consequence of a vote which that individual had given at an election. It has been fully established by the Master General of the Ordnance, that the Board of Ordnance knew nothing of Mr. Foote's appointment or dismissal; that he was appointed by the solicitor of the board, who selected his agents on his own responsibility, and without consulting the Board of Ordnance. The appointment of Mr. Foote's successor was, therefore, in the strictest sense of the word, the selection of one private individual by another. The solicitor is responsible to the board for the transaction of its legal business, and the board has nothing to do with the agents whom the solicitor may appoint. This discussion will not be without effect. I have been much consoled by the warmth of the expressions of Honourable Gentlemen opposite. I am sure that, when the reports of this night's proceedings go forth to the public, we shall no longer hear of any improper interference with the exercise of the political franchise. We shall no longer hear of tenants being dismissed from their farms by their landlords, in consequence of their having voted in a particular manner, — we shall no longer hear of persons ejected from their houses, in towns, for the conscientious exercise of their political rights; and tradesmen may now sleep soundly, free from all apprehension of losing the custom of the rich, should they act on their own views in the election of Members of this House. I am sure that all the tenantry of the country, all the householders in town, and all the tradesmen, will read with attention the remarks which have this night fallen from Honourable Gentlemen opposite. Although I differ from the Honourable Member for Kilkenny on the subject of the Ballot, yet, being very desirous that means should be adopted for securing freedom of election, I feel great satisfaction at what has passed in the course of the present debate.

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — The Noble Lord opposite has acted, perhaps, wisely for himself and the Government in endeavouring to distract the attention of Honourable Members from the real question before the House. There is a great difference between the ejectment of tenants and the removal of persons employed in the public business from situations which they have long held, and with the duties of which they are fully conversant. There is no analogy between the two cases. If the Noble Lord had been present from the commencement of the debate, and if he had known that Mr. Foote had been fifty-five years the agent, at Devonport, for the solicitor of the Board of Ordnance, he would not have attempted to make the House believe that this was a private appointment, of which the Board of Ordnance knew nothing, liable to be changed as often as any solicitor may be removed from his office. For my part, I think the House ought not to rest satisfied with the explanation which has been given of this transaction; and I must say that, in my opinion, some further inquiry ought to take place. The Master General of the Ordnance has come down to the House prepared to combat several statements which he considered likely to be injurious to his character; and although not attacked in these, he has entered into a very elaborate defence on various topics of which I never heard before. But why is he not prepared to meet this charge, which has been so much canvassed and so generally condemned? The Master General of the Ordnance says that he cannot say why Mr. Foote has been dismissed; but I must tell him that he has neglected his duty to this highly respectable gentleman, in allowing him to be dismissed without making any inquiries into the cause of his dismissal. Mr. Foote states that he has lost the business of the Ordnance in consequence of the vote which he has given; and I think the House has a right to ascertain whether, and how far, this system is to be extended. Mr. Foote, who has been a faithful servant of the public, is entitled to know the grounds upon which he has been discharged. If his dismissal has arisen from political motives, let it be openly stated, in order that no suspicion of misconduct may attach to Mr. Foote's character. It has been stated by my Honourable Friend the Member for South Devonshire, that a clerk of the Ordnance canvassed Mr. Foote previously to the election, and solicited his vote in favour of the Government candidate. This is an important circumstance, because the defence of the Honourable Member for South Staffordshire is, that the Board of Ordnance knew nothing about Mr. Foote's appointment, he being the mere agent of the solicitor; and yet he is here brought into connection with a clerk of the Ordnance before the election takes place. I hope that, on bringing up the Report of the Committee, the Honourable Gentleman opposite will be able to state fully the history of this transaction, for no one can deny that an explanation is absolutely necessary.

COLONEL ANSON. — Although so many broad assertions have been made, on the other side of the House, that Mr. Foote has been dismissed on political grounds, I believe not one of the assertions has any foundation in truth. But, as the matter has been so urgently pressed, I have no objection to say that I will make further inquiry. I believe the appointment of Mr. Hignett took place under these circumstances. Mr. Smith performed the duties of solicitor to the Board of Ordnance for many years, and, during his illness, the business devolved on Mr. Hignett. There were several candidates, but my Right Honourable Friend preferred that gentleman, on account of his being cognisant of the duties of the office; and I gave him a strong recommendation, without any reference to political opinions.

SIR J. Y. BULLER. — The Honourable Gentleman opposite has accused Honourable Members on this side of the House of having made broad assertions. Now, I have made no assertion without endeavouring previously to convince myself of its truth. I wrote to a friend at Devonport, desiring him to inquire into the circumstances of the case, in order to ascertain whether the statements in the newspapers and the letter of Mr. Foote were correct. The answer I received was, that Captain Dundas was Mr. Tufnell's right hand assistant, and that he busied himself in inquiring into Mr. Foote's emoluments, and afterwards actually canvassed Mr. Foote himself for the Government candidate. This is the information on which I ground my assertion; and I think the matter certainly requires further consideration. I understand that the individual appointed by Mr. Hignett is a conveyancer, and that he was obliged to call in the assistance of a solicitor; so that, in all probability, the country will have to pay two persons instead of one.

COLONEL ANSON. — Sir, the fact is, we shall have to pay neither. Mr. Hignett is directed to do the whole of the law business of the Ordnance Department; and if he appoint agents, their bills are sent in to him, who alone is responsible for the proper discharge of the duties of the office. I admit that the agents are paid, in an indirect manner, by the board.

SIR T. D. ACLAND. — With respect to the remark of the Honourable Member for South Staffordshire, I beg to state that I made no broad assertion whatever: the statement which I made was founded on the letter of Mr. Foote.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — Without entering into the merits or demerits of this transaction, I wish to remind the Noble Lord who has charged this side of the House with the ejectment of tenants, that several Honourable Members have been compelled to resign their situations, in consequence of voting against Government. The Noble Lord ought to look at home, before making charges of this kind against other parties.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN. — The Honourable Baronet opposite (the Member for Buckingham) inquires why I was not prepared to give an explanation of the transaction which has been brought under the notice of the House, when I was ready to go into the attacks made in the newspapers? Now, I was quite aware of the nature of these attacks, — they had been even read to the House by the Gallant Officer who introduced the subject of the academy, and who had given notice on the subject; and I was therefore not only prepared, but called on, to answer them: but, on the present question, it was impossible for me to be prepared, because I had nothing whatever to do with the matter, nor had I the least intimation that it would have been brought forward. Had the Honourable Member been in the House in the early part of this discussion, he would not have fallen into the mistake he has, and charged me with having entered into an elaborate defence on topics on which I was not attacked.

SIR H. HARDINGE. — Sir, it is most important that the solicitors engaged for the Ordnance Department should be retained in the public service, the duties not appertaining to the ordinary business of a solicitor; and in no instance that I am aware of has a dismissal taken place, excepting for professional incapacity. Now, this gentleman has served for fifty-six years in the Ordnance Department, and therefore some urgent reason should have been given for his dismissal; and I am surprised that the Right Honourable Gentleman has not required any explanation. Perhaps I may be allowed to ask, whether Mr. Hignett has dismissed any other solicitor, at any other outport,—Dublin, for instance?

Mr. TUFNELL.—Perhaps I may be permitted to offer a few observations upon this subject, in which I am, in some degree, interested. Allusions have been made to the conduct of Captain Dundas; and it has been said that he was my right hand man at the election. Now, I beg to deny that such was the case; for, in reality, Captain Dundas was in Devonport only two or three days during the canvass, which lasted about two months, and on that occasion he was down on Ordnance business. With regard to Mr. Foote, there can be no doubt that he was canvassed; for I believe that I waited on him, as on the other electors. I do not mean to say anything disrespectful of that gentleman; on the contrary, I believe that he is fully entitled to the very high character which he has received from Honourable Gentlemen opposite. I sincerely rejoice that this discussion has taken place, because it has afforded me the opportunity of contradicting many of the assertions which have been made with respect to the extent of the Government influence at Devonport. On examination of the votes given at the last election, I find that the number of public officers who voted for me was 170, whilst not less than 150 voted in favour of my opponent. This circumstance, I think, proves that no undue influence was exercised by the Government. In fact, the majority which I obtained was clearly that of the voters of the borough, and not of Government officers; and I have not heard a single complaint of Government interference.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL.—When the Honourable Member for Devonport rose, I thought it possible that he might be able to give some explanation of this transaction; but he is unable to do so, and I am bound to believe that he considers no Government influence was exercised at the late election. But I am inclined to think, from the energetic speech of the Noble Viscount, that there is more in the matter than we at first imagined. It is not often that the Noble Viscount indulges in such a glowing strain of eloquence; and he certainly would not have done so, on the present occasion, had he not considered there was something rotten in the case. I am glad that the Honourable Member for South Staffordshire has consented to inquire into the transaction; and I trust that the inquiry will be a searching one. Perhaps the Right Honourable Gentleman will allow me to ask how it happened that Mr. Hignett changed his agent at the particular period mentioned?

SIR H. VIVIAN.—The Honourable Baronet opposite has inquired whether Mr. Hignett has dismissed any other agents?—my answer is, that I know nothing of what he has done. I have nothing whatever to do with any question between him and his agents. He is at liberty, and has the right, to appoint whatever agents he likes, and to make any changes he thinks proper.

Mr. SHAW.—As the matter is to be inquired into, perhaps it would be as well to ascertain whether any other individuals have been dismissed; and whether it is the practice, when solicitors are appointed, to remove the country solicitors at the same time.

SIR DE LACY EVANS.—It has been repeatedly declared that Mr. Foote was not an officer of the Ordnance Department; and I cannot, therefore, understand what the board have to do with the transaction. The death of the old solicitor of the Ordnance took place at a time co-eval with the election, and the new solicitor thought fit to change his agent at that time. That appears to me to be sufficient explanation.

SIR J. Y. BULLER.—I understand the Honourable Member for Devonport to say that he had heard of no other complaint. Now, I have heard of the dismissal of Mr. Colman, the printer to the Ordnance, who voted for Mr. Dawson; and I have also been informed of the removal of a person named Underdown, from the powder hoy, on which he was employed, to Woolwich. The expense of removal will, of course, have to be borne by himself; and he will, besides, be separated from his wife and family, who are obliged to remain at Devonport. Thus, it appears, that three persons have suffered for the votes which they have given.

SIR H. VIVIAN. — The case is exactly this. A man in the employment of the Ordnance was sent to the hospital and replaced by Underdown. The individual died in the hospital, and Underdown now holds his situation. Politics have had nothing whatever to do with this arrangemant. I never before heard of the other case mentioned by the Honourable Baronet.

COLONEL SALWEY. — It appears to me that no càse has been made out against the Ordnance Department. I think the Honourable Baronet opposite (Sir J. Y. Buller) has taken a lesson of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire, in endeavouring "to obstruct the Government, inch by inch, and foot by foot."

LORD WORSLEY. — Perhaps Mr. Foote may attribute his dismissal to the vote given by him at the election. But the Right Honourable Gentleman distinctly states that the Board of Ordnance has no power to dismiss him; and that the only person who could do so is Mr. Hignett. He, therefore, is alone responsible.

SIR H. VERNEY. — I put it to the Honourable Gentlemen opposite whether, when they were in office, 150 of the employés of the Government would have been allowed to record their votes in direct opposition to their employers, as was done at the late election? That kind of liberty, in former times, would have been quite unpardonable. In the present case, it was quite natural for the new solicitor to engage a person less than seventy-eight years of age; and I am sorry that the Honourable Gentleman has consented to any further inquiry, because I think none is requisite. I must say that I have heard, with great regret, the distinction drawn by my Honourable Colleague between the dismissal of a tenant and the dismissal of a person holding a public situation. I think that neither tenant, tradesman, nor public officer ought to be interfered with in the discharge of his public duty; and I was sorry to hear such a doctrine or opinion broached.

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — My Honourable Colleague appears to have quite misunderstood me. I may fairly draw a distinction between two things, without sanctioning either of them. What I said was, that the Noble Viscount was misleading the Committee from business over which it had cognisance, to that with which it had nothing whatever to do; for this being a vote of public money, we have a right to inquire into its application. I beg to say that neither here nor elsewhere have I ever justified the turning out of tenants on political grounds.

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 207,000*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge for stores on account of Ordnance and military store branch services for the year 1840–41."

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 158,647*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of the Office of Ordnance, on account of the allowance of superannuated, retired, and half-pay officers; pensions for good services, inventions, and wounds; for pensions to widows and children of deceased officers late belonging to the several Ordnance military corps; also allowances, compensations, and emoluments, in the nature of superannuated or retired allowances, to persons late belonging to the Office of Ordnance, and to the barrack department, in respect to their having held any public office or employment of a civil nature, and also for the charge of widows' pensions, for the year 1840–41."

On the vote being put, —

Mr. HUME said: — I observe that a person named Alexander M'Intosh has retired, after only fourteen years' service, at the age of thirty-three years. I think that some explanation ought to be given on that point.

SIR H. VIVIAN. — He retired on account of ill health.

Mr. HUME. — I look to the principle; will he, on recovering his health, be taken back into the service?

SIR H. VIVIAN. — Most undoubtedly. If he recover, I shall be glad to employ him again. I always have acted in a similar manner, when opportunity has offered.

Mr. HUME. — I observe that R. Doyle has retired, after fifteen years' service; and there are other case of a similar nature.

SIR H. VIVIAN. — They are all extraordinary cases.

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding 285,636*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of the commissariat supplies in the United Kingdom and the colonies, for the year 1840–41."

Vote agreed to.

MARINE MUTINY BILL.—MUTINY BILL.

Brought from the Commons, read a first time, and to be read a second time to-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON.—My Lords, seeing the Noble Viscount (Viscount Melbourne) in his place, I would wish to submit to him the expediency of postponing the second reading of the Irish Municipal Reform Bill, which stands for Monday next. Your Lordships are aware that a Noble and Learned Friend of mine, who has taken a great share in the discussions upon this measure, on former occasions, in your Lordships' House, is at present unable to attend to his duties here, on account of severe indisposition, and is not likely to be well enough for some days to attend to parliamentary business; I would, therefore, submit to the Noble Viscount the propriety of postponing the second reading, in order that my Noble and Learned Friend may have an opportunity of meanwhile recovering his health, and of taking that share in the discussion which he has been accustomed to take.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — As the request of the Noble Duke for the postponement of the Corporations Bill is made upon such grounds, I of course cannot object to it. But, perhaps, he will not object to take the second reading on Monday, as the discussion will, I apprehend, be in Committee. But, with respect to another Bill (the Printed Papers Bill), which has been brought up from the House of Commons to-night, if that is to pass at all, it is necessary that it should pass as speedily as possible; and I hope, therefore, that the Noble Duke will not press for the postponement of that Bill.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — There are many reasons for delay with respect to that Bill, besides the absence of my Noble and Learned Friend. I can assure the Noble Viscount that no Member of either House of Parliament is more desirous than I am that the question should be settled; but I hardly think it would be satisfactory to the public to see it settled in the absence of all the Noble and Learned Lords who would naturally wish to take part in its discussion. The Noble and Learned Lord the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench is obliged to be absent in the discharge of the duties of his office; and he, of course, will be anxious to take part in it. My Noble and Learned Friend (Lord Wynford) also is absent, and the Chief Baron of the Exchequer is also absent on public business. There is another Noble and Learned Lord absent, who will be home shortly; and the public will expect that these Noble and Learned Lords should have an opportunity of delivering their opinions before we adopt any measure to settle the question; and I am sure that it would not answer the views of Government, or of any party in the country, to carry a measure of such importance in their absence.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — With respect to the second reading of the Corporations Bill, does the Noble Duke object to that?

The DUKE of WELLINGTON.—The second reading of that Bill will be the most important stage; and although I am not disposed to oppose the principle of the Bill, other Noble Lords are; and I think it ought not to be proceeded with in the absence of my Noble and Learned Friend, who took so much interest in all the stages of that measure when it was formerly before your Lordships. If there were any reason to hurry it forward, I would say "very well;" but, as it is,—as there is no such reason,—your Lordships ought to give time for the recovery of my Noble and Learned Friend.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I apprehend that there is no necessity for the presence of the Noble and Learned Lord, as he is not likely to oppose it, having once or twice acceded to the principle, and objected, only, to the details. But if the Noble Duke insist upon the postponement, of course I must concede it. However, your Lordships should remember that the cause of our being overburdened with business at a late period of the Session is the delay that usually takes place at this period.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — I beg the Noble Viscount's pardon. Whenever I propose a delay, I give a reason for it; and I believe I have given a good reason. I do not delay business because I neglect it, or because those under me neglect their duty in not bringing forward measures at the proper period. I never delay business on my own account; but I think I have a right to ask for delay on account of the Noble and Learned Lord, who is absent from illness, and on account of the other Noble and Learned Lords who are absent on their duties. When I think that we ought to have their assistance, and the public will expect to know their opinions, there is a reason for the postponement.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — I should like to know on what grounds the Noble Viscount supposes that the Noble and Learned Lord (Lyndhurst) will not object to the second reading of the Bill? It is not the same Bill that was before the House last Session; and, besides, the circumstances of Ireland have altered very much since that period. In addition to that Noble and Learned Lord, there are others unintentionally absent. One Noble Lord, connected with Ireland, and to whom the country is much indebted for the Committee which he obtained last Session, is expected to be in his place either before Easter or immediately after; and other Noble Lords are absent, who can never make up their minds to vote for the principle of this measure, which becomes every Session and every year of more importance to that country. The principle of the Bill once passed, will throw more power into the hands of the Catholics of Ireland, who want not representation, but the power which representation gives. Under these circumstances, I entreat the Noble Viscount not to press, unnecessarily, the second reading of a Bill which carries such a principle, before Easter.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — The Noble Marquess must recollect that, already, at the request of the Noble Duke, a long time has elapsed since the bringing in of this Bill; — a much longer time than the nature of the Bill would require. I am always anxious to pay attention to those who take so large a share in the debates as the Noble and Learned Lords who have been alluded to; but, at the same time, I think, if the business of the House is to be delayed because any Noble Lord may happen to be detained by any circumstances from attending in his place, no business will be got over at all. This Bill has already been delayed some weeks. Will the Noble Duke allow it to stand for Monday, with the understanding that, if the Noble and Learned Lord should not be able to attend then, it will be further postponed? Probably, then, we shall know better at what time the Noble and Learned Lord will be able to attend, and what day will be most convenient for him.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — It is of no use my saying whether I will or will not have the Bill put off with an understanding, because the Noble Lord may move the second reading on the day most convenient to him. All I can say is, that if the Noble Viscount does move the second reading in the absence of my Noble and Learned Friend, I shall act as I think proper on the occasion. I have told the Noble Lord the inconvenience of it. Many Noble Lords do not expect business at this period of the Session, as there is generally none; and therefore have not yet come from Ireland. I have stated the illness of my Noble and Learned Friend. If the Noble Viscount has any doubt on the subject, he can call the physician to the bar, and hear what he has to say. I have told the Noble Viscount, with great sorrow, that my Noble and Learned Friend will not be able to attend to business until late next week; and, under such circumstances, it has been usual to ask for a postponement; and, more than that, if one of the Noble Lords opposite were unwell, I fancy that we should be told the public business must stand over, to give them time for recovery. It is but fair to give the Noble and Learned Lord time for the recovery of his health before the Bill is brought forward. I have asked the Noble Viscount to do it; if he will not, I cannot help it.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — Suppose I were to put it off until Friday next, as the Noble Duke says that the Noble and Learned Lord will not be able to attend until the end of next week?

The DUKE of WELLINGTON.—That is not what I said. If the Noble Lord quotes my words, I beg that he will quote them correctly. I said that my Noble and Learned Friend would not be able to attend to public business till the end of next week.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — Well, Friday week; — the end of the week is Friday, is it not?

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — If the Noble Viscount persist in his intention to move a second reading on Friday, then I shall move a further adjournment until the arrival of the Noble Lords connected with Ireland from that country.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — Though I am disposed to concur in the suggestion of the Noble Duke, considering the reason for which it is made, I must remind your Lordships that already the second reading of this Bill has been delayed a very unusual length of time——

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — No!

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. —An unusual length of time since it came up to this House. Why, it came up early in March, and, at the suggestion of the Noble Duke, the second reading was postponed until the 30th; and now an application is made for the further adjournment of the question, on account of the absence of the Noble and Learned Lord. I concur entirely in the postponement to which my Noble Friend has consented, that the further consideration of the Bill should be deferred to Friday se'nnight; but, at the same time, I must protest against the doctrine which seems to be laid down by the Noble Marquess opposite, that no important business is to be brought into the House of Lords before Easter, or that Noble Lords are justified in absenting themselves from their duty upon an assumption, for which I know no good foundation, — in fact, that no public business of importance will be brought on before Easter. I shall, therefore, be opposed to the Noble Marquess, if he shall desire any further delay; because I do not think that the absence of Noble Lords in Ireland before Easter is any ground for not proceeding with measures affecting that country. I have always held it to be the duty of the Government to bring forward measures as early as possible. Again and again Her Majesty's Government have been reproached for not doing so; and I hope that your Lordships will not now allow it to go forth to the public, that it is a recognised principle in this House not to proceed with any matter of importance during the early part of the year.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — One word in explanation. What I wished to say was, that if this Bill should be read a second time on Friday se'nnight, the time between that and Easter would be so short, that the Committee could not be proceeded with. The Noble Lords connected with Ireland would thus be brought here much sooner than there would be any occasion for their presence.

The EARL of HADDINGTON. — I am sure, that if the Noble Viscount had understood the Noble Duke, he would not have made such an ungracious concession. The Noble Duke said that it would be late in the next week before the Noble and Learned Lord would be so far recovered from his indisposition as to be able to attend to any business at all. He did not say business in this House. The Noble Viscount proposed to bring the Bill on late in next week. The Noble and Learned Lord may not be able to attend, then; and, I must say, whatever the Noble and Learned Lord's opinion may be as to the second reading (and I have reason to believe that my Noble and Learned Friend will vote in favour of the second reading); still, there are many Noble Lords who will oppose the second reading, and they may naturally wish to know the Noble and Learned Lord's reasons for voting in its favour. With respect to what has fallen from the Noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), I am perfectly satisfied that the Noble Duke is the last man in the House who would wish to recognise the principle that no business whatever should be transacted before Easter. Nothing of that kind was stated by the Noble Duke. The House has now been sitting for two months, and no measure of the slightest importance has yet been originated before your Lordships.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — This Bill has been three weeks before the House.

The EARL of HADDINGTON. — What I stated was, that no Bill of the slightest importance has been originated in this House since the commencement of the Session. The Government has left off the practice of originating business in this House of Parliament; and it is, therefore, owing to that fact, that the time of the House before Easter is occupied almost entirely in the presentation of petitions. I hope the Noble Viscount will consent to put off the reading to a later day.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — Let it be Monday se'nnight, then.

Second reading (which stands appointed for Monday next), put off to Monday, the 6th of April next; and the Lords summoned.

METROPOLITAN POLICE COURTS BILL.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— My Lords, I move that this Bill be now read a second time.

LORD WYNFORD.— I would suggest to the Noble Marquess that a Bill like the present, which has for its object greatly to curtail the powers of the magistrates of the metropolitan counties should not be proceeded with, with such precipitation. Those magistrates should, in my opinion, have time given them to examine into its provisions, and to make representations against them, if they should think it necessary to do so.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.—I can assure the Noble and Learned Lord that he has greatly mistaken the nature and effect of the measure. It takes away no power from the local magistrate; it merely goes to explain, more clearly and intelligibly than before, the regulations under which the metropolitan police courts are, in future, to be conducted. If the Noble and Learned Lord will allow the Bill to be read a second time, he will have a full opportunity of stating his views upon the subject, on going into Committee.

Bill read a second time (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

THE CORN LAWS.

LORD ASHBURTON. — My Lords, with the permission of the House, I wish to ask the Noble Viscount at the head of the Government a question on the subject of the corn laws. The House must be aware of the great importance of this subject, more especially to the agricultural interests of the country, whose prospects and fortunes are at stake in the matter now under agitation, though not yet under discussion in either House of Parliament, but under an intense system of agitation, got up by different associations throughout the country. I know, myself, of a great number of persons who are disposed to petition the House on this subject; but who, nevertheless, have abstained from doing so, in a great measure, from the confidence which they have felt in the declaration, made by the Noble Viscount on the subject last Session, and because they say they see no reason to suppose that any alteration has since taken place in his mind. I know, very well, that the Noble Viscount might present a petition, as he has done this evening, the prayer of which should be in opposition to his expressed opinion; but, considering the great interests at stake, I should wish to be permitted to ask the Noble Viscount whether he still retains the same opinion on the subject, and whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure for the alteration of the corn laws?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — Certainly, I remain entirely of the same opinion which I have already expressed, — that opinion being, that it would be unwise, and in the highest degree imprudent, totally to repeal the corn laws; at the same time reserving to myself my own opinion as to any modification in the existing laws which might hereafter be thought proper, or appear expedient. I remain of the same opinion still; and, unquestionably, it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government, as a Government, to bring forward or support any motion for the repeal of the corn laws, or for any change or alteration in those laws.

ILLEGAL PROCESSIONS (IRELAND.)

The DUKE of BUCKINGHAM. — Seeing the Noble Marquess the Secretary for the Home Department in his place, I would take the liberty to ask him a question relative to a matter which has been communicated to me by a gentleman resident in the county of Carlow, with whom I am well acquainted, and who is a person of the highest respectability. That gentleman has stated to me, that on a certain day a number of persons, amounting to upwards of 1200, headed by two Roman Catholic priests, and carrying two banners, inscribed with the word "temperance," and having medals suspended round their necks, paraded the town of Carlow, and that they were permitted to do so under the special sanction of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. It is also stated, that Mr. Tuckey, a magistrate, memorialised the Lord Lieutenant to grant that permission. A handbill was also circulated through the town. The question I would ask is, whether the Noble Marquess is aware of these facts?

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.—In answer to the Noble Duke, I have only to say that his statement is the first intimation I have had of the transaction. I know Mr. Tuckey very well; he is a most respectable man, and I should doubt very much his lending himself to any illegal transaction. However, I will make inquiries of my Noble Friend the Secretary for Ireland.

EXCHEQUER RECORDS.

LORD REDESDALE. — My Lords, on examining the papers which have been laid on the table of your Lordships' House, relating to the destruction of the Exchequer records, I find that those which relate to the actual destruction of the papers commence on the 17th of March, 1838, and end on the 18th of December in the same year. Now, your Lordships will remember that a Bill has been for some time in operation, by which all the records of the country are placed under the control of the Master of the Rolls. Therefore the Exchequer has no authority to act as it has acted. I should be glad if the Noble Lord opposite would give some further explanation of this matter.

LORD MONTEAGLE. — I am very sorry that the question should be put to me in the absence of my Noble Friend the Master of the Rolls, because, if he were present, he would be able to set me right, if the reply I am about to give should be founded in any misapprehension. I believe the Noble Lord has not attentively considered the Act of Parliament, or he would have found, that though it is perfectly true that certain records were, by that Act, to be placed under the control of the Master of the Rolls, — an office at present filled by a Noble Lord whose manner of discharging its duties entitles him to the gratitude of the House; — those documents are specified in the Act, and they are the Pell records, the custody of which is so transferred from the Exchequer to the Rolls. The documents referred to in the Returns have no relation whatever to the Pells, but are documents over which the Rolls has no power to exercise any control. The papers which have been destroyed were not of the nature of Pells, but were entirely of another character.

The EARL of ABERDEEN.—I am sorry to say that I fear a great deal of carelessness has been displayed in the destruction of those records. I have no doubt that a great portion of them are utterly worthless, as the Noble Lord has before stated. But the persons who have been employed in this proceeding have either performed the work very negligently, or were very incompetent to the task. I understand that, at present, most of the papers which have been mutilated and sold are in the hands of auctioneers in the metropolis, for the purpose of being sold to the highest bidder, and therefore they cannot have been so worthless as the Noble Lord has described them to be. By mere accident, however, I saw some of those documents on Saturday, when I happened to be at the British Museum, on other business of the trust. A portion of those very papers were brought to the Museum for sale on that day; they had fallen into the hands of a bookseller, who made up a lot for that purpose. They refer to various subjects, and no doubt the trustees of the British Museum will purchase them; but I think it is a little hard that the public should be made to buy their own records after this fashion. I had the curiosity to look at these papers, and the first thing I saw was a letter from the Papal Secretary of State to Leo X., addressed to Cardinal Wolsey, transmitted with the cap and sword of state, which it was customary for the Popes of Rome to send to the most favoured foreign princes of Christendom, from time to time. The next document, which consisted of several sheets, was a list and description of the jewels bought for the use of Queen Elizabeth. I also heard of another paper, which I did not see, which was an account of the expenses of Charles I. during his imprisonment. It may be asked, of what use could these papers be? In this philosophical age it might be difficult to assign any particular use for them; but it cannot be denied that history, more or less, is made up from such documents, and there is always a strong desire among the learned and the wise to preserve them. I do not think that such papers ought to be sold or destroyed. On looking at the Return which has been presented by desire of the Noble Lord (Lord Redesdale), it appears to me that the business was from the first gone into in a way that could not be satisfactory. Sir John Newport writes about the "unpleasant and disagreeable business in which he was engaged;" and the chief clerk also writes in the same style, and seems to think that his very health would suffer from poring over those musty records. If these persons undertook the work in that way, what could be expected? I know many persons who would have sat down to such a task with as much appetite and delight as others would sit down to a feast. I think, most undoubtedly, that negligence must have existed somewhere.

LORD MONTEAGLE.—I trust your Lordships will permit me to say a few words, in justice to my right honourable friend who preceded me in office; for, personally, the House will please to recollect, I have no concern whatever in this proceeding, having been called on to become Comptroller of the Exchequer after the destruction of those documents. Still, I am not the less disposed to do justice to my right honourable friend. When so much is said about the destruction of important papers, Noble Lords, and particularly the Noble Earl, seem to exclude from their memory that, had it not been for the interposition of my right honourable friend, the whole of the papers would have been destroyed. For fifty years previously, the records in question, about which so much anxiety now is expressed, were left in an open vault, subject to the irruption of the tide from the Thames; and they might have been wholly destroyed, but for the interposition of my right honourable friend. That fact is proved by the documents now before the House. But it has been said that carelessness has been manifested in the discharge of this business. Now, the course pursued by my right honourable friend, was, to employ persons most conversant with the documents; and among them was a gentleman who had served under the late Lord Grenville for fifty years. In the Return is a letter from Mr. Devon, who is a gentleman of great antiquarian research, in proof of the competency of the persons employed in the business. Many of the documents which have been sold may have been valuable as matters of curiosity, but not as public records. Moreover, they may not be originals, but copies. Was the letter from Rome, which the Noble Earl has mentioned, an original or a copy?

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — An original.

LORD MONTEAGLE. — Then, I doubt extremely whether that document came out of the lot which was sold.

[Cries of "Hear!" and much laughter.]

They may have come out of the Pells.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — There can be no doubt that a great deal of valuable documentary evidence has been recovered by the exertions of Sir John Newport; but that is a reason why all should have been examined with more accuracy. Had they been all Exchequer records, a cursory examination might have sufficed. But they were composed of a vast variety of materials; and I would only say, though not very much accustomed to such documents, that I found no difficulty at all in reading those to which I have referred. Therefore there must have been great negligence and want of attention, or the examination would have been more complete and satisfactory. I shall be much surprised if the public has not to purchase other records, besides those I have mentioned.

LORD REDESDALE. — My Lords, I have been reading the Act of Parliament referred to by the Noble Lord (Monteagle), and my reading of it is very different from that of the Noble Lord. It appears clear to me that all records in the custody of any officer of the Exchequer were transferred to the custody of the Master of the Rolls, by the first clause of the 1st & 2d Victoria, cap. 94., and that the proceedings of the Exchequer have been illegal. The Return itself furnishes a clear proof of negligence, inasmuch as Mr. Devon wrote to the Comptroller of the Exchequer on the 24th of March, 1836, stating that the ancient documents were lying in a vault, which exposed them to destruction; but not one single step to save them was made until March, 1838; so that, after they had been pointed out as being in a perishable condition, they were allowed to remain and rot for two years more. Then, with regard to the proceedings of the Exchequer, it appears that there were about "a hundred boxes of papers so piled upon each other, that the contents, without great labour, could not be ascertained." But it does not follow that those documents should be treated as waste paper, and that a contract should be made with any person who chose to enter into it, to remove those boxes at 8*l.* per ton, which contract has been made. All those documents, which the British Museum will have to purchase back, have been thus sold at 8*l.* per ton. Some private individuals have referred to me several documents which have been recovered. Some of them are more interesting than others, of course; but amongst them I met with an account of the pay of the ships engaged against the Armada, stating the number of men on board. That paper has been mutilated; but why it was mutilated, I am at a loss to know. It could not be brought forward in any objectionable form against the Government. It was, at all events, a curious document, and signed by Lord Burleigh. There was another document, apparently the work of some lawyer, who was employed in an investigation of the Babington conspiracy; and some others, equally curious, which I have seen. Altogether, from what I have heard and seen, I must say there has been, in this case, very great carelessness. Whether there has been more than carelessness I do not feel that I am now qualified to decide.

TREATY WITH AUSTRIA.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — I wish o give notice to the Noble Viscount now n the woolsack (Viscount Melbourne) hat I will, to-morrow, make some inuiries respecting the treaty entered nto with Austria the year before last, articularly with respect to the navigaion of the Danube.

CLERGY RESERVES (CANADA).

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON. — My Lords, I beg, in pursuance of Her Majesty's command, to deliver to your Lordhips a copy of an Act passed by the Legislature of Upper Canada, to provide or the sale of the clergy reserves, and or the distribution of the proceeds thereof; ogether with copy of a despatch from he Governor General of Canada, dated 2d January, 1840: and, also, copies and xtracts of correspondence relative to the e-union of the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada: and to move that these ocuments be printed.

The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY. — My Lords, I confess that it as been with considerable surprise I have his evening perceived that the Noble Viscount has seen fit to lay upon your Lordships' table a Bill of such importance, without a single observation as to its ontents. I should have expected from Her Majesty's Government some exlanation of what was intended to be done with respect to this measure; and I aprehend that your Lordships will be of he same opinion, when I state to you hat the contents of this Bill are. Proably it may not be known that the proision for the Protestant church establishment in Canada consists solely of these lergy reserves. Now, it was provided by n Act, passed in the year 1791, that one eventh portion of the Crown lands should e set apart for the maintenance of the rotestant clergy in Canada. It would e exceedingly improper in me to advert o all the proceedings which have taken lace upon this subject; but I would emark, that, in order to prevent any imroper interference by the local Legisature with these reserved lands, it has een enacted, that any act of that body o alter the disposition of those clergy eserves should be laid for thirty days efore both Houses of Parliament beore it should pass into a law. In the resent case, this wholesome provision ill have been but partially complied with, s the Easter holidays must be taken out f the next thirty days. I think it exeedingly unfair that your Lordships' atention should not have been specially called to a Bill of such importance; the more particularly as we are to have but twenty-three, instead of thirty, days for its consideration. Now, this Bill actually repeals the Act of 1791. It gives one quarter of the reserved lands to the Church of England, one quarter to the Church of Scotland, and two quarters — one half of the clergy reserves — to the Dissenters of every denomination in that country, even including the Roman Catholics ! My Lords, this is a Bill which I consider so entirely objectionable in its principle, — and so objectionable, also, in its details, — that I have looked with anxiety for some statement from Her Majesty's Government as to the views which they entertain in relation to the measure. I conceive that the Government has also done wrong in another matter. Your Lordships know that great objections are entertained to this Bill in Canada; and time ought to have been given to those parties in Canada who conceive that they are aggrieved by the Bill, in order to make known the reasons for their opposition. There is another point to which I wish to call the attention of your Lordships. These clergy reserves are not sufficient, at present, for the maintenance of the clergy — very far from it, indeed; and yet, these resources being inadequate for their present object, it is the intention of this Bill to distribute the clergy reserves amongst all the religious denominations in that country. As I have already stated, the Church of England is to have one quarter of those reserves, the Church of Scotland another quarter, and the remaining two quarters are to be distributed amongst the various denominations of Dissenters in that country, whom it would be almost impossible to enumerate. I have made these observations, because I felt that I should have failed in my duty, and because the Church would have considered it a great neglect of duty, on my part, if I had lost a moment in calling the attention of your Lordships to this question. It is not a party affair. God forbid that I should approach such a subject with any party feeling whatever ! It concerns the very existence of the Church in Canada. This is the beginning of a principle which is now working, and has been working for some time. Proceedings for a similar end have been in contemplation, and — whether legal or not — have partly been put into execution, in another colony, where the same considerations for the application of the principle do not exist, — I mean in Australia, — where sixteen or seventeen twenty-thirds of the population are members of the English Established Church. In that colony, also, reserves were set apart, which have since been resumed. I wish to say nothing unfair, and therefore I will only observe, that reducing the Church of England to an equality with all other sects, and depriving it of all the revenues which have been set apart for its support by Parliament in former times, is, at least, a sudden proceeding. I shall, however, go no further into this subject. I may, perhaps, be told, that I have acted unfairly in saying so much already; but I justify myself on the urgency of the case. Your Lordships have but twenty-three days, at the utmost, to deliberate on the subject; and I most earnestly recommend this measure to your Lordships' attention, and I ask you whether, by your silence, you will assent to a measure which will tend very nearly to the extinction of the Church of England in Canada? This Bill is also highly reprehensible on another ground. When every religious party in Canada is struggling to increase its numbers, your Lordships may easily guess to what a height religious dissensions will arise under the present scheme for distributing the clergy reserves.

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON.—I am exceedingly sorry that the Most Reverend Prelate has misunderstood the objects with which I have laid the Bill on the table. It was far from my intention to take the House by surprise, and raise a debate without any notice; and therefore I was proceeding, when the Most Reverend Prelate interrupted me, to move that the Bill be printed, so that it might be placed in your Lordships' hands. I have no doubt, when that is done, that due explanation will be given of the measure.

The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY.—I am extremely sorry that I misunderstood the Noble Lord, and, consequently, interrupted him; but I really thought the measure of such importance as to justify me in calling for an immediate explanation.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — My Lords, I do not mean to accuse the Most Reverend Prelate of any unfairness in making the observations which have fallen from him; but, on the other hand, I must say that the charge of unfairness which he has made against Her Majesty's Government is not one which can, in justice, be sustained. The Government have done that which is prescribed by the Act of Parliament. The Government are directed by the Act of Parliament to lay the Bill on the table of the House; and, if the Bill should remain unobjected to for thirty days after it has been laid on the table, it will be competent to the Government to advise Her Majesty to give that Act the Royal assent, which, unquestionably, it is the intention of the Government to do. It will be for Noble Lords who object to the provisions of the Bill to take any measures with respect to it which they may think proper. As to what the Most Reverend Prelate has said about the period of time allowed for the consideration of the Bill being too short, I may remark, that we are in the habit of taking a very long period for deliberation on measures coming before us, and of deferring business somewhat unnecessarily. But, admitting the great importance of this subject, still I think that, considering the knowledge we already possess respecting it, and the discussions that have taken place upon it, thirty days is a period amply sufficient for examining the measure, and for enabling any Noble Lord who may have objections to it to interpose in a manner that it is competent for him to do. I cannot think, therefore, that, in pursuing the course which the Act of Parliament obliges them to take, Her Majesty's Government have at all laid themselves open to the charge which the Most Reverend Prelate has thought proper to make against them.

The BISHOP of LONDON.—My Lords, I should have expected that, in a matter of such importance, the Government would have given some intimation of its opinion as to the merits of this legislative measure. The Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies said that he would give that intimation when he laid the Bill on the table of the other House; and the Noble Viscount (Viscount Melbourne) has now intimated that it is the intention of the Government to advise her Majesty to give her assent to this Bill. I have heard that opinion from the Noble Viscount with the greatest pain; because I believe this measure to be most unconstitutional and iniquitous in its character. The Bill professes to consult the good of the Church, and, at the same time, it despoils it of all its property; restoring, afterwards, one fourth of that which legally belongs to it. It may be necessary to consult the learned judges on this point; and therefore I trust that no unseemly haste will be exhibited in the disposal of it. I trust that the House will not suffer the Legislature to disgrace itself by passing such a measure.

LORD HOLLAND. — The Right Reverend Prelate seems to have overlooked the fact that this is not a Bill in Parliament, but a Bill which has received the sanction of the colonial Legislature.

The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY. — I beg the Noble Baron's pardon. I had no idea that this Bill was any other than a measure of the colonial Legislature.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — My Lords, I do not think that, considering the importance of this measure, and the important interests likely to be affected by it, the Government could have delayed this measure; but, at the same time, I feel the inconvenience of laying the Bill on the table in the absence, pro tempore, of all the Noble and Learned Lords and all the learned judges. I regret this absence the more, because I know that a Right Reverend Prelate intends to put a question to the judges on the legal merits of the Bill, it being his opinion that, in passing it, the colonial Legislature has exceeded the powers granted under the Quebec Act. With respect to the Bill itself, the Most Reverend Prelate has indulged in some strong expressions of opinion respecting it; but, as I understand, it was carried by a majority of the Assembly, fairly representing the people of Canada, which agreed to it, as a measure of compromise, for the purpose of settling the most difficult question which has ever disturbed that colony. Such being the case, it will be not without great consideration and considerable hesitation that I shall join in any vote for the purpose of inducing the House to prevent the Bill passing into law.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — I should wish to know the date of this Bill, and whether it was passed before or after the reception of a certain despatch from the Secretary of State, relative to the administration of the civil government of Upper Canada?

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON. — The Bill passed the House of Assembly on the 15th of January, 1840; and the Legislative Council on the 20th of January, 1840.

Papers delivered, and to be printed.

POOR LAWS (IRELAND).

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — I give notice that I will, on Friday next, bring under your Lordships' notice the manner in which the elections for poor law guardians are now carried on in Ireland. I am sorry to say that, in consequence of the violent way in which the influence of the Roman Catholic clergy is brought to bear on these elections, they have become a nuisance so intolerable as to make it a question whether a Committee may not be necessary to inquire into the matter.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. —As I may find it requisite to make some inquiries, I would suggest to the Noble Marquess to fix his motion for some later day.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — Very well, I will withdraw my notice, and communicate with the Noble Marquess as to the most convenient day.

CONSTABULARY FORCE ACT.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — May I ask the Noble Marquess whether any measure is in progres for the purpose of amending the Constabulary Force Act?

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — The measure has been brought into the other House of Parliament, and will, I believe, be read a second time on Friday next.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I beg to state that, unless Her Majesty's Government consent to pay a considerable portion of the expense, there will be no chance of the county magistrates agreeing to adopt the measure. Unless a principle be acted on similar to that adopted in Ireland, where the public pay one half of the cost, I know the magistrates will not be satisfied. I do not say they are in the right, but I know that such is their feeling.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — The Noble Lord should recollect that the appointments are differently regulated in the sister country. If the Government pay half the expense, they have the whole of the appointments.

TITHE COMMUTATION ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read a first time; and to be printed.

VACCINATION EXTENSION BILL.

To be ingrossed; Bill read a third time; amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

CHURCH BUILDING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Report of the amendments to be received on Thursday next; and the Lords summoned.

VACCINATION.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — My Lords, I have a petition to present which has been sent to me from a remote part of Ireland, and which is rather curious in its nature. It is signed by all the medical practitioners of the county of Galway; and I am glad that it has been intrusted to me, as it gives me an opportunity of making known that Ireland is included in the Bill for the extension of vaccination introduced by the Noble Baron opposite.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — Ireland has been included from the first introduction of the Bill.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — I am very glad to hear that that has been the case; but I am desirous of stating, as the fact is not known publicly, that the provisions of the present measure will extend to Ireland; and I am happy to say so, because the necessity for it is far greater in Ireland than in England. I am informed, by a letter received from a magistrate of the county of Galway, that persons of notoriously bad character have been going about the country bribing the inhabitants—of some small village, perhaps — to allow themselves to be inoculated with the small-pox, and then going about telling all the people round about that the small-pox is in the neighbourhood, and obtaining money for inoculating them, as a preventive.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — Ireland was included in the original Bill. The only Noble Lord who doubted the propriety of including that country was the Colleague of the Noble Marquess, — I mean the Noble Secretary for the Home Department.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I would remind the Noble Lord that my only objection was a dread that the machinery of the Irish Poor Law would not admit of our carrying the Act into effect in Ireland.

The EARL of ROSEBERY. — I trust that the provisions of the Bill will be applied to Scotland as well as England and Ireland, otherwise the benefits which are to be expected from the measure will be counteracted, or, at any rate, lessened, by increasing the danger of contagion. I do really hope, therefore, that the Noble Lord, who, with so much promptitude and spirit, has introduced the Bill, will communicate with the Noble Lords near him who are connected with Scotland, and that he will also enter into some communication with the Lord Advocate for that country, so that some mode may be devised by which the Bill may be extended to Scotland as well as England and Ireland, and thus be rendered more efficient.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I am quite ready to admit that the measure would be more efficient if it could be applied to Scotland; but I have found that the only available body with whom I could co-operate was the Kirk Session, and they have no funds to work with. The House of Commons may be able to supply the requisite funds, and will, possibly, approach the Kirk Session with a better chance of success.

The EARL of HADDINGTON. — My Lords, as I was the person who recommended my Noble Friend to be cautious how he approached the Kirk Session, I wish to state that, since then, I have been in communication with several persons in Scotland, and from their information I am led to believe that it would be quite possible to introduce a beneficial measure into Scotland. I think that the suggestion of the Noble Earl opposite, respecting the Lord Advocate, is a very proper one; and it is one which I trust will be adopted by my Noble Friend.

VACCINATION EXTENSION BILL.

The Marquess of Lansdowne presented a petition of members of the medical profession in the county and county of the town of Galway, praying that the Bill may be made to apply to Ireland and that the present practice of inoculation may be in future prevented — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

EAST INDIA PRODUCE.

PRINTED PAPERS BILL.

SIR R. H. INGLIS. — I have, Sir, to present to the House a petition from certain inhabitants of Leeds, in Yorkshire; which, after referring to the power that has been recently exercised by this House, in committing to prison a British subject, for seeking redress at the hands of the legal tribunals of his country, for an injury that he had sustained, proceeds to comment upon the further extraordinary exercise of power by the House, in committing the attorney of that individual, and his two clerks; and concludes by praying for the immediate discharge of all the persons who are now in custody under the warrant of the House. I will only add, Sir, that this is one of the most respectful and best written petitions that has ever been placed in my hands to present.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — I, also, have to present a petition in connection with this subject. It is signed by a large number of the most respectable attorneys and solicitors of this metropolis. The petitioners say that they consider some measure to enable the House to assert its privileges and protect its servants during the recess may be necessary; and they therefore pray that the Printed Papers Bill may be allowed to pass into a law.

The petitions were severally ordered to lie on the table.

LORD ELIOT. — Sir, I will take this opportunity to give notice that, on Thursday, I shall move for the immediate production of the papers connected with South Australian emigration, which were ordered on my motion on the 14th of February, and which have not been yet produced.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. — I beg to give notice that, to-morrow, I shall move that the House be called over on the 31st instant.

PRUSSIAN LEAGUE.

Mr. BAINES. — I wish, also, to give notice of a motion that I intend to make, on an early day, for copies of any correspondence between the British and Prussian Governments connected with the operation of the Prussian league.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I beg to give notice that, in the event of any measure being brought before this House for the appointment of additional judges in the courts of equity, unaccompanied by any provision for improvement in the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, I shall, before the second stage of such Bill, draw the attention of the House to the necessity for some improvement in that jurisdiction.

CHURCH EXTENSION.

Mr. C. LUSHINGTON. — I beg to give notice that, to-morrow, I propose to present a petition from a large and influential meeting, held at the Freemasons' Tavern, on the 19th instant, and at which His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex presided, against any grant for the purpose of church extension.

MESSAGE FROM THE CROWN —LORD SEATON.

Lord John Russell appeared at the bar of the House with a Message from Her Majesty, which was read by Mr. Speaker, as follows: —

Victoria R.

Her Majesty having taken into consideration the important services rendered by John Lord Seaton, a lieutenant general in Her Majesty's army, and late Governor General of Upper and Lower Canada, in the course of the events which have taken place in those provinces; and being desirous to confer some signal mark of Her favour for these and other distinguished merits, upon the said John Lord Seaton, and the two next surviving heirs male of the body of the said John Lord Seaton, recommends to Her faithful Commons the adoption of such measures as may be necessary for the accomplishment of this purpose.

V. R.

On the motion of Lord J. Russell, the said Message ordered to be taken into consideration upon Friday next.

CLERGY RESERVES CANADA.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I beg, now, to move the Order of the Day for the consideration of the Canada correspondence, and the Clergy Reserves Bill.

The Order of the Day having been read, —

Mr. PAKINGTON said: — I beg the Noble Lord's pardon for interrupting him, but I believe this is the proper time for me to present certain petitions, in connection with this subject, which have been placed in my hands for that purpose. The first of these petitions is from the township of St. George, Cape Breton. It complains of the destitution of the British American colonies, as regards religious instruction, and prays that the House will refuse its sanction to any measure the object of which is to deprive the clergy of the endowments which were formerly set apart for their benefit. I have also to present a great many other petitions — in all fifty-one — from as many townships in the province of Upper Canada. They are from the clergy of Upper Canada; Tiny and Tay; Stamford; Glanford; Thorold; Mountain; Saltfleet; Trafalgar; Packenham; Emily; Winchester; Esquising; Drummond; Barton; Edwardsburgh; South Sherbrooke; Bathurst; Binbrok; Williamsburg; Finch; Bertie and Humberstone; Matilda; Grimsby; London (two petitions); Ramsay, &c.; Chatham; Carodoc; Yonge Street; Woolwich; Preslinch; Hamilton; Scarborough and York; Markham; Nichol; Eramosa; Oxford; Adgala; Indian Lands, Brantford, &c.; Albion; Caledon; West Guillenbury; Tecumseth; Dundas; Ancaster; Kemptville; Goulbourn; Niagara Vaughn Markham and York; Goderich, &c.; Brantford; and Adelaid; all in the same province. The last of these is signed by a number of Indians of the Mohawk and Oneiga tribes, who have been converted to Christianity, and profess the doctrines of the Church of England. The whole of these petitions point out, in the most forcible terms, how utterly inadequate is the present provision for the advancement of religion, in that country; and pray this Honourable House not to permit the provision which was set apart for the support of the Protestant Church in Upper Canada to be diverted to any other purpose. Every signature affixed to these petitions is authenticated, either by the clergyman of the district, or by the missionary by whom the petitioners have been converted. Opposite the name of every individual who has signed the petition is placed the number of persons composing his family; and the number of persons represented in this way, by the signatures, amounts to 22,127. I have also another petition to present, Sir, and one which is of very great importance: it comes from the clergy of Upper Canada, signed, on their behalf, by the Bishop of Montreal, and prays for an extension of the means of religious instruction in that province; and for an extension of that instrumentality which the petitioners consider presents the only efficient means for that purpose. It prays particularly for an ecclesiastical appropriation of the clergy reserves.

Sir T. Cochrane, Sir R. Inglis, Mr T. D. Acland, and Mr. Goulburn also presented petitions praying for an ecclesiastical appropriation of the clergy reserves in the British North American provinces, and a consequent increase of the means for the extension of the church establishment in those colonies,—from the south-east coast of Nova Scotia; Saint Paul, Halifax (Nova Scotia); Granville (Nova Scotia); St. James, Newport (Nova Scotia); and Ashton under Lyne. — Severally to lie on the table.

ORDNANCE ESTIMATES.

SIR J. Y. BULLER. — Before this debate commences, I wish to ask the Master General of the Ordnance whether he intends to bring up the Report of the Ordnance Estimates to-night, and to give any explanation in reference to the question I put to him the other evening?

SIR H. VIVIAN. — I propose to bring up the Report after the Canada question is disposed of; and I shall then be prepared to answer the question of the Honourable Baronet. If there should not be time this evening, I will do so at any other time that may be convenient.

CANADA.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, I have been anxious to take the earliest possible opportunity, after the arrival of the proposals of the Governor General of Upper Canada, to bring under the consideration of the House the important subjects to which those proposals relate. I cannot but feel that the importance of the subject will, of itself, induce the House to pay the utmost attention to it. The subjects of Her Majesty residing in Upper and Lower Canada amount to more than 1,000,000; some calculate them at 1,100,000, and some at 1,200,000. They form one of the great families of the American continent. They reside partly in one of the great valleys of the new continent, near the great outlets which communicate with the interior of America, and partly near that series of magnificent lakes which are found on the borders of Upper Canada. To provide for the interests of such a population, and to establish the species of government which is best suited to that population, — a population likely to increase not only by birth, but by emigration, — must, I am quite convinced, be to this House a matter of the deepest interest. But, Sir, beyond this, I am anxious to bring forward a measure which may, if possible, put a stop, except on very rare occasions, to that interference of Parliament which has been rendered necessary of late years. It is now nearly twelve years since Mr. Huskisson, holding the office which I now have the honour to hold, stated the grievances which, as he conceived, affected the people of Canada; and he proposed a Committee of this House upon the subject. Since that time, there have been several measures introduced into Parliament respecting Canada; there have been various inquiries; and events of very deep importance, connected with this subject, have occurred. There is the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons; there have been inquiries by several Commissions, and voluminous documents have been produced, going into almost every detail connected with the state of Canada, — with their laws, with their institutions, with the pecular state of some of those institutions, — and stating certain grievances which ought to be remedied. There have, likewise, occurred, in the course of that time, in two successive years, attempts to separate those provinces from their allegiance to Her Majesty, both by open insurrection in those provinces themselves, and by the inroads of armed banditti from without. These are events, enough, in themselves, to require the attention of Parliament to be directed to the subject, when a measure is introduced, with a view, if possible, of effecting a settlement of these important matters. But, after all the Reports that have been received,—after the different missions that have taken place to Canada, — and after hearing the objections made to the general views of the legislation of the Government last year, it was thought best, by Her Majesty's Ministers, that some one having the entire confidence of the Government, who had taken a share in it, and of the various measures which had been adopted in the course of the events to which I have alluded, should proceed to Canada, and endeavour to ascertain, upon the spot, — combining, as he would, knowledge of the proceedings of the Parliament of this country with the evidence and sentiments of the best informed persons in Upper and Lower Canada,—it was thought right that such a person should go out to Canada, in order to give such a Report to Her Majesty's Government as might enable them to bring forward a measure fortified upon such authorities, and, as far as possible, consistent with the wishes of the inhabitants of Canada. But, although I conceive this step to have been not only expedient, but to have become, by the course of events, absolutely necessary, in order to enable us to frame such a measure, and to go through all its details, I confess that I could not adopt the measure which I am about to ask leave to bring in, unless I were able, as one of the advisers of the Crown, to recommend that some great mark of approbation be conferred upon that distinguished and Gallant Officer who, being kept on two occasions in a position of great difficulty and danger, manfully made head against the danger which threatened the Government—then reposing in his hands,—against insurrection from within, and the prospect of invasion from without; and who, by his knowledge of that mighty art which he had practised under its great master, in modern days, the Duke of Wellington, and by his noble firmness, resisted the progress of disaffection within those provinces, and drove back those hordes which invaded her dominions from without.

[Cries of " Hear, hear, hear ! " from both sides of the House.]

It was therefore with signal satisfaction that I brought down the message from the Crown, which you, Sir, read to the House this day. But, in proceeding to state the grounds of the measure which I am now about to apply for, I must first say, that I am ready to agree that the measure of a union would not have been expedient, if it had been found, as was foreseen by some, on inquiry from those most interested in the settlement of these matters, that the people of Canada would regard it with an absolute repugnance. The present Governor General of Canada has ascertained, by the most accurate means, the sentiments of the people of Canada with regard to it. I should say that he could not obtain, by any constitutional means, the general sentiments of the people of Lower Canada; but he called together the Assembly, which was not convened by himself, but by his predecessors, and received from it certain resolutions agreeing to the principle of the union, as regarded its general object; but leaving the details to the settlement of the Imperial Parliament. On proceeding to Upper Canada, the proposition was much discussed and debated in the Assembly, and in the Legislative Council. There, some who were generally in favour of it wished to affix certain terms to it; but, upon a full debate and consideration of the entire question, the Assembly and Council came to a resolution, in accordance with the proposition of the Governor General, in favour of the union, and unfettered by any restrictions or stipulations. Soon after this they proposed an Address, in which they alluded to certain points which they were desirous of having arranged to their satisfaction; but they, at the same time, expressly declared that they would not make their consent to the measure provisional upon the exception of these points. Therefore, there being this authority from the provinces, and so much agreement as to the general proposition of a union, I must take, now, the evils which I think such a union particularly calculated to remedy.

It was stated by Mr. Huskisson, in 1828, that great evils arose from the nature of the feudal law obtaining in Lower Canada, from the extreme complexity and intricacy of the tenures of land, and also from the fact, that the state of the representation gave such a preponderance to the French race, that those of the British race found themselves aggrieved and oppressed by that superiority. Now, I think, with regard to those evils, that a union does seem an appropriate remedy for them. The Earl of Durham has shown, in a clearer manner than had been shown before, how very little we ought to confound the conduct of the Assembly of Lower Canada with the views of the advocates of constitutional freedom. In fact, the Assembly of Lower Canada, while they resorted to all the weapons of freedom,—while they used constitutional arguments for the prevalence of free institutions,—were employing those arguments in order to establish a gross monopoly in the hands of their own race; and to exclude from the enjoyment of those rights, to which they were entitled, the general body of British inhabitants. Lord Durham has shown, I think, most clearly, that whilst, to all appearance, the advocacy of the constitutional doctrines was confined to M. Papineau and to the leading Members of the Assembly, the English party found refuge in, and had the support of, the Legislative Council; and were therefore obliged to take the side of prerogative in opposition to the popular Assembly, while they were really more attached to those great principles of liberty which it is our pride to uphold. In fact, the Assembly used the weapons of Hampden in support of the principles of Strafford; and, while they possessed the sympathy of a considerable number of the inhabitants of the United States, they used their utmost efforts to forward a scheme of government extremely exclusive,—extremely hostile to all improvement, to the general extension of British enterprise, to the progress of education, and of social and political advancement. For these evils—for this evil spirit—there seems to be no better remedy,—if we agree that Canada shall have a free government,—no more obvious or safer mode of proceeding, in order to put down this system of monopoly and exclusion, than to admit the inhabitants of both countries to send Members to one Legislature, leaving the French race to be represented by persons of their own opinions, but depriving them of that preponderence of which they have made so ill a use. In so deciding, of course, there are many points to be attended to, which, hereafter, I shall have occasion to advert to; but, with respect to the general nature of the proposition, taking the number of the inhabitants of the provinces at 1,100,000, of which 450,000 are supposed to be of the French race, there seems no reason why the two, together, should not send Members to the Assembly who would fairly represent the whole body, and give free scope to British enterprise and emigration, without subjecting the French to any degree of oppression. And I have always been of opinion that we ought not so much to blame the leaders of the French party for the use which they made of their power, directed, as it was, by the singular position in which they were placed by the Act of 1791; which, while it confined them within certain limits, gave them advantages in which the great mass of British emigrants had no share. I will not now discuss the policy of that Act of 1791. Circumstances may have made it expedient to propose that measure. One thing is certain, that of Upper Canada, which then numbered 10,000 inhabitants, the population has since risen to 400,000, and risen to that amount under the influence of British laws and British tenures; but I have always understood, and from men who knew the sentiments of Lord Grenville, that it was not the intention of those who introduced the Act of 1791 to establish a permanent division between the two provinces; but that, at a future time, it would be wise in Parliament to alter the provisions which were then made.

Such being the general view we take, as to the expediency of a union, I think the best way in which I can explain the reasons which have induced me to think that a free and happy government may be founded on the principle of a union between the two provinces will be, by stating the various propositions on which we are of opinion that this union should rest. The House will then see the nature of the government which we propose to establish, and will be able to judge how far such a government will be likely to attain the object we have in view. The first question will be, as to the declaration of the union. I should propose that Her Majesty should be enabled to give instruction to the Governor General to make a proclamation of the union; that no day should be fixed in the Bill for this proclamation; but, at the same time, that there should be a limited period within which it should be declared; and I should submit that it ought not to be later than six months after the passing of this Bill. It is the opinion of the Governor General that it is most desirable that an early period should be fixed for the union. There are some special reasons which make it so desirable. One is, that the Assembly of Upper Canada is at an end in the present year; and it would be necessary, if the union were long delayed, to dissolve that Assembly and to call a new one, which would be a measure obviously not desirable, when the two provinces were about to be incorporated. But a more sufficing reason is, that the people of Canada are generally anxious to see a termination put to the long and vexatious struggle by which they have been agitated. I proposed, last year, considering the time that would be taken in framing the various details in the articles of union, that the Assembly should not meet until the year after next; but not only the authority of the Governor General, but all the accounts I have received on the subject, have convinced me that it is a reasonable petition to ask of the Parliament, that, as soon as possible, they should terminate this anxiety, and give a settled form to the future constitution of Canada. It is obvious that, if you continue the present Special Council of Lower Canada,—a Special Council formed by the Governor, — you are continuing a species of government which no one could wish or believe should be permanent. It could never be the intention of Parliament, or agreeable to the wishes of any portion of the Canadians, that that government, despotic in its form, at least, should be continued beyond the necessity for its duration. It is clear that great inconvenience would arise from giving a more general scope to the restricted power of the Special Council — I will not say unwisely restricted, because the general principle is a right one, of giving no large and extensive powers of legislating for permanent objects, to a council granted for a particular purpose. But whether those powers are unwise, or not, it is evident that, as long as it is the opinion of Parliament they should be continued, so long will restrictions exist to such improvements in the laws as are most essential to a free government.

I think, therefore, for these reasons, that the declaration of a union should not be long delayed; and that, in a few months after the passing of this Bill, a proclamation of it should be made. I come, next, to the constitution of the Legislative Council and Assembly, which, together with the Governor, it is proposed should form the Legislature. It is proposed, as in last year, that the Crown, or the Governor, acting on the part of the Crown, should appoint the Legislative Councillors. The reports of the Governor General state that, after consulting persons of all parties, while there were many who still adhered to their old favourite project of an elective council, they all agreed that, if there were not an elective council, the best plan would be to leave the nomination as it was directed by the constitution of 1791. A great party is attached to that proposal; and I agree with them in thinking it gives a permanency and independence to the body which are most desirable. There is, then, a strong party in favour of this proposal, and no party in favour of any other, except than of an elective council, to which the Government ever had a most decided objection, and to which, on a proposition I made three years ago, this House expressed likewise its repugnance. The other House of Parliament came to a similar resolution. I propose, then, that the nomination of the council should be for life; the only disqualifications being bankruptcy or crime. The Governor General thinks it desirable that a power of resignation should be given; as it happens, not unfrequently, that a person, who fully deserves to be placed on the list of councillors, goes to reside in a distant part of the country, and, by entirely abandoning his duties as a councillor, swells the list, in point of numbers, without any advantage being derived to the province from his service.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — What is to be the number of the councillors?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — It is not proposed to limit the number, but we intend that they should not be less than twenty. The next question, and the most important one, is, as to the future constitution of the Assembly. The Governor General proposes — and the proposition seems to meet with the assent of both provinces — that the number of representatives sent by Upper and Lower Canada should be equal. It is evident that, at the present moment, the inhabitants of the Upper are not equal in number to those of the Lower province. But, on the other hand, the inhabitants of Upper Canada are greatly increasing; and if I were to speculate on this subject, the probability, I should say, is, that in a few years the number of the inhabitants in the Upper will be increased beyond that of the Lower province. It is suggested, however, that the united Legislature should have the power of adding members from time to time, as the population increases. With respect to the distribution of these members, it is proposed that thirty should be allotted to each province, and should be distributed with no very great alteration of the existing boundaries. On the consideration of that question, it was found — not, indeed, that those boundaries were very long established, but — that they were convenient for the purposes of representation; and that it would be extremely difficult to form any scheme in a country where the inhabitants were so rapidly increasing, either founded on population, or on area and population, which would be practically useful, however, on abstract grounds, it might seem fair and reasonable. It is therefore proposed that the existing division of Upper Canada should be taken. With regard to Lower Canada, the proposition is, that the distribution of members should rather be founded on the divisions which existed previous to the Act of 1829, than on those by which members were sent to the Assembly in later times. One of the subjects referred to by Mr. Huskisson, as just matter of complaint, was the division of districts; and though an Act passed the Assembly for the redress of this grievance, a greater outcry was then raised than before it was passed; and the British race became still more indignant that they had not a fair number of representatives, in comparison to their proportion of the population. It is proposed, now, in order to reduce the numbers to those I have mentioned, taking generally the existing divisions, that there should be a member for each county and each town. It is intended that, in Upper Canada, the towns of Kingstown, Hamilton, Brockville, London, Niagara, and Cornwall; and that, in Lower Canada, Montreal, Quebec, and Three Rivers, should each send one member. The rest of the members for each province are to be returned by districts, which we have called counties. In no case have we placed together counties which, before the Act of 1829, were separate; but, in nine instances we have combined counties which we had separated into two by the Act of 1829. The result will be, therefore, that 39 members will be sent by Upper, and 39 by Lower Canada, making a total of 78. It is intended that one province, inhabited chiefly by the English, and which has expressed a strong desire to be included amongst the counties of the Lower province, should not be separated from it. Four years have been the period hitherto established for the duration of the Assembly, and I do not see any reason for altering that practice.

The next question relates to the laws, and the mode in which they are to be enacted. With regard to this question, it is proposed to give a general power to the Assembly only, but to reserve certain subjects for the assent of the Crown; such as those pointed out by the Constitutional Act of 1791. It is intended that the Royal assent should not be given in those cases, if either House of Parliament shall address the Crown praying for its refusal. The subjects I refer to include, amongst others, regulations concerning the rights and dues of the Protestant clergy, and of the Roman Catholic church. I next come to notice a most important matter relating to a change proposed in the Report of Lord Durham with regard to the power of the Assembly. This question must, in its effects, deeply concern the whole future constitition and government of these provinces. It is proposed, in conformity with our own constitutional views and maxims, that money votes should not originate with the Assembly, but that a vote should never be given on such matters without a message from the Governor, giving the Assembly the power of addressing him upon it. I think this a most important provision, and deeply connected and interwoven with the whole of the misfortunes which have occurred in the Lower, and with some of the difficulties which have taken place in the Upper province. Another provision connected with this point, and one which I likewise think of great importance, regards what Sir George Murray first called, when speaking of the Colonial Legislature, its "Civil List." The Assembly of Upper Canada having expressed a wish that a permanent appropriation should be made for the governor and judges, it is proposed to carry into effect that suggestion. It is also intended, that, with regard to the civil establishment, the civil secretary, and various other civil expenses, should be voted either for a period of years, or during the life of the Queen. These amount to a considerable sum; the Governor General has not been able to make an exact estimate, but it was thought that the charge for the governor and judges would amount to 45,000*l*, and the other expenses of civil government to 30,000*l*. We propose for this purpose 75,000*l*., including in that sum 5000*l*. or 6000*l*. for pensions. Of course, on the demise of the Crown, the territorial revenues revert to Her Majesty's successor. I propose, too, what was likewise proposed in the Bill of last year, that the duties included in the Act introduced by the Earl of Ripon, and collected under the 14th Geo. III., should become part of the Crown revenue. As the Assembly will not then have the power of originating money votes, and as I should hope that an ample Civil List for the purpose of carrying on the civil government of the province, and for defraying the necessary expenses of the courts of justice will be granted, I think we shall take away one great source of contention between the Assembly and the Crown. It seems to me most important that when the Assembly put forward claims inconsistent with our monarchical form of Government, we should remove, as far as possible, those sources of dispute which have formed a real ground of contention. It seems to me, that, partly from defects in our constitutional laws, and partly from the defects of administration, evils which could not have occurred in that regular form of constitutional government which we enjoy, have occurred in several of the colonies, and in none more so than in Canada. It is, as I imagine, not only the theory, but the general practice, of our Government, that to the Executive belongs the appropriation of money; the Ministers being responsible for what they think necessary for the public service, and the House exercising that control over the grant which it thinks necessary. But, in the colonies, there is neither this division of powers, nor this control. In the first place, it is frequently the case that persons intrusted with the confidence of the Governor are above all control by the Assembly,—are totally regardless of the votes framed by the Assembly, —and therefore escape that due examination and responsibility which persons holding important offices, to which great expenditure is attached, ought to be subjected to. On the other hand, the Assembly not having that control which is proper and essential to the due performance of its functions, assumes the power which properly belongs to the Executive, and then—perhaps, according to its own views, perhaps, according to its own interest, but more frequently in accordance with the interests of the constituents of its members—proposes votes of money, and enters on a kind of expenditure which is not legitimate or beneficial to the public at large.

Thus, while there has been no proper control, on the part of the Assembly, and undue power vested in the hands of other functionaries, the people at large have lost the benefit of that kind of government which they were told should be established amongst them; and they have neither the power to prevent improper expenditure by the officers of the Crown, appointed by the Governor, nor the security that their own popular Assembly will lay out the money and taxes of the people for other than special interest, or through local motives. That which I propose seems to have a great tendency to rectify this abuse. I propose that the direct power which the Assembly hitherto has had, with regard to money votes, should be taken away, and a more wholesome practice substituted. I think, at the same time, it will be necessary, without any positive enactment, — for it would be impossible to introduce such a provision into the Bill, but, to provide, by the rule of administration which will be established by the union, — that the Assembly shall exercise a due control over the officers appointed or kept in office by the Governor, and over the distribution and expenditure of the public funds. Many abuses have arisen from the want of this control. I am not now going to raise a discussion on the subject, on which I expressed my opinion fully in a despatch now on the table, and which excited so much agitation in Upper Canada a short time ago, — I mean what was then called the question of responsible Governors. I am not of opinion, as I have often declared, that the official servants of the Governor should be subject to exactly the same responsibility as the Ministers in this country, because the Governor's orders issue directly from the Crown; and it is unjust that the representatives in the Assembly should visit, with the responsibility, those who are not the authors of the acts which they condemn. But the practice has unfortunately prevailed, that there has been one set of men enjoying the confidence of the Governor, forming very often a small party in the colony, distributing the revenues of the colony according to their own notions, and having the great skill and practice which long experience gives in disposing of the property and guiding the administration of the people; and, on the other hand, there have been men, ambitious, perhaps, — stirring, perhaps, — but, at the same time, of great public talents; and that these should be excluded from their share in the administration seems an unfortunate and vicious system; and I think that, by the rule of administration, a better practice ought to be introduced. In conformity with this opinion, my Noble Friend who lately occupied the situation which I now hold informed the Governor of Nova Scotia, that, whenever a vacancy occurred in the council, he was to fill it up by a person selected from a majority of the Assembly, whom he might think properly qualified for such a trust. The occasion of making an appointment arose soon after I succeeded my Noble Friend, and the Governor of Nova Scotia requested to know whether he was to act on the direction which he had received from my predecessor. I told him he was; and I know no better way of giving confidence to the provinces, and, at the same time, making the leaders of the Assembly practical men of business, than by appointing them to situations of official trust and responsibility. I have said you cannot lay down any positive rule for effecting this object; still less can you trust to the Legislature as your guide; because you never can agree to the advice which the members of the Assembly may give, when it interferes either with the Imperial policy, or with the honour and faith of Parliament or of the Crown. I do not think that we can lay down any positive inflexible rule; but, as a general system of policy, those who are among the leaders of the majority of the Assembly should, in my opinion, ~~not~~ be the objects of such appointments.

In thus making the distinction I propose between the powers which are to originate with the Governor and those which are to belong to the Assembly, if I do not go further, I shall deprive the province of the capacity of making many local improvements. It has been the custom — in reference to the improvement of roads, or to any local establishment, and in reference to grants of money for local courts of justice—to propose a Bill to the Assembly, and to appropriate the required funds out of the public taxes of the province. Instead of this mode of proceeding, I propose that there should be brought into more regular and uniform operation, municipal government in those provinces. In Upper Canada there already exists the form of municipal government. There are townships and elective officers, and also counties; but the latter are merely divisions for the choice of members for the Assembly. There are, however, local districts, consisting of two or three counties conjoined, in which taxes are raised for the maintenance of courts of justice, for the expenses of sheriffs and constables, and of the local administration of those districts. But these powers are extremely limited. In Upper Canada, the power of taxation is limited to the imposition of one penny per acre on cultivated land, and of one fifth of a penny an acre on wild land.

he obvious effect of this limitation is to revent the carrying into effect of many improvements out of the public funds; and holders of land to a vast amount, being axed extremely lightly, do not feel themelves obliged to devote their capital to the ultivation of their land, that great object remains unaccomplished. I therefore ropose that this power of taxation should e increased, and that it should be permitted to levy a tax of three pence per cre on all lands. A Report by Lord Durham on this subject, in reference particularly to Lower Canada, shows how xtremely useful some municipal authoity would be, by which local improvements might be effected. In Lower Canada, it does not appear that any such power as I have mentioned exists for this purpose; but I propose to extend to that province the powers now exercised in Upper Canada, giving the Governor authority to form local districts, and to ettle the boundaries of such districts. In Upper Canada there are fifteen districts, and there might be formed, perhaps, wenty-five in Lower Canada. These districts, as formed by the Governor, would not, of course, be so large as to make it inconvenient for members to attend, nor would they partake in any way of the character of political bodies. They are simply intended to effect mere local objects; such as the improvement of the oads and other communications, as well as to attend to a variety of local purposes, which could not otherwise be provided for. I think it necessary that some arangement of this kind should be adopted by Parliament, because it is proposed, in other parts of the Bill, to take away, as I have before said, from the Assembly, the power of originating money votes; and, as this is one of those subjects on which great discussion would probably arise among the different parties in Canada, I think it desirable, on that account also, for Parliament to lay down the basis on which the local districts should be formed.

There is another subject which likewise forms no part of the Bill, but which is a question of the greatest importance as it affects the future government of Canada, and to which I have thought it my duty to devote my attention; — I allude to the question of emigration from this country to Canada. It appears that, in Upper Canada, there are great difficulties opposed to emigration, and that the manner in which the taxes on land are imposed, and the way in which the sales of land take place, in that province, operate as obstacles to the settlement of emigrants there. It is to these circumstances that is, in a great measure, to be attributed that evil which has been so constantly complained of, — namely, that the emigrants from this country, immediately after their arrival in Canadá, pass over to the United States, and become labourers there, instead of remaining, and forming a part of the population of the provinces. I am convinced that some regulation of detail would be sufficient to remedy a good deal of this evil. With respect to the principle which should regulate the sale of lands, it appears to me that nothing is more established than the superiority of that system, of which Mr. Wakefield is the most able advocate, over all other systems hitherto propounded. It is a scheme which enables persons to be secure, at a moderate price, of possessing a certain portion of the land to which they emigrate. It does not force them into the market, to contend with any individual who may speculate to obtain a large tract of land, which he does not mean to cultivate himself; but it enables them, by the expenditure of a small sum of money, to obtain a fixed and certain portion of land; and the purchase money being moderate, it also enables them to apply the rest of their capital to the improvement of that land, and thus conferring strength on the population at large. With respect to the mode of carrying this principle into effect, in such a province as Upper Canada, I do not now wish to speak positively, particularly as the Governor General states that he has written a despatch in answer to one from me, asking for a Report on the subject. But I do not think it would be difficult, by the introduction of a new principle of acknowledged soundness, and by taking care that the administration of the Crown lands should be well conducted, under the care of persons of known integrity, to work the greatest possible change on the face Canada in a few years. In effecting this object, we must rely on the concurrence of the Assembly; and I am glad to see that, in the Address of the Assembly of Upper Canada, it is described as being an object to which they attach the highest value. I believe I have now stated the general features of the Bill which I propose to introduce.

MR. HUME. — What do you propose with respect to qualification?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I do not mean to alter the qualification of electors, nor the period for which the Assembly lasts; but I do propose that there should be qualification for the elected. That qualification should be, I propose, the possession of 500*l*. I understand it is the opinion of the best authorities — and the Governor General has consulted many persons on the subject — that this qualification would have the effect of excluding from the Assembly those persons whose ignorance, in some cases, seems to have been so great, that I am surprised that they should ever have become the choice of a body of electors. These, then, are the main and leading propositions, both of the Bill which I propose to introduce, and of the policy which the Government intends to pursue; but, in making this statement, I wish also to set forth the views I entertain, and which Her Majesty's Government has been induced to take, touching another subject of extreme importance;—I refer to the subject respecting which some petitions have been presented this night, and respecting which a Bill has been passed by the Legislative Council and Assembly of Upper Canada, and laid on the table of the House, — namely, the subject of the clergy reserves.

I hold in my hand a despatch of the Governor General's, which accompanied the Bill I have just mentioned. The House is aware that, by the Act of 1791, one seventh of the land to be granted was set apart for the Protestant clergy, and, by a subsequent clause of that Act, it was provided that the provincial Legislature might vary or repeal the enactment; but, in that case, the Bill was to be laid upon the table of each House of Parliament, and the assent of the Crown was not to be given until after the expiration of thirty days, in order to allow either House, if it should so think fit, to address the Crown not to pass the Bill. This question was brought repeatedly under the notice of the Legislature of Upper Canada; once by the then Colonial Secretary, Lord Grenville, who, in a despatch laid before the Assemby, invited them to consider how the power allowed them by the Constitutional Act to vary or repeal this particular provision might be exercised most advantageously for the spiritual and temporal interests of the subject of the Crown in that province. The opinions of the Assembly of Upper Canada, for a long course of years, have very little varied on this subject; and they are, generally speaking, to the effect that the clergy reserves ought not to be set apart wholly for the clergy of the Church of England. As little is the Assembly ready to set them apart solely for the Churches of England and Scotland, in conformity with what were declared by Sir C. Robinson, Lord Lyndhurst, and Lord Gifford, to be the general intentions of the Act of 1791. The view of the several Assemblies has been, that if the clergy reserves were to be given to the ministers of religion, they ought to be given to the clergy of all Christian denominations; but as there is so much difficulty in attaining this object, it is their general opinion that they ought to be appropriated to the purposes of education, and to erecting places of worship for Christians of all denominations. Between the years 1825 and 1838, no fewer than fourteen different votes were come to by the House of Assembly, all having this object in view. In 1838, the Assembly voted that the proceeds of the sale of the clergy reserves should be appropriated to the Christian religion generally within the province. In 1839, various plans were proposed. One was, that the clergy reserves should be sold, and the amount placed under the control of the local Legislature; but the Legislative Council, proposed a Bill to be laid ultimately before the Imperial Parliament, and this was agreed to by a majority of 21 to 20. The Governor General states, in one of his despatches, that the strongest feeling prevails on the subject; and, in a subsequent despatch, he adds, that the proposition now made is adverse to the decision of the various preceding Assemblies; but that, since the Bill has passed, a general satisfaction is felt at the prospect of settling this much disputed matter. The Bill proposes that the clergy reserves should be sold, and that one half of the proceeds derived from the sale, or from the rents of leased lands, should be given to the support of the Churches of England and Scotland in Canada; and that the remaining half should be divided among the clergy of all denominations of Christians, acknowledged by certain Acts of the province; such as that referring to registration, and others of that kind, in proportion to their numbers.

The Bill likewise provides, that though the half of the proceeds should always be given to the Churches of England and Scotland, yet that that half should be divided between those two churches in proportion to the number of the persons belonging to the two communities. It proposes that Commissioners should ascertain the number; and, as I read the Bill, it does not provide that the proportion now settled should be invariably taken as the proportion. There can be no doubt that, with respect to this subject, a very strong feeling exists in Canada,—so strong, indeed, that I have heard, from more than one person, that that partial insurrection which took place three years ago was to be attributed far more to the excitement which prevailed on this question of the clergy reserves than to any wish to throw off the allegiance to the Crown. There are various impressions on the subject, but they are all united against the application of the clergy reserves, entirely and exclusively, to the support of the Church of England. There is a strong feeling, not only in Canada, but throughout the whole continent of North America, against the existence of an established church with any superiority of privileges, or which should be supposed to govern or dictate to the rest. Holding that view, they of course do not agree that there should be any such peculiar privileges, or any large distribution of the funds, applicable to the members of the Church of England in Upper Canada; for, by all accounts, the members of the Church of England do not amount to one fourth of the whole population. There are other parties whose opinions have very great influence, and have hitherto prevented the agreement which is now come to among the various denominations of Christians in Canada. The Wesleyan Methodists entertain strong objections to any part of the funds being granted to the Roman Catholics, — a feeling which does not seem to have operated so strongly with the members of the Church of England. However this may be, certain it is, that the great majority of the members, both of the Legislative Council and the House of Assembly, who are members of the Church of England, voted in favour of this Bill. This is stated in the despatch of the Governor General; and it undoubtedly is an important element for the consideration of Parliament. For my own part, I would much rather state that I am content with the distribution thus made by the authorities in Canada, than undertake to say that, on any abstract grounds, it is the settlement most desirable to be made. Obvious objections might be urged against such a settlement; but I do not think they suggest any reason which could be urged as of equal importance with the prospect now afforded of returning peace and harmony to the province; and I conceive it to be highly desirable that the dissensions which have disturbed the province should be healed by the agreement of all the various branches of the local Legislature, without a necessity arising for the intervention of the Imperial Parliament. For my part, if I had to propose any scheme to Parliament, I should have found it extremely difficult to frame one which, on the one hand, would have been likely to meet with the concurrence of Parliament, without, on the other, encountering the decided disapprobation and hostility of the people of Upper Canada.

It is not, at this day, after so long a period has elapsed since the Act of 1791, that you can expect to argue with a people composed of many different sects, and living on the borders of the United States, upon the abstract merits of a church establishment. To whom could you appeal as authorities? Paley and Warburton would fail you. Paley expressly says, "that if the majority of the people shall cease to belong to the Established Church, the Established Church should change places with another sect." So that if the majority of the people in Canada be Presbyterians or Roman Catholics, the establishment ought to be that of the majority. But, whatever my wishes may be, and whatever I may have thought to be possible twenty or thirty years ago, I am bound to say, that I do not hold that you can, at this time, impose upon the people of Canada an established church from which the great majority of the people dissent. I am speaking in the sincere wish to maintain these provinces in connection with the mother country; and I think you must be prepared somewhat to bend your opinions,— somewhat to relax your views of a policy which may be agreeable to you, and which may be suitable to this country,—with the purpose of conciliating the no less strong opinions and predilections of the people you wish to govern by the forms of a free constitution. I have no hesitation in saying, in answer to a question put by an Honourable Member the other evening, that the view of Her Majesty's Ministers is this,— that, unless Parliament shall interpose, they will offer their humble advice to Her Majesty to give Her Royal assent to the Bill passed by the Legislature of Upper Canada with respect to the clergy reserves. I think that, by so doing, we should take away from the future united Legislature one great source of discord, and establish, in that province, some degree of harmony on this particular subject, upon which the minds of the people have been so long and so much irritated. I think that we should thus encourage them to believe that their wishes and views would meet with a ready and attentive ear from the Sovereign and from the Parliament of this country. Sir, in all that I have stated, — in all the views which I have ventured to lay before the House, both with respect to the Bill which I propose to bring in, and those other questions upon which I have nothing, at present, to propose, — it has been my honest wish to state principles, and to propose measures, which are in accordance with the permanent connection of those provinces with Great Britain.

It is one of the proudest — perhaps the proudest — of all our national boasts, that wherever we have established colonies, we have made them fit to manage and enjoy those institutions which were once peculiarly our own; that we have given them an education fitting them to become free states, and to govern themselves according to those maxims which, as Englishmen, we must revere. In the able work on America by Monsieur de Tocqueville, he says, "The political education of the people has long been complete; say, rather, it was complete when the people first set foot upon the soil." I say it is a proud testimony in favour of this country, — a prouder testimony than has been given to any nation or empire on the face of the globe. It was, no doubt, a noble and exalted feeling of the importance of his country which caused Cicero to refer, with exultation, to the efficacy of the declaration, "civis Romanus sum;" that it was enough for a man to declare himself a Roman citizen to obtain privileges and immunities over a great portion of the globe. But, however great and proud that boast may have been, it was limited by the force and extent of the Roman empire; it was only temporary; it was occasional, and lasted only so long as the legions of Rome were able to enforce the terrors of her empire. But, with respect to the United States of America, it is a boast that will for ever endure, that England sent forth her sons upon that soil with an education, with habits, and with feelings which fitted them to become the parents and progenitors of a free and mighty people in all time to come; that, whether in immediate connection with you, or whether only in ties of amity, you have given them that from which they will never part, except under unavoidable circumstances; that you have inspired them with the love of free institutions, and taught them the way in which the love of free institutions can be best manifested and exercised. It is my belief that you may maintain your connection with the colonies of British North America, without imposing upon them any terms which they would feel it incumbent upon them to resist; and that they may be made to add to your greatness and strength, without a wish, on their part, to take their station on the globe as an independent nation. I believe — and this was also the opinion of Sir James Mackintosh — that our colonies, looking at the circumstances of their situation, will see nothing to envy in those who possess a greater degree of supremacy; for they will recollect that, with respect to the burdens which press upon us, — with respect, for example, to all those votes which have been proposed in this House during the last month for the purpose of maintaining the expenses of the Government, and the charges of defraying our armaments by land and sea, — with respect, I say, to burdens such as these, they will recollect that they are free from them; that the arm of Great Britain protects them, and that the power and reputation of this mighty empire will shield them if they should be attacked. They have the opportunity of applying the produce of such taxes as they may see fit to impose upon themselves, to the promotion of their own internal government, to the advancement of education, to the general welfare of their own province. I am convinced that, if you pass the Bill which I have proposed, and with such alterations as, upon mature consideration, may be deemed necessary to make its provisions satisfactory, — if you can pass such a Bill, and thereby establish a permanent free constitution in British North America, under which British settlers may peaceably and quietly live, — you will add strength to your empire, and you will rule over subjects on the other side of the Atlantic as loyal to their Sovereign as any who exist in the British Isles. You will be establishing no form of slavery, and no insolent dominion on those shores; but you may rest assured that, while your power and reputation will be extended, their freedom and happiness will be secured. I now move for leave to bring in "A Bill to re-unite the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, and for the Government thereof."

Question put.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, although I do not intend to enter into the question at any length, on the present occasion, I cannot allow the observations of the Noble Lord to pass without offering a few remarks. Towards the conclusion of his speech, the Noble Lord spoke strongly of the advantage of free institutions. But I beg to remind the Noble Lord of the system of misrule which has prevailed in Canada during the last fifteen or twenty years, and to ask whether the present Bill will confer anything like free institutions on those provinces? Surely the Noble Lord cannot flatter himself with the idea that the people will be deluded in such a manner, and that they will submit to be governed and controlled by an individual sitting in Downing Street? The Noble Lord proposes to concur in the Clergy Reserves Bill, not because he thinks it just, but because it has been passed by the Legislature in Upper Canada; and I certainly was astonished to hear him express his opinion that it will effect a settlement of that question. I ask whether it is just to the people of that province to divide these clergy revenues amongst different sects, when, for the last fifteen years, they have declared that the money arising therefrom ought not to be applied to any sectarian purposes, but to the general education of the people? The Noble Lord is as much mistaken on this point as when he passed his revolutionary resolutions of 1837. The Clergy Reserves Bill has been passed by a packed Assembly; and I have not the least doubt that, if the people had the privilege of free election, that Bill would be speedily repealed. I contend that the Noble Lord, instead of recommending this Bill, ought to reject it, and leave the settlement of so important a question to the united Assembly, if the two provinces are to be united. I know of no other means of putting an end to the discord which now prevails. All the evils under which those provinces are now suffering are attributable to a long system of misgovernment; and I have no hesitation in saying, again, that, if proper steps had been taken, an amicable settlement might easily have been effected. The Noble Lord may rest assured that the clergy reserves will be a continued bone of contention, and that the Legislative Council will be productive of nothing but dissatisfaction until it be made responsible to the people. I own that I have read, with great pleasure, the message of the Governor General to the House of Assembly, after the receipt of the Noble Lord's letter, dated the 14th of October, 1839; and I have no doubt that, if similar steps had been taken a few years ago, peace would long ago have prevailed. The Noble Lord says, in his letter —

> The Queen's Government have no desire to thwart the representative assemblies of British North America in their measures of reform and improvement.

Why, up to that time, the Government did invariably thwart their measures, — so much so, that forty or fifty of the best Bills which they introduced were rejected. I was much surprised to hear the Noble Lord say that the French Canadians were the enemies of education. Why, they passed a Bill for the purpose of carrying education into every part of the country; and that Bill was afterwards stopped by the Legislative Council. A more foul accusation, and one more undeserved, was never made against any people. The Noble Lord further said, —

> They have no wish to make those provinces the resource for patronage at home. They are earnestly intent on giving to the character and talent of leading persons in the colonies advantages similar to those which talent and character employed in the public service obtain in the United Kingdom. Her Majesty has no desire to maintain any system of policy among her North American subjects which public opinion condemns. In receiving the Queen's commands, therefore, to protest against any declaration at variance with the honour of the Crown and the unity of the empire, I am, at the same time, instructed to announce Her Majesty's gracious intention to look to the affectionate attachment of her people in North America as the best security for permanent dominion.

Now, can anything be more creditable to a Minister than this declaration; and can anything be more opposed to the uniform practice of the British Government? These provinces have been a continual source of patronage, to the interruption of the improvements which would otherwise have taken place. The following is the address of the Governor General, dated Toronto, January 14th:—

> The Governor General has received Her Majesty's commands to administer the government of these provinces in accordance with the well-understood wishes and interests of the people, and to pay their feelings, as expressed through their representatives, the deference that is justly due to them. These are the commands of Her Majesty, and these are the views with which Her Majesty's Government desires that the administration of these provinces should be conducted; and it will be the earnest and anxious desire of the Governor General to discharge the trust committed to him in accordance with these principles.

This is very pleasing to me; and I cannot avoid expressing my strong conviction that, if such a message had been sent from the Governor General to the Assembly previously to 1837, there would have been no civil war to complain of. It was no unimportant matter that the Assmbly of Upper Canada should be made acquainted with the fact that their own wishes would be considerately attended to; but it is also essential that that Assembly should be constituted on the free, and fair, and equitable principle of just and popular representation, and not such a packed Assembly as was formed under the government of Sir Francis Head. Now, it is almost idle to suppose that a really popular representation can be procured under the system which has been so long pursued. The United States were never able to approach anything like a democratic form of government until they freed themselves from England. I would ask, does the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies mean to say that, in any portion of the colonial possessions of the British empire, a fair and satisfactory popular representation is in operation? I assert that the contrary is the fact. They are all cramped by the patronage at home, and the checks which they receive by the interference of the authorities in Downing Street. I believe, before this matter can be properly and peaceably settled, it will have cost the people of England five or six millions of money. Lord Glenelg, who is, indeed, a very estimable man in private life, has strangely mismanaged these affairs, and ought to have been removed from his situation over the colonies long ago, instead of being rewarded with a pension of 2000*l.* a-year for doing all this mischief. Was Lord Glenelg ignorant of what was going on? He ought not to have been uninformed on the subject; but he would not be instructed. This is quite apparent from a correspondence which I hold in my hand, which shows how the Canadas have been treated. It appears that, some time after the arrival of Sir Francis Head, as Governor of the Upper province, Mr. Baldwin, one of the most moderate members of the Executive Council, was deputed, by the six councillors, to proceed to England, and to represent the real wants and wishes of the people. Mr. Baldwin arrived in this country, and communicated the object of his mission to Lord Glenelg; but Lord Glenelg positively refused to see him. Mr. Baldwin was, at that time, prepared to submit to the authorities in Downing Street the very same measures that the Noble Lord now proposes to adopt. Had those measures been resorted to when Mr. Baldwin suggested them, there would have been no disturbance in the Canadas; and all the evils which have since taken place would have been avoided. I think I am therefore justified in attributing them to Lord Glenelg. I am glad to perceive that Mr. Baldwin has recently been appointed Solicitor General; and I will venture to say that no single appointment made by the Noble Lord will more redound to his credit in the country, in consequence of the deserved esteem in which that gentleman is generally held, and the confidence which is placed in him by the people. I differ from the Noble Lord as to many of the details of the proposed Bill; but I will take a future opportunity of explaining, at greater length, my reasons for so doing. What, I ask, did the colonies demand? In the first place, they wanted the control of their own resources; and I think they were perfectly right; and this is, in a great measure, conceded to them by the Noble Lord. In the second place, they required the supervision of the ministerial authorities, by the annual voting of the supplies, out of which the pay of these officers was to be derived. That point is now conceded. Thirdly, that the colonial Executive should be made to act in unison with the House of Assembly, as the House of Commons in England does with the Government. On that point, also, concessions are to be made. In this country, if the House of Commons should happen to differ from the Government, their opinion is signified, in an intelligible manner, by a vote of want of confidence; but no analogous power exists in Upper Canada; for, there, the best measures introduced for the general good are stopped and thwarted by the Legislative Council. These points, and the clergy reserves, were what they demanded, and they are now all conceded. Why, then, should so much blood and treasure have been wasted? The concessions now proposed, if offered a few years ago, would have satisfied the minds of all parties in the Canadas, and have averted all the evils that have since occurred. Of course, the object of the proposed union of the two provinces is to strengthen the connection with England. To attain that object, the Noble Lord must bear in mind that it will be necessary to concede to the House of Assembly of the united provinces all the points that were previously demanded by the separate Houses of Assembly of the disunited provinces. I think this Bill will act unfavourably to the French Canadians, who are the great majority, and who have been much wronged by the allegations made against them; but I believe they will agree to a moderate form of government, because they must be of opinion that one good and united government is preferable to two divided ones. I do not intend to enter into the details of the plan proposed by the Noble Lord. I may observe, however, that I object to the proposition for imposing a property qualification upon the members of the House of Assembly. Whilst we are endeavouring, at home, to get rid of the qualification as an evil, it is strangely inconsistent to impose it upon the colonies as a beneficial measure. I trust that that part of the plan will be abandoned. The Noble Lord appears to be of opinion that peace and harmony will be secured by the measures now proposed; but when he gives to the House of Assembly of the united provinces all that has been demanded by the separate houses of the, as yet, disconnected provinces, does he suppose that a year will elapse before they will require the complete management and control of their own affairs? The Noble Lord does not seem to be aware what those demands will be, as he reserves to himself, and to the Government at home, so much power in Downing Street. The reservation of that power will, undoubtedly, create new discontents in the Canadas; and I venture to foretel, that, ten years hence, the House of Assembly of the united provinces, if fairly and properly elected, will not submit to the treatment which the Bill now introduced by the Noble Lord proposes, as far as I can understand, to continue and perpetuate.

SIR R. H. INGLIS. — I am astonished that some of the supporters of the Noble Lord, who has been attacked in the latter portion of the speech of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, should not have been solicitous to defend that Noble Lord, particularly as he is not now in his place. But perhaps this may be accounted for by the impression which seems to prevail that the discussion ought not to take place in the present stage of the Bill; and I certainly should not have troubled the House, but for some of the remarks of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, and the latter part of the speech of the Noble Lord, which I cannot pass by without entering my strongest protest against. The House, I apprehend, will readily imagine that I allude to the Clergy Reserves Bill; and I think the Noble Lord has not received much encouragement to proceed with his present Bill, when he is told, by no mean authority in Canadian affairs, that, so far from securing the peace and tranquillity of the colonies by the measure, a different result must be anticipated. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny, in his elegant phraseology, says, hat the church reserves, as settled by this Bill, will be a continuous "bone of contenion;" I, however, am satisfied, that this House and the other House of Parliament will not so far neglect their duty as o suffer that Bill to become a part of the aw of the land. What has the Assembly o do with this matter? Are they dealing with property of their own? Protestant clergy cannot mean Popish clergy. Suppose, that instead of this property having been made over to the Protestant clergy, t had been made over to the corporaion of London. Where is the legal diference between an original grant by Act of Parliament, confirmed by special charter of the Crown, to a Protestant clergy, and a grant to any given corporation in England? In either case, is it not equally clear that it was not the intention of the granter and confirmer that the Legislative Assembly should exercise any ownership whatever over it? Can it be contended by any person who has read the debates which took place at the time when the clergy reserves were first set apart, that it ever entered into the contemplation of any person whatever, that they were to be applied to any civil or secular purposes, or to any other uses than the support of the Protestant clergy? It is quite clear that the intention of the parties was to allocate these reserves to the Protestant clergy of the Established Church. The Bill on the table never can produce peace, because it is founded on injustice. You have no right to expect any blessing to attend a measure which deprives any individual or public body, and most of all the Church, of that property which was solemnly dedicated to its use. This doctrine, in the present day, may, perhaps, not be fashionable; but it is not the less true on that account. The common bond of religion is the best security on which the Crown can rely for the permanency of its possessions; and this bond the Bill proposes to weaken. When the House recollects that the colonies are anxious for the maintenance of the Church, I trust it will not so far neglect its duty as to suffer these funds to be so desecrated. Though the colleagues of the Noble Lord have not undertaken his defence against the attack made upon him by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, still, I trust, they will take some occasion to reply to the attack made upon a late Governor of the Canadas (Sir F. Head). The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has referred to the conduct of that gentleman; but has the Honourable Member read Sir F. Head's despatches? Has he not rather derived his information from certain persons now happily expatriated from the Canadas, with whom I certainly should never have been anxious to be connected? Protesting against being supposed to be bound by the recommendations of the Noble Lord at the head of the Colonial Department, — recommendations which, the Noble Lord admits, are not founded on his own conviction, but upon a desire — which, according to the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, will be frustrated — to promote the peace, tranquillity, and prosperity of these colonies, — I will not further detain the House; but I intend to reserve my observations for the future stages of these measures.

Mr. PAKINGTON.—Although it may be improper to enter into the details of a Bill not yet before the House, yet I take so much interest in the measure which has this night been brought under its consideration, that I cannot refrain from saying that, with regard to the measure for effecting the union of the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, I entertain grave and serious doubts whether it will be productive of all those advantages which the Noble Lord seems to anticipate, and whether the upholding of British interests, and the overcoming of French disaffection, might not be accomplished in a much more politic manner, than by the union of the two provinces. With regard to the Clergy Reserves Bill, I beg to express my strongest and deepest disapprobation, and my entire condemnation, of the principles upon which that Bill is founded. Though I have seen the provisions of that Bill, I will abstain from going into them until the House shall be fully cognisant of its provisions. The House has, however, heard from the Honourable Member for Kilkenny that this Bill is not calculated to restore peace and harmony in those colonies. I am of the same opinion; for I think its provisions will create dissensions among the numerous sects which are to be admitted to a participation in the clergy reserves, because there will be a scramble amongst them to procure the largest share. Besides this, I hold the Bill to be founded on impolicy and injustice; for I believe the majority of the people wish to retain the means of adequately supporting the Protestant, as the standard religion of the colonies,—not in any intolerant spirit, but with a view to its efficient maintenance. The Noble Lord says that it is one of the proudest boasts of this country that our colonies are so formed as to be able to manage their own affairs, and enjoy free institutions. But I will go further, and say, that our policy must be incomplete, unless England enables her colonies to found efficient establishments for the teaching of that Christianity, without which the prosperity of no country can long be secure. I consider it totally impossible to maintain a useful establishment on the miserable pittance which will be left to the Church, when the clergy reserves are divided amongst the different sects. I believe this Bill to be a departure from the solemn promise made by the Imperial Legislature, in the statute of 1791; and as such, it is a measure of spoliation and destruction. There are two or three questions which I wish to put to the Noble Lord on this subject; and I will either put them now, or postpone them to another occasion, if more convenient.

[Cries of "Go on!"]

The first question involves a matter of great importance; and much as the Noble Lord may differ from my views on the Clergy Reserves Bill, at all events the Noble Lord will admit that, whatever measure may be passed on that subject, there ought not, afterwards, to be any doubt or difficulty as to its legality. I therefore wish to inform the Noble Lord that serious doubts have been expressed, as to whether the passing of the Bill by the provincial Legislature is consistent with the laws and constitution of the colony. There are two points of doubt,—one, as to whether or not the Legislature of Upper Canada, under the provisions of the Act 31 Geo. III., had any right to pass a Clergy Reserves Bill which should have a retrospective effect. The other point arises under the 7th and 8th Geo. IV., which provides that the proceeds from the sales of reserves shall be invested in the English funds; whereas the present Bill proposes their investment in the colonial funds. These points comprise my first question to the Noble Lord. The second question has reference to the different denominations of sects which are to be benefited by this Bill; or, in other words, to have a share in the reserved lands. Has the Noble Lord any objection to lay before the House a Return of the sects recognised by law in Upper Canada? The third question is as to the construction put by the Noble Lord on the provisions of the statute of 1791 which require a colonial Bill to lie thirty days on the table of both Houses of Parliament before it can receive the Royal assent. Does the Noble Lord construe this to mean thirty days of the sitting of Parliament, or thirty days, including the adjournment for the holidays?

SIR CHARLES GREY.—I consider the present measure to be one of so grave and important a character, that it would have been better to avoid entering into any discussion on the present occasion. But, after what has already taken place, I cannot refrain from offering a few observations. I must express my dissent from the opinion of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, and declare that the measure proposed by the Noble Lord is not, in a single point, — so far as I am acquainted with the affairs of Lower Canada, — a concession to the principles on which the recent resistance and rebellion of that province turned. The Honourable Member cannot be aware of the nature of the demands which were then made, or he would not have made any such assertion. I am happy to say that the measure of the Noble Lord is free from one objection, which I felt most forcibly on a former occasion; — there is nothing in it which can be justly considered as a sacrifice of the rights of the French Canadians in the Lower province; nor is it directed against the existence of the French tenures. On these grounds, I can give my conscientious support to the Bill. There are one or two points to which I wish to direct the attention of the Noble Lord. Although considerable delay might arise from an alteration of the electoral districts, yet, as there is to be a creation of municipal districts for the first time, I hope the boundaries will not be regulated according to the existing divisions; and that some attention will be paid to the peculiar characters of the people, one portion of which is animated by a commercial, and the other by an anti-commercial, spirit. Those who have less of a commercial tendency will gradually resolve themselves voluntarily into the upper districts, and those who are more addicted to commerce will assemble in the lower districts of the St. Lawrence. However, Sir, I have been led into these details contrary to my original intention, — I merely throw them out as suggestions. With respect to the observations that have been made on the Clergy Reserves Bill, I do not hesitate to say that I cannot be—after having resided in the Canadas — sanguine that it will immediately produce contentment. No doubt, dissensions will still exist. But I think, to a certain extent, — to a great extent, — it will put an end to the struggles with respect to the clergy reserves, that do exist. I can only say further, that, knowing the difficulties surrounding the question, I implore the Honourable Baronet the Member for Oxford not to make up his mind hastily upon the measure, or to suppose that it is so unjust that it is necessary he should attempt to gain the assent of the House to address the Crown in opposition to it. I may say that, perhaps, it will hardly strike anybody in this House, that this is exactly the measure they should have proposed with respect to the difficulties attending the clergy reserves. And I think that, after the opinion of Sir Christopher Robinson, and other law authorities of the country, that the Protestant clergy of the Church of Scotland had a claim to a share in those reserves, I should have felt it impossible, without injuring the Church of England, and taking away from it some part of the foundation on which it stands, — for justice is clearly part of it, — I should have found it impossible to sustain the claims which were made on all sides on the clergy reserves, to the exclusion of the Established Church of Scotland. I do not think it was ever intended, according to the letter of the Act, that any other than the established Protestant clergy can have a claim to thos reserves. What occurs to me, therefore, as the easiest and the fairest solution of the difficulties is, that the reserves should be sold as quickly as they can be. I believe that has already been recommended. What, then, is to be done? I think the proceeds of the sales should be divided between those two established churches; and I think, myself, that the other dissenting sects, — (the Roman Catholic clergy being already amply provided for), — that the other dissenting Protestant sects, if they are inclined to take a fair view of the matter, should be satisfied with being provided for by the Legislature; that it should be enacted that they, in those parishes, or ecclesiastical districts, or chapelries where they form the majority, might have similar provision made for them out of the remaining waste lands. It strikes me, that all parties ought to be satisfied with this division of the clergy reserves, thus holding out to the dissenting sects the establishment, in their districts, of a glebe, or having a provision for the maintenance of a clergyman. The Crown, with the consent of the colonial Legislature, could make a similar provision. I do not think it desirable that such a provision should be made by a large quantity of land; but, during my experience in the country, I heard that it was desirable that every dissenting sect in the country should have a decent maintenance; that it was expedient that a small glebe should be attached to the permanent residence of the pastor. That is the view which I take, on the best inquiries I have made, and the best consideration I can give to the matter. I say, therefore, at once, that the present measure is not precisely the one I should recommend, and is not that which I should give my entire and cordial concurrence to; but the observation of the Noble Lord struck me forcibly, with reference to the affairs of Canada. It is impossible that any measure could be devised for the solution of the difficulties attending the question, on which all the Members of the House could agree. It is therefore desirable to make concessions, in some degree, to the opinions, to the necessities of the colony, and to the exigencies of rising circumstances. So many different religious sects are brought together, that we should content ourselves by, at least, not opposing the measure on the ground that it does not appear the best that could be devised, after it has received the assent of the Legislature of the colony, and, as far as we can see, is in unison with the feelings of the majority of the inhabitants of the colony. With these observations, I shall content myself at present. I am obliged to deny — and I do it with all respect — the assertion of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, that this is a concession to the demands made, and endeavoured to be enforced by rebellion. And I own — for I shall never countenance a measure for spoliation and injustice as to the vested existing rights of the inhabitants, — that, so far as I have heard the explanation of the details, it is one to which I think I shall be able to give my cordial concurrence, though not with the most sanguine expectations of its at once extinguishing the discords between different parties. And as to the clergy reserves, I think it is desirable, though this is not precisely the measure I should have thought of, to caution all Honourable Members against making up their minds to attempt to address the Crown, and to bring either House, or the Crown, in opposition to the declared will of the colonial Legislature, before they have well considered how any other settlement can be effected.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — I feel that, if the House were, at this moment, to enter into a discussion of the subject, it would be in the absence of most important documents, — in the absence of the enactments by which the Noble Lord proposes, in case of the union of the Canadas, to carry it into effect; and, next, without a knowledge of the provisions of the Bill by which the colonial Legislature proposes to deal with the clergy reserves. It may be said that, although we are not in possession of the Bill, we are in possession of its general enactments, and that we might discuss its general principles. But there are other documents not before the House: I mean those despatches from the Governor General of Canada, which, I presume, the Noble Lord intends to produce. So that, reserving my entirely unfettered discretion to consider this measure in a manner suitable to the immense importance of the subject, and to the great interests involved in it, I am desirous of postponing the discussion, with regard to the principles and details, till those documents are produced, — namely, the enactments to give effect to the measure, and the despatches of the Governor General. My chief object in rising is, to ask of the Noble Lord what he proposes to do with the clergy reserves of Lower Canada? The Legislature of Upper Canada have sent for the consent of her Majesty a measure respecting the clergy reserves of the Upper province; and I understood that, if no dissent should be signified in this or the other House of Parliament, the Noble Lord was prepared to advise the Crown to sanction it. I now wish to ask the Noble Lord what course he means to pursue with regard to the clergy reserves of Lower Canada?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — As to the clergy reserves of Lower Canada, and to the Bill passed by the colonial Legislature, supposing it to receive Her Majesty's consent, I propose to leave these subjects to the united Legislature, subject to the provision of the Act of 1791, "that no Act can receive the consent of the Crown unless previously laid before Parliament." I do not intend to introduce any measure with respect to the clergy reserves of Lower Canada, but to reserve to the two Houses of Parliament the power given in the Act of 1791, that either House may address the Crown to refuse its assent to any Bill that might be passed by the colonial Legislature.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — The Noble Lord proposes, then, that, as to the clergy reserves in Upper Canada, in case neither House of Parliament shall interpose, the Crown shall give its assent to the Act; thus excluding from the consideration of the Legislature of the two Canadas, in case they should be united, any discretion on the appropriation of the clergy reserves, except as to mere details. But, if I understand him, the Noble Lord proposes to leave to the united Legislature of the united provinces the mode of dealing with the clergy reserves in Lower Canada, reserving only the provision of the Act of 1791 (which applies, at present, to both the provinces), that no colonial Act shall have the force of law till laid on the tables of both Houses of Parliament; and that the Crown shall not give its consent to such Act if either House address the Crown in opposition to it.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I wish to put the House in possession of what I consider to be the state of the law with regard to the Clergy Reserves Bill in Upper Canada. I believe, if the consent of Her Majesty were given to the Bill, the effect would be this: it would not, in form, prevent the Legislature of the united provinces from legislating on the subject; but it would have the power of interfering with the Act; and any Bill of the kind, not being subject to the Act of 1791, might be assented to by the local Government and by Her Majesty's Government, without being subject to the restrictions of the Act of 1791. I do not think that, by any special legislation, the Act should be rendered permanent and irrevocable. I am of the same opinion as to the clergy reserves of Lower Canada, as to which no legislation has taken place. It will, of course, be competent for any one to show that I have not stated the law correctly; but I do not wish the measure to be assented to under the notion that it will be final, and that no power will be left to the Legislature of the united provinces to have a control over it.

SIR R. PEEL.—So that, supposing neither House of Parliament were to interfere with the Clergy Reserves Act, and that the Crown were to give its assent to it, the Noble Lord considers that the measure would not be final, even as to Lower Canada? But, in the event of the union, the united Legislature of the united provinces might pass an Act, and appropriate the whole produce of the clergy reserves to the purposes of general education or secular purposes; and that Act is to have effect, when it shall have been laid on the table of the House, and, after thirty days, neither House of Parliament has addressed the Crown against it.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I believe there is that power, subject to certain exceptions as to property, already given in endowments. I think that there were some endowments granted by Sir John Colborne, — and the colonial Legislature would not, I conceive, have any power whatever over them. But as to the distribution of the property proposed to be effected by this Act, — one portion to the Church of England, another to the Church of Scotland, and another to other objects, — that, being general legislation, would be liable to the interference of the colonial Legislature.

Sir, I have been asked a question with regard to the Act 7 & 8 George IV., providing for the sale of one fourth of the clergy reserves, and the investment of the proceeds in this country,—the greater part having been so invested in this country, and the Act making no exceptions as to the Act of 1791; and the Governor General requested me to procure the opinion of the law officers of the Crown whether those proceeds, so invested in this country, could be reinvested in Canada? Now, the opinion of the law officers was, that an Act of the Imperial Parliament was requisite. It will, therefore, be necessary to bring in a Bill to carry into effect that part of the Bill of the provincial Legislature (supposing it to receive the Royal Assent) which is to empower the Crown, or any authority under the Crown, to transfer the money from this country to Canada. The Honourable Member for Droitwich also asked a question as to when I considered that the thirty days would expire? I cannot give any opinion upon the meaning of that provision, but will take care to inform the Honourable Gentleman what the opinion of the law officers is; and I should be very unwilling that any advice given to the Crown should take by surprise either House of Parliament I was likewise asked as to the debt and revenue of the colony; on which point I omitted what I had to state. It was part of the proposition of the Governor General, to which both the special council of Lower Canada and the Legislature of Upper Canada assented, that the debt of the Upper province should form a debt of the united colony, as the greater portion has been incurred for public works undertaken by Upper Canada. It is true that some part of the works were for the benefit of Upper Canada; but it is difficult to distinguish between the different parts of the debt, and the province of Upper Canada has been extremely liberal, and ready to submit to expense for improving the means of intercourse between the remote parts of Upper Canada and the stream of the St. Lawrence (which is equally beneficial to both provinces), and has, somewhat lavishly, incurred expense for that purpose; whereas the Lower province has not, of late years, lent any aid for such purposes; and many of the works have lost much of their utility through the want of concurrence on the part of the Lower province. We propose, therefore, that the debt incurred on these accounts should form the debt of the united province; and, no doubt, the united Legislature will make provision for carrying on these works — as much care will be necessary to perfect them — in the Lower province; and thus the people of both provinces will be benefited, — none more so than the inhabitants of the district of the St. Lawrence.

I agree with the Right Honourable Baronet that this is not the period at which the principles and details of the measure can be fully discussed. Several papers, still to be laid upon the table, will throw considerable light upon these subjects; and which papers, with the exception of certain confidential communications as to particular points and particular localities, shall be produced, with any information as to those general topics of legislation on which the merits of this Bill have to be discussed.

MR. PAKINGTON. — The Noble Lord has not given an answer to my question, whether the Legislature of Upper Canada have power, under 31 Geo. III., to deal with the reserves already allotted; whether, on that point, the Noble Lord has taken the opinion of the law officers of the Crown; also, whether the Noble Lord will lay on the table Returns of the various denominations to which the Bill would apply.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — As to the Honourable Member's first question, I have not taken the opinion of the Crown law officers; but if he will put it in a convenient form, I shall have no difficulty in doing so. As it strikes me, it appears that the property already given in endowment is the property of the clergy, and not liable to interruption. With respect to the sects which will derive advantage from the measure, they are such as are recognised by certain Acts relating to the subject, and which I will lay on the table. But not having received, on this point, explanations from the Governor General, I cannot undertake to produce lists of the persons who might be benefited.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I have repeatedly endeavoured to procure information as to the expenses incurred by the various missions to Canada, especially those of Lord Gosford, Lord Durham, and the present Governor General. But I am sorry to say that there is great difficulty in obtaining distinct information on these points. Now, I trust that I shall be able to get Returns drawn in a manner better calculated to give satisfaction to the public. These Returns would show, if properly presented, the most unwarrantable expenditure, since 1835. I am afraid, however, that there has been an intention — I had almost said — to mystify these accounts, and to prevent the country from arriving at a fair understanding on the subject.

Bill then ordered to be brought in by LORD JOHN RUSSELL, LORD PALMERSTON, Mr. MACAULAY, Mr. LABOUCHERE, and the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.

SUPPLY.— ORDNANCE ESTIMATES.

Mr. BERNAL brought up the Report of the Committee of Supply on the Ordnance Estimates. — Resolution reported: —

1. That a sum, not exceeding 116,874*l*., be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the salaries of the civil establishments of the Office of Ordnance, at the Tower and Pall Mall, at Woolwich, the out stations in the United Kingdom, and at the foreign stations, for the year 1840–1.

2. That a sum, not exceeding 106,930*l*., be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the expense of the corps of Royal Engineers and Sappers and Miners, for the year 1840–1.

SIR JOHN YARDE BULLER. — I thought it was the intention of the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman, the Master General of the Ordnance, to make some explanation as to the dismissal of Mr. Foote.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN. — I have not risen to make any statement; because I do not consider any statement necessary. I fully entered into this question, when, on my bringing forward the Ordnance Estimates, we were charged with having dismissed Mr. Foote from the office of solicitor to the Ordnance Department for his vote at the Devonport election. I then stated, as I now repeat, that neither the board nor I had anything to do with the dismissal of Mr. Foote, any more than we had to do with his appointment; all such appointments being in the solicitor to the Ordnance, whose agent, in fact, Mr. Foote was. In consequence, however, of what then passed, and the promise my Gallant Friend the principal storekeeper of the department (Colonel Anson) gave, that inquiry should be made, I have since spoken to Mr. Hignett on the subject, and I received an answer, which I requested him to reduce to writing; he has accordingly done so; and I will now, if the House will allow me, read Mr. Hignett's explanation: —

Office of Ordnance, March 23. 1840.

Sir, — In obedience to your order, calling upon me for an explanation of the reasons which induced me to employ a law agent at Devonport, in the room of Mr. Foote, who acted in that capacity many years for Mr. James Smith, my predecessor in office, I have the honour to state that, upon the death of the latter, on the 24th of December last, all the law agencies, according to the rule of the solicitor's office, terminated. Upon my appointment by you on the 26th of that month, I alone became responsible to you and the board for the due performance of the duties of the office; and I therefore considered that I had a right to employ agents from amongst my own professional friends and acquaintance, wheresoever the business of the department might render it necessary, and without being required by the agents of my predecessor to assign any reason for so doing. I accordingly, very soon after my appointment by you, employed new agents at several Ordnance stations, including Devonport; and Mr. Foote is the only gentleman who has thought fit to make any complaint to me on the subject.

It appears that fresh agents were appointed in three different places; one in Liverpool; another in Birmingham; and a third — I do not recollect where. But Mr. Hignett continues: —

He has also caused a letter to be inserted in a provincial newspaper, which has been transferred to the columns of the daily London journals, in which he alleges that he had, during a period of fifty-five years, acted as the confidential agent of the Board of Ordnance, and of the Ordnance solicitor, and that he has been removed from the agency solely on the ground of his having voted at the recent election in favour of a gentleman who is opposed to the Government. That Mr. Foote should have imagined this to have been a cause of his removal I can easily suppose, seeing the very strong part which was taken by him and his son at the election, both of whom were members of Mr. Dawson's committee, and actually, in a placard, pledged their professional time gratuitously to that gentleman. In reply, however, to Mr. Foote's allegation, I beg to state that that gentleman has entirely misunderstood the nature of his own position, as well as my motives for employing a new agent; for, in the first place, he never was the confidential agent of the board, who have no such law agent at any station. His engagement was merely a personal affair between himself and the solicitor, who might, with perfect propriety and regularity, have terminated the agency at any moment, and who, upon a recent occasion, actually contemplated transferring the business to Mr. Eastlake, of Plymouth. Mr. Foote was first employed in that capacity, not by the board, but by Mr. Robert Smith, the late solicitor's father, about the period stated in his before-mentioned letter, and he continued to act for those gentlemen, successively, until the death of the son. In the next place, I can assure you that the election at Devonport had nothing to do with my selection of a new law agent at that station; because I had decided upon that step previously to the 1st of January last; and, I will add, that, not having the honour of being personally acquainted with Messrs. Foote, I had no knowledge of their politics, or of the part they meant to take in the subsequent election. From my long experience in the law business of the department, as agent of the late solicitor, I am enabled positively to state, that the board never interfered in the employment or change of the country agents, nor ever recognised those gentlemen in any capacity. I also know that the same rule is observed by the Lords of the Admiralty, and, I believe, by all the other public boards. This was proved a few years ago, when, upon the occasion of the death of Mr. Moses Greethan, the agent of the Admiralty solicitor at Portsmouth, on application to that board to sanction the appointment of Mr. Minchin as his successor, Sir James Graham, the then First Lord, declined to interfere in the matter, on the ground that the responsible duty of selecting and employing proper law agents rested solely with the solicitor.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your faithful and most obedient servant,
J. HIGNETT, Solicitor.

The Right Hon. Sir Hussey Vivian,
Bart., Master General of the Ordnance, &c.

Sir, this statement of Mr. Hignett, I think, proves that the Ordnance had nothing whatever to do with what the Honourable Baronet the Member for South Devon terms the dismissal of Mr. Foote. From the inquiry I have made, and the information I have received, I find it ever has been the case, that all these local appointments have been left entirely to the London solicitor; and if the Honourable Baronet is not satisfied with the evidence of Mr. Hignett, I will now prove to him, by the evidence of Mr. Foote himself, that Mr. Foote could not possibly consider himself as the solicitor of the Ordnance Department, and employed under the board. I have long known Mr. Foote; I have a high respect for, and a high opinion of, that gentleman. I am persuaded he would never do anything not perfectly consistent with the character and conduct of a man of the highest principle and the strictest integrity; and now, then, I will ask the Honourable Baronet, does he think that, if Mr. Foote considered himself the confidential agent of the Ordnance, he would have affixed his signature to the document I hold in my hand, and which I will now read to the House? If the Honourable Baronet is disposed to do such injustice to Mr. Foote, I am not. It is, I repeat, quite impossible that Mr. Foote could have signed this paper, believing himself, at the same time, to be the solicitor to the Board of Ordnance: —

The Right Hon. G. Dawson's election.

We, the undersigned attorneys resident in Devonport, having heard the announcement that Mr. Dawson is a candidate for the representation of the borough in Parliament, have formed ourselves into a professional committee, and agree to give our gratuitous services to the Right Honourable Gentleman throughout his contest.

And among the names affixed to that document, Sir, I find those of Mr. Foote and his son. Then, I ask, is it possible to believe that Mr. Foote ever would have pledged himself, thus gratuitously, to support a candidate opposed to the Government, had he considered himself the confidential agent of the Ordnance Department? What would have been said, if the solicitor of the Ordnance had signed such a resolution in the favour of Mr. Tufnell? We should, at once, have been exposed to the charge of corruption; and very properly so. Under no circumstances, I say, could a party holding an office (as the Honourable Baronet assumes Mr. Foote to have done) under the Government have affixed his name, with any degree of propriety, to such a placard, whether the pledge was for or against the Government candidate. It is doing Mr. Foote a great injustice to suppose that, when he acted in this manner, he believed he held an employment under the Government.

With respect to Captain Dundas having, shortly before the election, been at Devonport; he was there by my orders, respecting the sale of some ground belonging to the Ordnance, and for which application had been made by a gentleman resident in the neighbourhood. He was there to meet me on my road from my residence in Cornwall to attend my duty in this House, and to consult with me and the officer of the Royal Engineers, on the subject of the disposal of this property. Captain Dundas arrived at Devonport very late on the evening of the 6th of January. On the same evening I arrived from the west; I saw my Honourable Friend the Government candidate for a few minutes only; with Captain Dundas I settled what was to be done in respect of the property in question; and, at six the following morning, I left the place, having, immediately before starting, had the pleasure of shaking hands with my friend Mr. Dawson, who, hearing I was there, got up thus early purposely to see me. I mention these circumstances, in order to show how little I had an opportunity, even if I had wished, to interfere in the election. I left Captain Dundas at Devonport; and I am authorised by that gallant officer to state that, when he called on Mr. Foote the next morning, as he necessarily did, in company with Sir George Hoste, the officer of the Royal Engineers in command at Devonport, to speak to Mr. Foote on the subject of the property proposed to be sold, and respecting which Mr. Foote, from his long having been employed by the solicitor to the board, could give all the information he (Captain Dundas) required, the mention of the coming contest for the seat arose casually, and just as he was about to depart; when he observed to Mr. Foote, "I hope you won't oppose us;" to which Mr. Foote replied, "My son is on Mr. Dawson's committee, and as for myself (Mr. Foote added), I am an old man, and shall probably not vote;" and this was the purport of what passed. But Honourable Gentlemen opposite are fond of finding cases against the Ordnance Department.

When I moved the estimate, amongst other charges of corruption and oppression brought against us, the case of a sailor named Underdown was mentioned; and he was said to have been removed from one vessel to another, because he voted for Mr. Dawson. I now, Sir, hold in my hand the official document from the superintendent of the Ordnance vessels, who resides at Woolwich, in which it is stated that a seaman of the Ebenezer, having been sent sick into the hospital at Devonport, in such a state as to prevent the possibility of his attending his duties for a considerable period (the poor man is since dead), he proposed that the seaman Underdown, then serving in another vessel, should be transferred to the Ebenezer. This is dated from Woolwich, February 26th. Really, Sir, if we are to be subject to such charges as this, we shall soon be obliged to inquire whether any seaman serving in one of our vessels voted for or against some Honourable Gentleman opposite, before we send one of our boys to sea.

Sir, when this subject was last before the House, my Right Honourable and Gallant Friend opposite (Sir H. Hardinge) mentioned, and very properly mentioned, a case which occurred at the time when he belonged to the Ordnance, of a clerk who, whenever an election took place, always went to Rochester and voted for the Whig candidate. Sir, it was highly creditable to my Gallant Friend, and those who were in office with him, that this was permitted, and permitted without prejudice to the party who so voted; but, in justice to myself, and those acting with me, I must beg leave again to state a case of a similar nature, which I then cited, in reply to my Gallant Friend. It is the case of an Ordnance clerk at Devonport, who, at the last election for East Cornwall, voted a plumper against me, the Master General of the Ordnance. This, Sir, was, no doubt, a somewhat bold measure. This gentleman had, I understood, received his appointment through the influence of some friend of my noble opponent, for whom he voted; it was an act of gratitude, and I admired him for it; and, when informed of it, I desired that no notice whatever should be taken of the circumstance. I afterwards went over the gun wharf, accompanied by this gentleman, and spoke to him as if nothing of the sort had happened; and, as far as I know, to the hour of his death, which occurred shortly after, he never was aware that I knew how he had voted. Why, Sir, at the last election, when we were charged with having so improperly exerted our power, to show how little justice there is in the complaints that have been made against us, I beg to inform the Honourable Baronet opposite, and his friends around him, that, out of eight persons who had votes, and who were employed under the Ordnance, four, only, voted for Mr. Tufnell, and the remaining four for Mr. Dawson. What, let me ask, would the Honourable Baronet have more than this? What would satisfy him? Surely there could not be a fairer division than this was.

I hope, Sir, I have now explained and done away with all the charges that have been preferred against that department at the head of which I have the honour to be placed; and whilst I thank the House for the patience with which they have heard me, I resume my seat sincerely and distinctly asserting that I verily believe no election ever occurred, in regard to which the conduct of the department ever stood more perfectly free from having improperly used its influence.

SIR JOHN YARDE BULLER. — I do not think the Right Honourable Master General of the Ordnance will complain of my having brought the subject forward; for so far as regards the Right Honourable and Gallant Baronet himself, the explanation is sufficiently satisfactory; but it cannot be denied that Mr. Foote has good grounds for complaint. Mr. Hignett, though he had been doing business for Mr. Smith, during the illness of the latter, had given Mr. Foote no intimation of his own intention with respect to him. The first intimation which Mr. Foote received was from a report in a newspaper, stating that he was to be removed, and another appointed in his room. On applying to the editor of the paper, to know the source of the information, he was told it was a mere rumour, which would turn out to be unfounded, and the editor expressed his regret at its insertion. This was the first intimation which Mr. Foote had, until the appointment was given to another; and, under these circumstances, he has reason to complain both of the manner in which the transaction took place, and also of Mr. Hignett not having replied to his letter. I will read to the House a statement from Mr. Foote, setting forth the facts which preceded his removal, — as to which there is some little difference from the statement of the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman. Mr. Foote says, —

> On the 7th of January, 1840, when Mr. Dawson and Mr. Tufnell were candidates for Devonport, while I was alone in my office, a clerk of the Ordnance called upon me, and introduced a gentleman as Captain Dundas.

Then there is that statement to which the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman referred, of the business relative to the sale of the Ordnance property. Mr. Foote proceeds, —

> After that, the conversation was turned, and Captain Dundas said he had come down to assist his friend, and that there would be a sharp contest; to which I replied, "I am old, and in ill health, and can take no active part at all." He said, "I believe you have a son?" I said, "he is appointed on the committee of Mr. Dawson, and so acted at the last contested election." Nothing more was said. Captain Dundas said he was staying at Admiral Warren's, in the dockyard.

In the letter to the Right Honourable and Gallant Officer, Mr. Foote hopes for an answer "to relieve the feelings of an old man." In his letter to Mr. Hignett, after alluding to the account in the provincial paper, he goes on to say, —

> I found that another agent had been employed by the barrack department of the Ordnance in a case before the magistrates at Plymouth; and I take the liberty of addressing you on the subject, and asking why it should have been so; for I trust every matter of business in which I have been employed under yourself or your predecessor has been faithfully and honourably executed. I hope you will excuse my troubling you upon this subject, which is a painful one to me, after having acted for the board in matters of the greatest confidence for the last fifty years.

Now, Sir, I must say, that whatever was the cause of Mr. Foote's dismissal, he has great reason to complain, that to this letter, dated 23d February, he should have received no answer. But, there is another point, — that Mr. Foote states he received an answer to his letter to Sir Hussey Vivian, of which, being marked "private," he does not consider himself at liberty to disclose the contents; and Mr. Foote proceeds, —

> I beg to acquit Sir Hussey Vivian of all blame, and am enabled to form a pretty accurate view of how he is circumstanced. The pretence set up is, that the appointment of law agents rests entirely with the solicitor, and that he, having been appointed, on the death of Mr. Smith, chose a gentleman, not an attorney, but a conveyancer; whereas, in reality, though Mr. Smith did not die till a short time before the late election, Mr. Hignett acted as the board solicitor twelve months prior; and, during that time, we have transacted business under his direction. And the real fact, as stated to me by several gentlemen whose names I must not mention, is, that immediately after the clerk of the Ordance left me, when he had the conference on the Ordnance business, he went to the present agent and employed him.

Yet, Sir, Mr. Hignett pretends that the dismissal of Mr. Foote took place on the death of Mr. Smith, who died on the 4th of December — and this was on the 7th of January. I must say, I think Mr. Foote had a right to expect more courtesy from Mr. Hignett.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN. — I can only again repeat that I knew nothing of the appointment of the present agent; and as to the letter which I wrote to Mr. Foote, I have not the slightest objection to its being read. With respect to Mr. Hignett not having answered the letter of Mr. Foote, I inquired into the matter, and it arose from Mr. Hignett having been engaged at an Ordnance trial at the assizes.

Mr. SHAW. — I would not say a word as to the affair of the Devonport election; but I wish to make one observation with regard to the Military Academy at Woolwich. Some charge was made against the Ordnance on this subject; and in the debate which took place in regard to that matter, a connection of mine was referred to. I therefore feel it to be my duty to state that I do not believe the management of that institution is in the least degree influenced by political considerations. I do not think this House the best place for discussing these points; and I would much rather, for my part, make any representations on the subject to the Right Honourable and Gallant Gentleman in private. As to the change in respect to the ages, I think it a good alteration, and that it is better the age should be 16 and 17, instead of 15 and 14.

Resolutions further read: —

3. That a sum, not exceeding 354,078*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the expense of the Royal Regiment of Artillery, the Royal Horse Artillery, the master gunners, the field train, the medical department, and the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, for the year 1840-1.

4. That a sum, not exceeding 37,714*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the salaries to barrack masters in the United Kingdom and the colonies, for the year 1840-1.

5. That a sum, not exceeding 437,711*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge for Ordnance works and repairs, storekeepers' expenditure, building and repair of barracks, barrack masters' expenditure, pay of clerks of works, &c. in the United Kingdom and the colonies, for the year 1840-1, after deducting 86,042*l.* for credits, by sale of lands and premises, sale of old stores, and rents of canteens, &c.

6. That a sum, not exceeding 180,415*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of the military and civil contingencies; also, of the surveys of the United Kingdom, and of that portion of the army extraordinaries transferred to the Ordnance by Treasury minute, for the year 1840-1.

7. That a sum, not exceeding 207,000*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge for stores, on account of ordnance and military store branch services, for the year 1840-1.

8. That a sum, not exceeding 158,647*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of the Office of Ordnance, on account of the allowance of superannuated, retired, and half-pay officers, pensions for good services, inventions, and wounds; for pensions to widows and children of deceased officers late belonging to the several ordnance military corps: also, allowances, compensations, and emoluments, in the nature of superannuated or retired allowances, to persons late belonging to the Office of Ordnance, and to the barrack department, in respect to their having held any public offices or employment of a civil nature: and, also, for the charge of widows' pensions, for the year 1840-1.

9. That a sum, not exceeding 285,636*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for defraying the charge of the commissariat supplies in the United Kingdom and the colonies, for the year 1840-1.

Resolutions agreed to.

UNION WORKHOUSES BILL.

Mr. FOX MAULE.—I move the Order of the Day for the third reading of this Bill.

On the question, "That the Order of the Day be now read," —

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS said: — I have to present a petition from Saint Nicholas, Warwick, against the Bill; and I hope the Honourable Gentleman will consent to postpone the Bill, at least for a short time. Several petitions have been presented against the measure; and I have a strong objection to some of its provisions. I am unwilling, now, to discuss the measure; but if the Honourable Gentleman persists in his motion, I shall be obliged to state the reasons why I cannot give my consent to it. My attention was not called to the Bill until after the second reading, or I should have opposed it before.

Mr. BERNAL. — I also trust my Honourable Friend will consent to postpone the Bill. He has already, in Committee, made a sweeping alteration, striking out a clause preserving the existing rating for lands or buildings afterwards converted to workhouse purposes. My Honourable Friend knows that, by a decision of the Queen's Bench, rates are imposable on union workhouses. I think the measure is not generally understood.

Mr. BURROUGHES.—I concur in requesting the postponement of the Bill. If this be not acceded to, I shall move that the third reading be put off till this day six months.

Mr. HODGES.—The Bill has been for only a short time before the House, and the public are not aware of its provisions. I regret it should have gone to this stage without public attention being called to it, and I think it should be postponed.

Mr. HUME.—I wish to ask whether the Government mean to agree to exempt hospitals from rating?

Mr. FOX MAULE.—I thought my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had distinctly stated that such was not his intention. I certainly was not aware that this Bill would receive such opposition. Neither on the second reading, nor in Committee, was it so opposed. It has been brought in merely to exempt from parochial rating buildings taken for workhouse uses; and my object, in wishing to carry it on, is, that there is a new rating on the 5th of April; so that postponement would, virtually, be desertion.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL.—I do not understand what the Honourable Gentleman means by there being a new rating on the 5th of April. The rates are quarterly, and there will be another on the 15th of July. I must say, I do not think that the measure has been sufficiently considered. I do not say that it is unreasonable to exempt workhouses from the payment of rates; but, at the same time, it would be well to allow the Bill to stand over for a week, as it has not before been discussed.

SIR T. FREMANTLE.—I am in favour of the Bill, and I hope the Honourable Gentleman will not consent to postpone the third reading. I think it hard to compel parishes to lay out large sums on the building of workhouses, and then to force them to pay a large amount in the shape of rates. It is unfair to order parishes to build workhouses, and to give the particular parish in which they are situated the benefit of the rates derived from those erections. At the same time, however, I must say, that care ought to be taken not to put any parish in a worse position than it was before the building of a workhouse within its boundary. The land on which the buildings are situated ought still to contribute to the parish rates in the same ratio as before the erection.

SIR C. DOUGLAS.—If the Honourable Under Secretary persist in his motion, I shall certainly meet it with an amendment, that the third reading of the Bill be postponed till after Easter.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—I think the principle of this measure a just one. I think, at the same time, however, that time ought to be given for the consideration of its provisions; and if that is the object of the motion for postponement, I shall certainly support it;—not with any view of defeating the Bill, but to give opportunity for stating valid objections.

Mr. HAWES.—May I add one word to urge on my Honourable Friend the postponement of the Bill? I am in its favour, and think it deserves support; but representations have lately been made to me which induce me to think that there ought to be some delay.

Mr. FOX MAULE.—I cannot, of course, resist such repeated solicitations from both sides of the House, and will postpone the Bill for a fortnight.

Third reading deferred till Monday, the 6th of April.

LAW OF EVIDENCE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

The LORD ADVOCATE.—I move the Order of the Day for going into a Committee on this Bill.

On the question, "That the Order be now read,"—

SIR WILLIAM RAE said:—I hope the Learned Lord will consent to postpone this Bill, to afford time for eliciting the opinions of the legal profession in Scotland, as the subject is one of great importance.

The LORD ADVOCATE.—I have no objection to postpone it for a day or two.

Third reading postponed till Friday.

DRAINAGE OF LANDS BILL.

Read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

INLAND WAREHOUSING BILL.

Second reading deferred till Monday next.

SEWERS BILL.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER.—I beg to move the second reading of the Sewers Bill.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Sir, I rise to second the motion.

Question put.

Mr. HODGES. — It is my intention to oppose the motion. Some time ago, I introduced a Bill for the regulation of sewers in England and Wales, which, after a patient and laborious investigation, became the law of the land. That Bill has now been in operation several years; and I believe that not a single petition has been presented praying for an alteration in its provisions. That measure has been perfectly satisfactory; and I think it incumbent on the Honourable Member to show some grounds for repealing that Act and introducing another. If the Honourable Member will introduce a Bill for the consolidation of the laws relating to sewers, he shall have my cordial support; but I cannot agree to the course now proposed.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER.—Perhaps, after what has fallen from the Honourable Member for West Kent, it may be desirable that I should make a few remarks with respect to the measure now under consideration. In the course of the last Session, in compliance with the urgent request of several persons, I turned my attention to this subject, and brought in a Bill similar to the one now before the House. That Bill was read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee — a Committee composed of Honourable Gentlemen well acquainted with the subject, and particularly interested in the drainage of land. The result of that inquiry was, that I was instructed to proceed with the Bill, in order that its provisions might be submitted to the country. I now intend to take the same course, and, at a future day, to nominate the same Committee, in order that its provisions may be fully considered, and that any necessary alterations may be introduced. The Honourable Member for West Kent seems to be of opinion that this is an entirely new measure, and that my intention is to repeal a useful existing Act; but, surely, the Honourable Member must be aware that much litigation has arisen as to the interpretation of many of the provisions of that Act. It was my original intention to bring forward a measure to amend the existing law; but, considering it very desirable that the persons who sit as commissioners should have but one Act to guide them, I thought it more advisable to propose the repeal of the existing law, and bring in another Bill; and, in the measure now before the House, all the clauses of the existing Act, with the exception of two, are preserved, and several additional clauses are introduced, in order to amend the present law. This measure applies only to the agricultural districts; and I will now state some of the alterations which I propose. In many cases, it is very desirable to deviate from the lines of drainage laid down a considerable time ago; and although every proprietor in the level may be benefited by it, considerable difficulty is experienced in procuring the requisite number of consents. What I propose is, that if a person wishes to improve any particular drainage, he shall present a petition to the Court of Sewers, which shall consist of three commissioners, and deposit a sum of money, sufficient to secure the publication of the proper notices. The commissioners, after hearing counsel, shall determine whether the work shall be carried into effect, or not: and if the parties feel themselves aggrieved, I propose to give the power of appeal to the quarter sessions. Under the old Act, the mode of impanelling juries is exceedingly defective. To remedy this inconvenience, I propose that a smaller number shall be sufficient. I also intend, by advertisement in the newspapers, to dispense with many of the cumbrous proceedings which are now necessary with respect to the publication of notices. I have no desire unnecessarily to press forward the measure, and purpose to leave it entirely in the hands of the Committee. I have received communications from all parts of England approving of the principle of this Bill, and only suggesting that certain alterations may be made in it when in Committee. Under these circumstances, therefore, I hope the House will allow it to be read a second time.

Mr. HODGES. — The explanation of the Honourable Member has in no way removed my objection to the second reading of the Bill; and I shall therefore move that it be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. HUME. — I hope, after the explanation given by the Honourable Gentleman opposite, that my Honourable Friend the Member for West Kent will allow the Bill to be read a second time, in order that it may be referred to a Committee up-stairs. If, when it comes from the Committee, it shall not be found satisfactory to my Honourable Friend, it will then be open for him to oppose the further progress of the measure.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I trust the Honourable Member for West Kent will not press his amendment. Many objections exist to the present law relating to sewers; and as my Honourable Friend has taken considerable trouble to remedy those defects, I think, in fairness, the Bill ought to be left to the consideration of a Committee.

Mr. C. BERKELEY. — It appears to me that the Honourable Member is legislating merely for the county of Lincoln. In Gloucestershire, where there is a considerable quantity of drainage, the provisions of the Bill will be strongly objected to; and I shall therefore support the amendment of the Honourable Member for West Kent.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. — I beg to state that I have received communications from Gloucestershire, as well as from other parts of the country, in favour of the principle of the Bill. Instead of introducing a local Act for the county of Lincoln, I thought it better to bring in a general measure, which will apply equally to other parts of the country.

Mr. W. A. WILLIAMS. — I think no reason has been shown for proceeding with the Bill. I certainly am not aware that any inconvenience has resulted from the present law. In the county with which I am connected, the people are perfectly satisfied with the law as it now stands.

Mr. BROADLEY. — I trust that the Honourable Gentleman will be allowed to proceed with his Bill, in order that its provisions may be fully examined.

Mr. LANGDALE. — As the proposition for sending the Bill to a Committee will remove many objections which I may have to it, I shall certainly vote for the second reading.

LORD G. SOMERSET. — I think there are many strong reasons against the Bill passing during the present Session. I certainly object to many of its provisions; and, on the third reading, if in its present shape, I shall decidedly vote against it. I think that the law, as it at present stands, may be reconsidered with advantage to all parties, and I therefore hope the Bill will be allowed to go to a Select Committee.

Mr. HODGES. — In accordance with the wishes of so many Honourable Gentlemen, I beg to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment withdrawn; Bill read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee.

SETTLED ESTATES DRAINAGE BILL.

On the motion of Mr. PUSEY, Committee nominated: — Mr. Pusey, Sir James Graham, Sir Edward Sugden, Mr. Handley, Mr. Lynch, Lord Worsley, Sir Thomas Acland, Captain Pechell, Mr. Aglionby, Mr. Freshfield, Mr. Hayter, Sir John Yarde Buller, Mr. Bruges, Sir Harry Verney, and Mr. Stansfield. — Five to be the quorum.

CORONER FOR MIDDLESEX.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I beg to move that the following Committee be nominated: — Mr. Wakley, Colonel Thomas Wood, Mr. William Willians, Mr. Mackinnon, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Cripps, Mr. Thomas Duncombe, Lord Teignmouth, Sir James Duke, Lord Eliot, Mr. Aglionby, Sir Thomas Fremantle, Sir Benjamin Hall, Mr. Gally Knight, and Sir George Strickland. — Power to send for persons, papers, and records; five to be the quorum.

COLONEL T. WOOD. — I have consented to serve on this Committee with very great reluctance. I do so in justice to the magistrates whose conduct is involved in this proceeding; but I cannot help saying that I think the course which has been taken is most irregular, and highly improper.

Motion agreed to; Committee nominated.

CONSOLIDATED FUND BILL.
